Cover art: MOTHER PLACID DEMPSEY, a Benedictine nun of the Abbey of Regina Laudis in Bethlehem, Connecticut, is a sculptress and painter. Of the cover illustration for this Classics volume, Mother Placid says, “It takes its inspiration from Christ’s words to Mechthild that she was to be a witness to the ‘light of my divinity flowing into all hearts that live without guile.’ Mechthild was eminent among these witnesses in the fullness with which her heart knew and lived this experience and from which she wrote of it. Yet, it seemed good to create an image that would ‘witness’ in its way to all hearts who have lived and continue to live this same reality. The cover image then portrays these hidden lights who fill our world with the unseen radiance of God’s light.”

Translator of This Volume

FRANK TOBIN is professor of German at the University of Nevada, Reno, and serves on the editorial boards of Studia Mystica and Mystics Quarterly. Born in Omaha, Nebraska, Dr. Tobin received a licentiate in philosophy from Berchmanskolleg in Munich in 1960, an M.A. in German from Marquette University in 1964 and a Ph.D. in German from Stanford in 1967. In addition to numerous articles and papers on medieval German thought and literature, his major publications include Mechthild von Magdeburg: A Medieval Mystic in Modern Eyes (Camden House, 1994) and Meister Eckhart: Thought and Language (University of Pennsylvania Press, 1986). Previous contributions to The Classics of Western Spirituality series include his collaboration on Meister Eckhart: Teacher and Preacher and his translation of Henry Suso.

Author of the Preface

MARGOT SCHMIDT is director of the Research Center of Medieval Spirituality, Asceticism and Mystics at the Catholic University of Eichstatt in Germany. Since 1985, she has served as editor of the collection of medieval texts and studies entitled Mystik in Geschichte und Gegenwart: Texte und Untersuchungen. In that series, she produced the first two volumes: she edited and translated the work of Rudolf of Biberach, De VII itinera aeternitatis, into German; the other is a volume of papers read at the Conference Theologia Mystica at Weingarten in November 1986. As of January 1998, the series contains fifteen volumes. She has written extensively on women mystics, especially Mechthild of Magdeburg, Hildegard of Bingen, Mechthild of Hackeborn and Margaret Ebner.

FOREWORD

In completing this translation of Mechthild of Magdeburg's Flowing Light of the Godhead, I have incurred a debt of gratitude to many. First, I would like to thank the publishers Max Niemeyer Verlag for their kind permission to use as the basis of my translation their excellent recent critical text and notes, the lifelong work of the Germanist Hans Neumann. Also, my debt to Margot Schmidt is manifold. The profound knowledge she has transmitted in her scholarship has affected my understanding of Mechthild in ways both palpable and impalpable. More particularly, she generously sent me her excellent translation into modern German of The Flowing Light of the Godhead and the accompanying notes even before publication. The opportunity to compare her renderings with mine saved me from many a misstep. Finally, I wish to thank her for contributing the preface to this volume. My thanks are also due to GertrudJaron Lewis for her support and encouragement, to Bernard McGinn for his thoughtful suggestions, and to Patricia Beckman for her willingness to engage in a lively E-mail dialogue that resulted in several improvements. Lastly, as in the case of several of my previous academic endeavors, Bob Reardon's meticulous scrutiny of the entire manuscript has been invaluable. I can only wish that the finished product does some justice to the help I have received and to Mechthild.

It is with great pleasure that I respond to Frank Tobin's request that I provide a preface for his fine English translation. In his introduction to the text he offers an initial orientation to this rich but difficult book and addresses important themes. To complement his remarks on Mechthild's book as an expression of mysticism, I would like to examine a theme—certainly of central importance—not touched upon there: the human and divine heart.

Mechthild's book is a phenomenon that should not be viewed in isolation—as one mystical document among all the documents of mysticism. Rather, it is the expression of a basic human drive that comes to the surface, sometimes more, sometimes less. To these basic human drives we can reckon hunger, love, sex, and a yearning for God. This last-mentioned drive appears to have been so smothered by the others that today we scarcely still perceive it as a basic drive. And yet, the testimony of the mystics teaches us that the human person in its capacity for God (capax Dei) soars above all other recognized drives and surpasses them in a marvelous and terrifying way, once we have been awakened by the spark of God's spirit or God's love. In the face of this bursting forth of a passion for God, everything else suddenly retreats. An important characteristic of this passion for God is that it irrevocably prevents us from falling back into an all too vapid and tame existence. The passion for God powerfully pushes aside all merely worldly concerns in order to appropriate our entire vitality and our life, in all its aspects, for itself. What thereby occurs is that we become separated and detached from all that is familiar, so that we might give ourselves over with total commitment to the demands of what is eternal.

Out of this interplay of personal experience of God, and an interior command to proclaim and teach, arose the driving forces and goals of mystical literature which took form in confessional, didactic, and admonitory writings. These texts, which articulated the most intimate relationships between God and the human person, or inspired elucidations of salvation history, were fashioned by a consciousness of self that is unique. What Mechthild has preserved in writing The Flowing Light of the Godhead eloquently bears witness to this passion for God.

In essence Mechthild of Magdeburg's book, The Flowing Light of the Godhead, is nothing other than the moving story of God's heart and the human heart, and of Lucifer's cunning attempts to interfere with the ties that join them. Understandably these levels, completely unequal in their power, unleash a highly dramatic life or death struggle. Reeling between exhilarating raptures and collisions with unyielding earthly reality, Mechthild is wrenched this way and that between her incomprehensible experiences of God on the one hand and, on the other, the uncertainty and terror of entering into a state of defenselessness and peril because of her writing. In this state of uncertainty she receives support from her confessor. Through him she received the legitimacy of her mission "to write this book out of God's heart and mouth" (IV 2). In another passage, in response to the astonishment of some people at her unusual disclosures, she claims legitimation from God: "If seven years ago, God had not offered support to my heart with special favor, I would still be silent and would never have written this" (111 1). Similarly, the close of Book Six, probably the work of an editor, formulates it thus: "The writing in this book flowed out of the living Godhead into Sister Mechthild's heart and has been as faithfully set down here as it was given by God out of her heart" (VI 43).

Her mystical understanding under the spell of immediate experiences takes on the intermediary function of supporting the human person and strengthening the church. Regarding her mission of proclamation she perceives the words of Christ: "Truly, I say to you, in this book my heart's blood is written" (V 34). This way of speaking alludes to her own existential giving of herself in her writing to the last drop of blood.

The heart is the principle and center of one's life as a person. It is also the place "where the human being in its own source borders on the mystery of God." According to Karl Rahner heart is a primal word in the sense that it does not derive from some other word. It does not denote the physiological heart muscle as such but rather the original center of the physical-spiritual person before any differentiation into body and soul. This center of the person is in its essence open to other persons and to God. These meanings should be noted when Mechthild speaks of the human heart, but also when she speaks of the heart of God and Lucifer's heart.

1. The Heart of God

Experiencing God becomes in the case of Mechthild a vital mutual interaction between the heart of God and the human heart in which, surprisingly, longing lies in God's heart:

(Soul:) "Lord, you are constantly lovesick for me.
That you have clearly shown personally.
You have written me into your book of the Godhead;
You have painted me in your humanity;
You have buried me in your heart...
Ah, allow me, my dear One, to pour balsam upon you."
(God:) "O One dear to my heart, where shall you find the balm?"
(Soul:) "O Lord, I was going to tear the heart of my soul in two and intended to put you in it." (III 2)

What is new in Mechthild is that the old motif of Christ as Physician is not limited to its traditional meaning of redemption and salvation of the soul, but rather becomes an expression of the unio mystica, in which the lovesick soul receives her fulfillment through Christ, the Physician (as in VII 58). And in the passage quoted just above we see the motif completely reversed. The Lord is lovesick for the soul and she, with complete emotional commitment, wants to be his physician! Eros forces not only the soul under its yoke, but God himself, because he created man out of love and had his Son become man to redeem him. From this Mechthild draws the conclusion: "This same nature forces God to greet us...with holy intimacy" \(IV 14\). This statement finds its place in the tradition of those who speak of God's indwelling in the heart, of his nearness in speaking to us, of elevation to the point of ecstasy, and declare categorically that God by his grace can do this at any time. This intimacy with God is only a foretaste of the everlasting union of God and humanity which Mechthild vividly portrays as a personal happening:

There eye reflects eye,
There spirit flows in spirit,
There hand touches hand,
There mouth speaks to mouth,
And there heart greets heart. (IV 14)

So intense at times is the assimilation of the human heart to the divine heart, as it leaves all earthly things behind, that the soul proclaims: "Lord, because I have no earthly treasure, I do not have an earthly heart either. For you, Lord, are my treasure, just as you are also my heart; and you alone are my good" (IV 7).

In spite of the sublimity of the union of God and humanity in the assimilation of heart by heart, the overwhelming power of God encounters only weakness in the human heart: "Whoever were to give himself over to the ecstasy that comes from God... would enter into such great delight and such holy knowledge that no heart would be able to bear it" (V 29).

Advanced in age, Mechthild, looking back in Book Six, reflects on the attraction and tension existing between human and divine hearts in order to clarify that, though the first step is always God attracting and the divine heart enticing, there can be no progress without a reaction of the human heart. Mechthild portrays as a love game how the divine heart goes about wooing.

When God sees fit to let his divine heart shine forth in love toward the very blessed soul so intensely that a small spark alights on the cold soul and she receives so much that the heart of this person begins to glow, his soul to melt, and his eyes to flow, then our Lord would like to make an earthly person so heavenly that one actually wants to follow, love, and see God in him. And the person's senses say: "No, I can be of much use in external matters." And it is especially cloistered people who say this when they are being especially clever. (VI 13)

Mechthild is here criticizing the neglect of interior religious training, which begins with the perceptivity and formation of the heart. In an allegory about the divine fire that is supposed to express something about the greatness and power of God to act, she suddenly breaks off and stammers:

Whoever wishes to speak more about this,
Let him prostrate himself in this fire
And see and taste how the Godhead flows,
How humanity pours,
How the Holy Spirit wrestles,
And vanquishes many a heart,
Forcing it to love God intensely. (VI 29)

The central focal point is always the heart which conquers and binds together what is divine and what is human. Indeed, on the basis of her experience of God she lays claim to kinship with God. She herself originates spiritually from the heart of the Father, corporeally from the heart of the Son, and has been purified by the Spirit of both. Thus elevated through divine grace Mechthild considers herself to be vitally subsumed into the life of the Trinity and she calls out to the Trinity:

Lord, heavenly Father, you are my heart.
Lord Jesus Christ, you are my body.
Lord Holy Spirit, you are my breath. (V 6)

It is as if the pulse of the three divine Persons, expanding mysteriously from heart to heart, was beating in her.

Theologically speaking, this image of physical oneness links characteristics specific to each Person of the Trinity with the fact that the human person to its very core is directed essentially to God. The creative energy of the human heart reacts to the unfathomable power of the Father Creator. The incarnation of the Son becomes the formative, molding power of earthly life, even of the body itself. From the power of the Holy Spirit as the Giver of Life the whole human person breathes and itself acts as inspired. Among the many and often difficult images for the Trinity in Mechthild's writings this one, in its compactness and profundity with respect to our close kinship with God, is the one that expresses most powerfully the evidence for the Trinity in the human person and for its transference into the human person. A life based on this excludes in its very nature a feeling of emptiness and homelessness. On the contrary, it makes the human heart secure. For God has placed it "in his glowing heart," where he, eternally craving for love, "neither increases nor decreases," but remains "as he always was" (14). This is yet another confirmation that eros lies within God himself.

2. The Goal of the Human Heart

Mechthild's basic assertion about the human heart is its insatiable longing for God. It comes to the fore as the infinite relationship reveals itself. Humans as finite beings reach out toward the infinite being of God. And the goal, for Mechthild, is attained in a vital infinite relationship of heights and depths which is stirred by intense emotions. It is only to pure longing that God reveals himself and says:

When I shine, you shall glow.
When I flow, you shall become wet.

When you sigh, you draw my divine heart into you....
...a blissful abiding prevails between us. (II 6)

The state existing between the divine and the human heart is described as a "blissful abiding," a blessed waiting for the other whose fulfillment presupposes leaving everything of this earth behind. Driven by its intense desire to live fully, the soul responds in strong, emotionally-charged words that nevertheless in their refinement show reserve:

Lord, then I shall persevere in hunger and thirst
In pursuing and in pleasure
Till that playful hour
When from your divine mouth
The chosen words shall flow
That are heard by no one
But the soul alone
That has stripped itself of the earth
And puts her ear next to your mouth.
She, indeed, grasps the treasure of love!

The soul that has experienced many raptures and blissful ecstasies suffers all the more when God withdraws his presence, and longing increases.⁴ Longing rises to the paradox that in spite of all the levels of rapture and union with God-and beyond them-the goal is far from attained; and that the highest stage in this life ultimately remains that of hungering and thirsting for God. This blessed longing is the final attitude to be assumed by the human heart. The end of a love dialogue blurts this out like a cry for help:

I have such a hunger for the heavenly Father that I forget all cares. And I so thirst for his Son that it removes from me all earthly desires. And I have such a passionate need for the Spirit of them both that it goes beyond the wisdom of the Father, which I cannot grasp; and beyond the Son's suffering, which I cannot bear; and beyond the consolation of the Holy Spirit, which I cannot receive.

Whoever becomes entangled in longing such as this must forever hang blessedly fettered in God. (111 3)

This antithetical paradox is the linguistic equivalent of an inscrutable, lofty stage of experiencing God. Thus she says: "Yearning love causes a pure heart much sweet anguish" (111 24). For the soul's wish to attain the vision of and union with God remains unfulfilled on this earth in spite of any foretaste and all the heart-rending laments:

O Lord, if it could ever happen to me that I might gaze upon you as my heart desires and hold you in my arms, then the divine pleasures of your love would needs permeate my soul to the degree possible for people on earth. What I would be willing to suffer thereafter has never been seen by human eyes. Indeed, a thousand deaths were too little.... If you, Lord, can bear it, let me long pursue you in yearning. (111 23)

At the end of her life in Helfta, in the context of a meditation on the seven penitential psalms in which she reflects on death, she writes:

If we were to think of this hour often, all our pride would sink to the ground, as he [God] shall then reveal his glorious countenance to us. Then my soul shall have its favorite pastime. What I now painfully long for can never happen on earth as my heart would wish it. (VII 35)

What remains in the heart to the end is the strength to yearn longingly. Hence she begs her Lord in the same passage to "cover me with the mantle of your long-cherished desire."

3. The Power and Impotence of the Heart

Up to now we have seen that it is only by accepting God's love that the soul is empowered because in opening itself to the unfathomable ground of God, the imperilment of one's own heart is exposed. It is primarily the superior power of God's love which causes inexpressible suffering: "Bright love of playful flood ...causes [the heart] to die without death" (111 13). The agonies of this love are compared in detail with the passion of Christ, with the result that devotion to the passion turns into a mysticism of suffering in which pain loses its bitter quality as one concentrates on following Christ and on his suffering as redemption and reparation-all the more so when the heart itself is affected:

She is pierced in the side by a blind man
With a sweet spear of innocent love.
From her heart flows forth many a holy teaching. (III 10)⁵

5 Cf. also my detailed study of this theme: "'Frau Pein, ihr seid mein nachstes Kleid.' Zur Leidensmystik im Fließenden Licht der Gottheit der Mechthild von Magdeburg," Die dunkle Nacht der Sinne, ed. Gotthart Fuchs (Dusseldorf, 1989), 63-107.

The power and authority of this teaching here does not derive from book-learning. Rather, her "teaching" flows forth from the capacity of her heart for suffering, which God has totally consigned to himself. This remains a mystery to the speculative intellect. For this reason she later distances herself from her theologically-schooled fellow nuns in Helfta.⁶ Earthly wisdom is contrasted with supernatural, heavenly wisdom. Its preeminence is stressed further by a vision of Christ in VI 24. In a vision Mechthild sees the bloody wound in the heart of Jesus and is instructed that divine blood had to be shed if we were to be saved.

All suffering and humiliation are just a knocking at the gate of heaven up to the time when my heart's blood poured onto this earth. Only then was heaven opened. (VI 24)'

This vision explains that the blood from the heart of Christ, taken as his whole suffering during the passion, calls out for all times on behalf of humankind, because of its own weakness, to the mercy of the Father. In this redemptive suffering all human suffering is subsumed. Christ does not free Mechthild from her suffering, but rather strengthens her in her imitation of him as a kind of overflowing of love, as suffering in reparation with the promise of final glory, of which she experiences a foretaste as the assurance of future glory. From the tension caused by this yearning hope, strength of heart increases and can thus say: "Lovely love with guileless gift blots out the surly heart's complaint" (III 13).

According to Mechthild's words, an unsuspectedly strong power grows in the heart so that "a person retains a heart alien to all earthly things, so alien that, if a person loses earthly things, his heart becomes buoyant and his soul unfettered" (VI 4).

Expanding on such a high degree of detachment-one is reminded of the teaching of Meister Eckhart-she continues:

No one possesses the whole of heaven in his heart but he alone who has removed himself from all consolation and all favors in this world....And yet God cannot restrain himself-and we cannot do without it-from giving us his abundance and his favor. (VI 20)

Despite all her joy in suffering, and in view of human frailty, her trust in God's mercy carries the day. It is so great that even human weakness, when it is the only possibility, is brought before God's countenance and serves even in this form as a song of praise:

The impotence of the heart rings in song so beautifully before God
That God loves the notes
That sing deep in the heart....
Then God's sweet gift shall flow into their hearts. (VII 36)

There are, however, opposing powers constantly at work that can distract the human heart from its destiny, and can pull it down and entangle it in purely finite goals. Suggestions whispered by the devil (under the seductive guise of total surrender as a sign of holiness), where it is a question of keeping within bounds and of being chaste, cannot shake a heart that has been steeled in suffering and thus possesses the power of discernment. In a dialogue with the devil, in response to his suggestions, she says:

If I were to tell everyone the secrets of my heart, things would be quite nice for me in the short term. But then you would intently strive to make the fun end badly. You would do this so that I might fall into doubt, sadness, unbelief, impurity, and thereafter into everlasting anguish. Another reason you are doing this is so that I might imagine that you come to me thus because I am so holy. (IV 2)

Out of the same certainty of her heart she responds:

In every movement of my heart,
In every bit of knowledge of my senses,
And in the whole nobility of my soul,
I could never find anything else
But that it is diabolical that one commit a sin. (V 16)

For out of Lucifer flows "ceaselessly from his fiery heart.. all sin and shame." She likewise recognizes that suffering "is born of Lucifer's heart" (IV 12). And the deepest pit of hell, duplicity, "is begotten in Lucifer's heart" (11 26). She fights on against all these destructive powers. Her chief concern is peace of heart, but not at any price. The "holiest peace of heart... comes from keeping one's integrity in all that one does" (V 22). Truth comes before any fraudulent peace. Because Mechthild takes no pride in her being divinely favored and admits that she displays self-effacement again and again in spite of her experiences of God, she says:

I dare not, alas, claim credit
For everything that I say about love.
It is God, rather, who is thereby reaching out
To all those chosen in his heart. (IV 19)

When Mechthild speaks here of chosen hearts as a parallel or allusion to the chosen "noble hearts" of courtly poetry, which foster courtly love in a special way in a culture of the heart, then the nobility which she claims for the soul derives, for her, from a divine origin. This is perceived in the depths of the heart when all of one's own activity there ceases. She only speaks of it with great reserve: "Divine sweetness is enjoyed in the solitude of the heart" (VI 2).

The solitude or desert wilderness of the heart points, by way of an image, to the inaccessible, secluded location of a doublefaceted experience of God. Terrifying in his infinite remoteness, emptiness, and immensity, God outdoes himself by bringing joy through his nearness. Thus she says: "Mary Magdalene, I live with you in the desert wilderness, because all things are foreign to me except God alone" \(11 24\).' Nearness of God surpasses all human consolation, leaving it far behind. God alone suffices. And yet words fail her in her blessed state:

The voice of love and the melody of the heart must be left unrendered,
For they can be captured by no merely human hand! (II 25)

Ultimately Mechthild forswears happiness with God for the sake of more genuine praise, wishing nothing more for herself. And thus, beset by the terrors of the dark night of God's remoteness and bereft of all consolation amid attacks of disbelief, she experiences how suddenly, as though through a miracle, bitter "gall has become honey for the palate of my soul" \(IV 12\) .9 In this highly dramatized dialogue of declaration and response Mechthild anticipates succinctly the central themes of the Spanish mysticism of Teresa of Avila and John of the Cross. Repeatedly she speaks of the various degrees of purification as a precondition for grasping God more profoundly, as the fruit of a higher level of love, in the same way as does Richard of St. Victor: "God bestows vision in proportion to love."

The final purification in the night of the senses and the intellect is described tersely and penetratingly in VI 12, as John of the Cross will develop it later in detail in the night canticles of his poetic theology. Thus Mechthild is an early classic witness for the human heart struggling with the love of God that consumes everything and demands all human energies. She experiences this struggle and all its consequences, be it the increase in her own capacity for suffering as the noblest form of praise and gratitude, or in courageously speaking prophetically to her times.

Because of the demanding nature of its language and content, it is consequently a great service Frank Tobin has performed in making this profound book accessible in its totality to the English-speaking world, for the first time with a solid edition of the original as the textual base. A commanding and fascinating female figure of the thirteenth century is thereby given the opportunity to speak. Alongside the manifestly intimate character of her writing, and going beyond what has relevance for her personal life, she assigns to her book a public function. Everything was done solely "for God's honor" and "for the book's teaching."

INTRODUCTION

1. The Beguines

Mechthild of Magdeburg (c. 1208-c. 1282/94), the author of The Flowing Light of the Godhead offered here in translation, lived most of her life as a beguine; and even though it would be taking matters to extremes to claim a type of spirituality specific to beguines,¹ a brief examination of their way of life, ideals, and the social situation in which the movement arose, flourished, and declined can contribute much to our understanding and appreciation of her book.² Beguines were women who led lives of voluntary poverty, chastity, and religious devotion without joining an approved religious order. The movement began in the larger towns of the Low Countries during the twelfth century and spread south as far as Cologne and Strassburg, and also to the German-speaking East. It flourished from about 1220 to 1318 and gradually died out because of widespread ecclesiastical opposition. In Mechthild's time in Germany beguines usually lived in a communal house, sustaining themselves through support from their families, gifts, and work. Typical forms of work were nursing, weaving, spinning, embroidery, preparing the dead for burial, and housework for others.

The reasons motivating women to undertake this way of life seem to be the same as those contributing to the founding of the Franciscan and Dominican orders about the same time: the wish to return to the ideals of early Christianity and imitate more closely the lives of the apostles. Beguines strove to be unworldly while living in the world. Spending much time in prayer, both communal and private, attending mass and other church services, frequenting the sacraments, practicing moderate asceticism, and performing menial work, with nothing to call their own-not even themselves-they desired only to find favor with their divine Bridegroom and sought to elevate those around them more by leading exemplary apostolic Christian lives than by teaching.

Beguine houses usually fell under the jurisdiction of the local parish priest, but because of the similarities in mode of life and ideals beguines were often drawn into close contact with nearby Franciscan or Dominican communities. In contrast to earlier religious orders, they, like the beguines, settled in towns in order to carry out their apostolic work. From the beginning the beguines met with criticism from some quarters because they belonged to no ecclesiastically approved order and, hence, supervision over them was minimal. Also, because many beguine communities were developing into centers of mysticism and were providing northern Europe with its first mystical writings in the vernacular, questions of religious orthodoxy among them soon arose. This opposition to the beguines and the reasons for it are worth noting because the atmosphere thus created provides an essential part of the context in which Mechthild was writing. In composing her book Mechthild was faced with addressing the following two questions: What gave her, a woman with no formal education or special training in theology and belonging to no approved order, the right to speak out on theological matters and to criticize sharply the clergy, even its most prominent members? And by whose authority did she write, or why should she have expected her words to be taken seriously?

Though opposition to the beguines was in evidence from the beginning among those who viewed all change with suspicion, early papal pronouncements encouraged the movement. Pope Honorius III expressed approval of communities of pious women of northern continental Europe, and Pope Gregory IX's bull Gloriam virginalem extended papal protection to the "chaste virgins of Teutonia," which probably meant both those in Germany and those in the German-speaking parts of the Low Countries. Soon, however, those voicing criticism gained strength. Besides the misgivings arising from beguines not being members of an approved order, they were often accused of hypocrisy and laziness because, it was said, they lived on alms and refused to work. There were also charges that false piety cloaked lives of gross sensuality.

In the course of the thirteenth century several synods in Germany dealt with matters relating to beguines and passed decrees that forbade their wandering about and required them to live in communal houses, to work to support themselves, and to obey their parish priests; at two synods held late in Mechthild's life or shortly afterward (Trier, 1277, and Eichstatt, 1284) beguines were warned against the preaching of false doctrine. Of special interest for our purposes is a synod held in Magdeburg in 1261, when Mechthild was well along in her writing and parts of her book were no doubt already in circulation.³ The synod, presided over by Archbishop Rupert, declared that beguines should, like other parishioners, obey their parish priests or be excommunicated.⁴

Not until well after Mechthild's death, however, did the forces opposed to beguines carry the day and deal serious blows to the vitality of the movement. In 1312 the Council of Vienne called for an inquisitional investigation of beguines and beghardstheir male counterparts-in Germany. It also decreed that beguine communities were to be dissolved and that such organizations should be permanently forbidden, but it left open the possibility for truly faithful women to live lives of penance and humility in common. Because of the decrees of the Council of Vienne and the inconsistent policies of the popes toward beguines, the movement declined, though some communities continued in the Low Countries and the Rhineland until quite recently. During the early decades of the fourteenth century most beguine communities in Germany resolved their precarious position by embracing the rule of an established order (Franciscan, Dominican, or Cistercian) and lived much as they had before, but under the guidance and supervision that these orders provided.

2. Mechthild's Life

The few facts we have about Mechthild's life come from her own writings, from the Latin translation of the FL (the Lux divinitatis), and from the forewords to them written anonymously. Scholars have generally accepted this information as trustworthy, and from it the following picture emerges.' Mechthild was born about 1208 into a noble family. Just what level of nobility, however, is a matter of conjecture and dispute. Schmidt places the family home within the archdiocese of Magdeburg.' Neumann describes her birthplace as the western Middlemarch.' The most convincing evidence for her being well born is the obvious familiarity her book shows with life in the castle and with courtly culture, especially courtly literature. Mechthild makes the point more than once that she is unlearned; that is, that she knows little Latin and has had no formal training in theology, which might invest her words with religious authority; but much of her writing shows a detailed knowledge of both the forms and content of the literature of the German high courtly period drawing to a close during her youth.

At the age of twelve, she tells us, she was "greeted" by the Holy Spirit-her expression for a special outpouring of divine favor and this continued daily for over three decades, well into the time when she was writing the FL. About 1230, as a young woman in her early twenties, she left the comforts of home to take up the life of a beguine in the not-too-distant town of Magdeburg, where she knew but one person; and even this one friendship she considered a spiritual liability, since she feared that, because of it, God might withdraw the spiritual divine love and contempt of the world that she sought (IV 2).

About 1250, in her forties, she revealed the extraordinary spiritual favors she has been experiencing to her confessor, probably the Dominican Heinrich of Halle. He urged her to continue her present way of life in cheerful confidence, and he commanded her to write the book "out of God's heart and mouth" (IV2).$ During the next ten years Mechthild completed the first five books of the FL, after which she may have originally considered her task completed. However, sometime during the following ten years (1260-70) she wrote Book VI, and still later composed Book VII.

Concerning the external details of Mechthild's life as a beguine in Magdeburg we know very little. We assume she lived in a house of beguines, and there is some evidence that she was, for a time, the superior of the community. She suffered through periods of sickness and reacted strongly to criticism of and threats against her book. She may have left Magdeburg occasionally because of sickness or hostility and returned to her relatives. But it is clear that she could count many supporters as well as detractors. The Lux divinitatis, the Latin translation of the first six books of the FL, reports that Baldwin, Mechthild's brother, was accepted into the Dominican order because of the merits of his sister.' Indeed, it was from the Order of Preachers, which she frequently singles out for special praise, that she seems to have derived much of her support.

It was in the Cistercian community at Helfta, however, that Mechthild spent her final years and wrote the seventh and final book of the FL. Under the guidance of its second abbess, Gertrud of Hackeborn (1250-91), Helfta was becoming known for its piety and learning. Here Mechthild retreated about 1270. There are signs that she felt ill at ease in this new environment, surrounded by women of whom many had enjoyed an education far superior to hers and could read and write Latin. This gave them direct access to the spiritual and theological traditions that Mechthild could only learn of secondhand. And yet these same nuns esteemed her and sought out her advice in spiritual matters (VII 21).

Two of these nuns themselves produced mystical texts that show clearly the influence of the FL. The first of these, The Book of Special Grace (Liber specialis gratiae), written down by two nuns after 1291, contains the revelations of Mechthild of Hackeborn (+1298 or 1299), sister of the aforementioned abbess. In the second book, known as The Herald of Divine Love (Legatus divinae pietatis), Gertrud of Helfta, "the Great" (+1301 or 1302), wrote an account of her interior life. Because these writings were in Latin, they enjoyed a wider readership than the FL and continued to be influential long after Mechthild of Magdeburg's vernacular work had disappeared, aside from anonymous bits that were here and there subsumed into manuals of piety. Here at Helfta, feeble and blind, which necessitated that she dictate the final chapters of Book VII, Mechthild finished out her life. The year of her death is uncertain-either about 1282 or about 1294.

3. The Flowing Light of the Godhead: a History of the Text

Since a manuscript of the FL was discovered in 1861 and became an object of scholarly investigation, the relationship of the text, as we have it, to the original document that Mechthild actually authored has been the object of much serious scholarship and debate. Understanding the problems and the degree to which they have been resolved is important for an intelligent reading of the text. The matter is perhaps best approached chronologically.

Mechthild originally wrote her book in Middle Low German, whereby Middle refers to the period in which the language was spoken and written-roughly 1050-1450-and Low refers to its geographical range-northern Germany.¹⁰ This original version has been lost, and there seems to be little hope of its recovery. Concerning this lost version, scholars have raised the question of how great a part Heinrich of Halle, Mechthild's confessor and spiritual advisor, played in its genesis. Heinrich, identified as lector" at the Dominican house in Ruppin after 1261 and member of the new Dominican community in Halle after about 1270, edited the first six books of the FL. He preceded Mechthild in death and seems to have had no influence on Book VII. Early scholarship gave him an important role in the genesis of Mechthild's book, claiming that he had altered greatly the content, style, and order of the text. More recently, Neumann has produced convincing evidence to show that Heinrich's influence on Mechthild's writing was minimal: that he confined himself to dividing the text into chapters while respecting Mechthild both as a person chosen by God to receive and impart special spiritual favors and as a talented writer. Some have suggested that Heinrich may have occasionally influenced the wording of sections dealing with difficult theological matters, where an orthodox formulation was a primary concern.' In general, however, there is now prevailing agreement that Heinrich let Mechthild's text speak for itself. And Neumann thinks there is good reason to believe that Mechthild herself participated in the editing process." just who is responsible for the chapter headings (which in the version we have are, with some inconsistencies, listed both at the beginning of each book and placed at the beginning of each chapter) is difficult to say. Because they differ in style from the rest of the text, they are probably not the work of Mechthild herself. Because they are at times misleading or less than apt, it is unlikely that they are Heinrich's doing. The headings of Book VII, because they differ markedly in style from those of the earlier books, must be attributed to sources other than the writer of the chapter headings of the first six books. Possibly they are the work of nuns at Helfta.

Books I through VI of the FL were translated into Latin, probably by two or more Dominicans in Halle shortly after Mechthild's death but, in any case, before 1298. The translators were apparently unaware of Book VII, composed at Helfta. This Latin version, the Lux divinitatis, changes the original order of the text, grouping material according to subject matter. The translators have toned down Mechthild's criticism of the clergy and some of her erotic imagery, and they occasionally offer an interpretation rather than a translation of a phrase or a sentence in the original. Otherwise, they demonstrate a solid understanding of the text and competence in translating it. The Latin translation is helpful in determining the meaning of Mechthild's occasionally obscure phrasing and serves as a welcome aid in correcting obvious corruptions in the vernacular version we possess.

What, then, in the absence of the original, is the nature of this surviving vernacular version, and what is its relationship to Mechthild's text? Somehow, a copy of Mechthild's work in the original Middle Low German¹⁴ fell into the hands of a secular priest in Basel named Heinrich of Nordlingen, confessor and spiritual advisor in many convents nearby. He supported mystical spirituality, was in contact with the Dominican John Tattler and possibly with Henry Suso as well, and corresponded with several mystically favored nuns. As we learn from a letter he wrote to the Dominican nun Margaret Ebner, to whom he is sending a copy of the FL, he was greatly moved by Mechthild's writing but, coming as he did from Bavaria and having worked first in Franconia and then in Swiss Basel, he found the German so strange that he realized it would have to be recast in Middle High German, the language of the German-speaking South, if it were to be read in that region with profit. Whether Heinrich did much of the translating himself or whether he delegated it to others in his circle in Basel, the task took two years. It is upon this version, existing in only one complete manuscript (ms E), discovered in 1861 in the library of the Benedictine monastery in Einsiedeln, Switzerland, that we must rely for access to Mechthild's lost original.

How close is this Middle High German version to the FL as it left Mechthild's hands? And is it possible to reconstruct the original from this version? To begin with the second question: Because the language of the area around Magdeburg was unstable at the time-admitting influences from several German dialects and forming no consistent internal linguistic unity-and hence, from the point of view of the present, unpredictable, scholars have never seriously considered attempting a full-scale reconstruction. This being said and despite Heinrich of Nordlingen's bafflement, one should not exaggerate the dissimilarities between these forms of medieval German. They are not different languages but rather different dialects of the same basic language and share to a large extent the same vocabulary. Most of the differences are in spelling and sound, the consequences of the second consonant shift. This and Mechthild's frequent use of rhyme enables philologists to ascertain the probable original forms of many words. Thus, though ms E must remain the basis for constructing a critical text-and one that must remain Middle High German-this is no cause for despair. As Neumann in his early study of ms E reassures us, the version originating in Basel shows that great pains were taken to render its source accurately." The translators were aided, he maintains, by the nature of Mechthild's language and thought, which transcends dialect and geography. Mechthild's modes of expression are often taken from the knightly-courtly world. The ideals and concepts of this world, drawn from a class culture spread throughout Europe, changed very little when transferred from a north German to a south German dialect. Neumann considers it an overstatement to call the Basel version a translation of its source. It is, rather, merely a "transplanting" or "transferring."

Until quite recently all work on Mechthild and all translations of the FL were based on an edition of ms E done by Gall Morel, the Benedictine librarian at Einsiedeln, and completed in 1869. This edition was reprinted three times (1963, 1976, and 1980) despite its many shortcomings. The desperate lack of a critical edition was finally ended with the publication of Hans Neumann's edition in 1990 (Vol. 1: Text) and 1993 (Vol. 2: Investigations), brought to completion by Gisela Vollmann-Profe. Neumann corrected the many misreadings of Morel's edition and made other emendations based on manuscripts containing fragments of the FL found since the publication of the Morel edition, on comparisons with the Lux divinitatis, and on the wealth of scholarship on Mechthild that has appeared during the past 130 years, to which Neumann himself is, perhaps, the foremost contributor." The translation presented here is the first in English based on the new critical edition.

4. The Flowing Light of the Godhead as literature

The FL has often been described as a unique document with no obvious antecedents or descendants whose singularity defeats all attempts to categorize it. The frequent medieval term for similar texts is revelationes (revelations) ; but if we take the term seriously, or a related description sometimes applied to it in German: Visionsbuch or Visionenbuch (visionary book or book of visions), we seem to be excluding much of the content of the FL from our definition. Many chapters deal with revelatory material only by the widest stretch of the imagination." Mechthild's first direct description of something she says she experienced in a vision (as opposed to ecstasy) does not occur until 11 3. Thus, categorization of her book remains a problem.

Compared to other mystical and religious writings in the vernacular, Mechthild's efforts are remarkable for how literary they are. Mechthild is not alone in turning her experiences into literature. One might well have to admit, for example, that Hadewijch writes more consistently at a high poetic level. What distinguishes Mechthild's book from the others is the variety of genres-literary as well as those less literary in nature-that she employs in formulating her thoughts. Most visionary writers of her time and in the generations after her seem to be passive in formulating their experiences. They wish simply and unadornedly to report what they have seen and heard, risking no changes that might contaminate the experience. Mechthild, on the contrary, seems to consider the experience as raw material that needs to be reflected upon, formed, and fashioned before it can become part of her book.

In her search for suitable forms she ranges far and wide, employing most genres available to an author of her time. Their number and variety are remarkable. Among the studies devoted to this, that of Wolfgang Mohr has been the best received.' His list spans the spectrum, from the genres and sub-genres of courtly literature to forms originating in folk culture and, of course, many forms drawn from religious sources. Simplifying Mohr's list, one can note the following major forms in the FL: 1. Religious genres: the vision," hymn, sermon, spiritual instruction and tract, prayer, liturgy, litany, and prophetic literature. 2. Courtly genres: courtly-love poetry, allegorical dialogue, dialogue between the lovers, the messenger's song (Botenlied), and the exchange (Wechsel). 3. Other genres: autobiography, drama, epigrammatic poetry and wisdom literature, anecdote, letter, parody, nursery rhyme, and polemics.

While it would be rash to assume on the part of Mechthild in the case of each chapter a conscious effort to exploit a well-established genre, the presence of a wealth of traditional forms, which is the distinguishing characteristic of the FL, can hardly be accidental. Intentionally or not, Mechthild, through her extensive absorption of the many kinds of writing to which she was exposed, wrote a book whose paradoxical nature is that its unity consists, in part, in its diversity of forms.

Mechthild's imagery is rich and varied. As reflected in the book's divinely received title, images of flowing and light abound. Flowing is often an outpouring from God, and dazzling light radiates forth from God and the angels, surrounding the souls of the blessed. Other images point ahead to Meister Eckhart; for example, her play with iht (something) and niht (nothing), or her mention of the wiiestenunge (the desert). She takes her metaphors from simple things, such as wine, a sphere, the dew, or a mountain.

In her visions Mechthild is able to create a vivid chart of supernatural geography: heaven (111 1), hell (111 21), purgatory (11 8), and paradise (VII 57). She puts upon a stage before us the drama of the end of time, as the forces of good and evil enter their final struggle (IV 27). Through lively dialogue she makes the devils come alive (IV 2 and VII 39). It is this cosmic dimension of many of her visions that distinguishes Mechthild from the women visionaries to follow, who confine themselves to reporting visionary experiences of a personal and private world. Mechthild, too, describes many visions private and intimate in nature. She is, however, also able to put before our eyes scenes of great significance for the history of salvation; and she paints such scenes from a privileged point of view.

Besides allegorical dialogues, such as ones between Love and the soul (I 2 and 11 24) and between the soul and the senses (I 44), Mechthild, in the tradition of the bestiary, creates an allegorical animal that represents the truly spiritual person (IV 18). She also creates an allegorical house in which she dwells (VII 48), an allegorical convent (VII 36), and the allegorical crown Christ shall wear in heaven after the Last Judgment (VII 1). Especially striking in her depictions, whether meant literally or metaphorically, is the strong sense of order she evokes and how she expresses the worth of someone-whether angel, saint, or damned soul-by the place she assigns each in the space she creates.

5. The Flowing Light of the Godhead as an Expression of Mysticism

One could argue that the above heading is misleading if the following remarks are intended to address the religious content of the FL in its totality, and not just certain parts that are by general consensus mystical. Certainly there are sections of the book in which the subject matter and its treatment are so lacking in mystical dimensions that the term cannot be appropriately applied to the book as a whole. Consider, for example, the chapters in which Mechthild offers practical advice to religious superiors (VI 1) and canons (VI 2), or the chapter, enlightened perhaps at the time but an embarrassment to a present-day admirer of Mechthild, in which she counsels how one should conduct oneself in dealing with Jews (IV 11). In spite of this justifiable objection, I would like to retain the term because, once the term is understood as it is intended, I think it well describes the spirit in which the FL was composed.

If one thinks, as I do, that a most unfortunate aspect of many studies on mysticism has been the focus on it as an experience, and if one then chooses, with Bernard McGinn, the working definition of mysticism as a direct or immediate consciousness or awareness of the presence of God, then the term mystical seems apt to describe the whole FL.²¹ It is Mechthild's conviction that she has been favored with a special consciousness of God's presence that permeates the book and authorizes her. Without it she could not be its author. Without it she would have no authority to write about spiritual matters, whether the longing the divine Lover and the beloved soul feel for each other or a vision depicting the torments of the damned. As her description of God's greeting makes clear (1 2), this heightened awareness of God's presence is not and cannot be a lasting or constant state. Its impact, however, creates in Mechthild the ever-present conviction that she is divinely empowered to teach and to criticize; and this conviction informs not only the lyrical descriptions of her moments of special favor and the writing down of her visions, but every last bit of the book, even, or especially, when Mechthild finds writing a burden from which she would gladly be released.

Mechthild develops no system of theology or spiritual teaching of her own that one can easily summarize, though she does express a few thoughts that have a ring of originality. Her strengths lie elsewhere-in her ability to describe lyrically the relationship of God and the soul, or to depict vividly the heavenly heights or the infernal depths. Because, however, the FL is divided into so many discrete books and chapters with no immediately recognizable principle of organization, a brief presentation of some of her characteristic thoughts or themes is offered here to provide initial orientation.

Love is the force that compels Mechthild to write, and love is what determines the hierarchy of values in her world. Especially in the early books Mechthild's way of describing love is strongly lyrical. Chapters 1 and 2 of Book I are two of her poetically best compositions. They both set the lyrical tone and introduce us to the dominant theme of divine love-both God's love for the soul and the soul's for God. While God's favor cannot be earned or effected by human actions, one can remove the obstacles to God's action in the soul by getting beyond oneself (iuberkommen) and by having become nothing (ze nihte worden, I 2).

In I 1 Mechthild creates a dialogue between Love and the soul to illustrate how the soul is to empty herself. The soul complains that Love has taken everything from her: childhood, youth, wealth, friends, relatives, honor, and even health, consuming her flesh and blood. Love counters by listing what the soul has received in return: heavenly freedom, virtue, spiritual riches, knowledge; and she has been purified and drawn into God. When the soul continues to complain, Love offers itself to her and the soul feels abundantly recompensed.

In Chapter 2 Mechthild presents us with a poetically charged description of the divine "greeting," which she first experienced in her twelfth year and which, at the time of her writing IV 2, had continued for more than thirty-one years. So overwhelming has this experience been that it has made even major venial sins impossible. Here, at the outset of her book, she tries to recreate this defining experience of God's favor in words and to describe the heights to which this greeting lets her soar. These first two chapters set the tone for the lyricism of love that continues intermittently throughout.

Mechthild conceives of God, the object of her love, in various ways. God is the Emperor of the universe and is vitally present in creation, being "all things in all things" (11 19). God is three persons in one nature, with a rich interior life whose intimate conversations Mechthild is allowed to overhear (111 9). Most frequently, however, God appears as the human Lover and divine Bridegroom, passionately seeking spiritual union with the soul. To express the mutual love binding God and the soul, Mechthild often relies on two traditions: the lyric poetry of courtly love and the Song of Solomon. (Bernard of Clairvaux's treatment of this biblical text in his masterpiece on mystical love, the Sermons on the Song of Songs, reached Mechthild at least secondhand and unmistakably influenced her.) If mysticism implies union of the soul with God, then we must recognize that for Mechthild, as for her two principal sources, love's union consists as much or more in the yearning the lovers feel and express for each other as in fulfillment and oneness achieved. For the mystical beloved on earth, separation is as essential to love as union.

For Mechthild, two important qualities of the soul's love for God are that it should be bound and knowing love. Unbound love dwells in the senses and has not climbed to the soul. Unbound love is changeable and can lead to false love, as with David and Solomon. They did not sink beneath all creatures, nor were they wounded by love's power. Bound love transcends the senses and denies the body its will. In it the soul listens for the divine voice, sees the divine light, and seeks the divine will. Whoever is touched by bound love cannot fall into serious sin (11 24).

The soul's love for God must also be based on knowledge, but this seems to be personal knowledge of the divine Lover rather than the knowledge of the schools. Through the divine greeting Mechthild has this knowledge, and upon it her love rests secure. It cannot be taken from her by the "blind holy ones who love and do not know" (I 2). In I 21 Mechthild elaborates on the nature of the love she has sought and found:

Love without knowledge is as darkness to the wise soul.
Knowledge without its fruition she likens to the pains of hell.
Fruition short of death she cannot lament enough.

Love, knowledge, fruition, and death. We grasp the first three terms easily, but how are we to understand death? Mechthild's medieval audience would have had no difficulty understanding her. Love and death are linked both in religious and courtly traditions, and Mechthild several times exploits the interplay between these concepts already bound together in her cultural and spiritual environment. In a tradition going back to Paul, Christians are exhorted to die to themselves and to the world in order to rise again with and in Christ.²² Certainly such Pauline thoughts would occur to Mechthild's audience when she says: "Nothing tastes good to me but God alone; I am wondrously dead" (IV 12). Later Christian writers, for example Richard of St. Victor, with whose thought Mechthild was familiar, also speak of love of God causing a kind of death in the soul.²³

In courtly literature the closeness of love and death is a frequent theme. It is in the guise of a minnesinger that Mechthild presents herself when she writes:

I would willingly die of love
If it could happen to me. (II 2)

And again, this time drawing both on spiritual and courtly traditions: "I long to love him to the death, boundlessly and without ceasing. Be happy, my soul, for your Life has died for love of you. Love him so fiercely that you could die for him" (I 28).

Nowhere in medieval literature, however, is the bond between love and death so pivotal as in the story of Tristan and Isolde. In Gottfried of Strassburg's unsurpassed version, the prologue announces it as an underlying motif, using an oxymoron to express the paradox at the center of the lovers' all-enveloping love: "its dear life, its sorrowful death, its dear death, its sorrowful life."²⁴ And when Tristan is told that the love potion that is causing his all-consuming love for Isolde will be the death of him, he replies that "it has poisoned me most sweetly.... If my adorable Isolde were to go on being the death of me in this fashion I would woo death everlasting!"²⁵ In their ecstasy of love they die, losing all sense of self, so lost are they in their union. It is this paradoxical meaning of death that Mechthild conjures up when she exclaims: "In this greeting I want to die living" (I 2). And it is again a Liebestod she has in mind when she says: "Love's death, a sweet distress" (I 30). Toward her life's end, longing for physical death and union with her Lover in heaven, she begs that she "might die of love in love" (VII 21).

The vehemence of her passion is often expressed in erotic images. In the dance with her Lover the soul hopes to "leap with abandon" before she comes "into the bed of love" where she shall "refresh" herself with her Lover. She wants to drink "undiluted wine" and go to her Lover as a "full-grown bride." When she enters the secret chamber, our Lord bids her: "Take off your clothes." For Nothing shall come between them:

Then a blessed stillness
That both desire comes over them.
He surrenders himself to her,
And she surrenders herself to him. (I 44)

We should be well aware, however, that Mechthild is far from confusing or commingling spiritual love with physical love. Such a thought readily occurs to us, steeped as we are in popular psychology. Mechthild makes it quite clear, however, that only the soul that has left everything and gone "beyond the influences of the flesh" is ready for the dance and the bridal bed. And the clothes she is commanded to strip from her are the virtues with which she has adorned herself (I 44). Mechthild's passion is a spiritual passion. The searing images of physical passion are just that: images.

Despite Mechthild's resolute commitment to spiritual love, her attitude toward her body is not simply one of grim opposition. True, she has her soul call her body a murderer (I 2), but one must note carefully the context of her remark. Having left the confines of her physical body to spend an idyllic hour in spiritual bliss within the Trinity, the soul returns, as well she must, to the harsh reality of her uneasy partnership with the body. Mechthild laces her description of their reunion with humor. Both are out of sorts, grumbling and reproaching each other. Humor is possible for Mechthild precisely because body and soul are not pitted against each other as equals in deadly combat. The soul that truly desires to soar in spiritual realms cannot be held captive by the body but is free to go to her Lover.

Ultimately, body and soul will be partners forever, completely reconciled. Later in life, when thoughts of death become more frequent, Mechthild imagines how she will speak to her body on the last day. Addressing it as her beloved, healed of all its woes, she invites it to rise up and receive its reward. In the past the soul depended on the body. In heaven the roles shall be reversed (VI 35).

As the book continues, we notice changes in tone and emphasis. Lyrical effusions of love's yearning and its fulfillment in rapturous greeting grow less frequent. More consideration is given to practical rules of a holy life, to criticism of the clergy, and to visions both cosmic and private. But her perception of her relationship to her divine Lover changes as well. The importance and perhaps the frequency of the greeting diminishes. In its place we find Mechthild speaking of "sinking humility" and "estrangement," ideas that she now views as essential to this relationship. In two chapters especially (IV 12 and V 4), she articulates the change in her situation and attitude.

If Mechthild had in the past concentrated her lyricism on celebrating the blissful heights of love, sinking humility allows her to explore and value another dimension of divine love. It "chases" the soul "up into heaven and drags her down again into the abyss." Only in experiencing all aspects of God's love can the soul attain maturity: "When she has thus ascended to those heights possible for her while she is still attached to the body and has sunk to the deepest point that she can find, then she is fully grown in virtue and holiness." Not only does the soul accept this "deepest point" as an integral part of her life, but she actively seeks it and "retreats from what God does to her out of love." Sinking humility compels her to compare herself to all other creatures and to conclude that every one of them is better than she. Finally, it brings her to the lowest spot "where she can go no further: under Lucifer's tail." Here she would ever remain to God's honor and be "adorned with the suffering of long waiting" as her only reward (V 4).

Paired with sinking humility is estrangement, which Mechthild describes for us in detail (IV 12). After the soul has rejected all earthly joys and comforts, God answers her wish to forgo spiritual elevation and leaves her among those in purgatory and among the damned. Asked by our Lord how long she wishes to remain there, the soul begs to be allowed to sink further. Soul and body, bereft of God's palpable presence, enter total darkness. Here the soul is assailed by doubts about the divine origin of all the favors previously experienced: If they had been from God, why would he now forsake her? The soul remains steadfast, relying on the memory of these favors. There follows "constant estrangement from God" that completely envelops the soul. Earlier the soul regarded God's absence as "anguish beyond human dying / And beyond the torments of hell" (II 2). Now she accepts and embraces it eagerly: "Welcome, very blessed Estrangement." In a transvaluation of values incomprehensible to reason and categorized as an abnormality by human science, the soul rejoices in its desolation, finding that "gall has become honey for the palate of my soul." When God wishes to cool the ardor of his love in her, the soul consents, but only "in such a way that it is good for you and not for me." To estrangement is added pain, but this only increases the soul's joy: "the deeper I sink, / The sweeter I drink" (IV 12).

This enigmatic disposition of the soul does not, however, seem to be the end of Mechthild's spiritual odyssey. As she continues to write, thoughts of union with God while on earth—even the paradoxical union through estrangement—recede and are replaced by a longing for death with its uninterrupted and everlasting union; and estrangement from God is not the last "divine favor" she is asked to accept. Since she has already renounced the world and God's affection, what, one might ask, remains for her to accomplish?

The last book of the FL, coupled with the circumstances in which its author wrote it, furnishes insights into what might be seen as Mechthild's final accomplishment. Her renunciation of God's favor and acceptance of estrangement from him were heroic; and that is, perhaps, precisely why this cannot be seen as the ideal and final disposition intended for the soul. In welcoming estrangement Mechthild is still the great soul whose interior life holds center stage in her own mind. At Helfta she is then required to give up much of what had been special about her and accept being ordinary. She must submit to the usual problems of advanced age and the blows to her basic human dignity this involves. Though she was willing throughout her life to seek and accept advice from those she respected, one can only conclude from her writings that she was fiercely and proudly independent. Yet she seeks admittance to the convent at Helfta and submits to its discipline. Though she feels some uneasiness there, both at being less educated than many of the sisters and at their tendency to regard her as a holy relic," she does her best to fit in and fulfill the community's expectations of her.²⁷ Infirm and close to the death she so longs for, she sees in a vision how the saints and devils gather for her final struggle and triumph. But it is not to be. She recovers and must accept living onweak, blind, and with nothing to look forward to but ordinary banal human suffering (VII 63).

Renouncing God's favors and rejoicing at estrangement from him had been a noble gesture because it was done freely and with full human vigor. Now she has no choice but to accept her demeaning dependence on others. She must renounce herself and "let go," as the mystics urge, but not in some special sense limited to God's special friends. Rather, she, the visionary, the ecstatic, God's special messenger to Holy Christianity, must relinquish control over herself, as those must do who are feeble and helpless.

To the extent that one dare judge in such matters, it seems that she was equal to the challenge of accepting her very ordinary human lot. In the next-to-last chapter she composes a prayer, poignant in its directness and simplicity, which expresses her acknowledgment of her helplessness and her reaction to it. She thanks God that he has taken everything from her—her ability to provide food and clothing for herself, her eyesight, the use of her hands, her strength—thus forcing her to rely on others to take care of her basic needs. She has nothing left to give but her gratitude, as she humbly accepts the help of others. God has even stripped from her the "strength of my heart," and she thanks him for serving her "with the hearts of others" (VII 64). Love, knowledge, fruition, death she had written years before (I 21). It is perhaps a changed and deepened understanding of all that this entails which informs the concluding parts of The Flowing Light of the Godhead.

6. A Note on the Translation

Translations are by nature inferior to the originals. This is especially true concerning texts with such literary richness as the FL possesses. It is incumbent upon the translator both to set priorities and to explain, when possible, what the translation fails to accomplish. In a text such as the FL, which exploits the devices and conventions of literature but which, in fact, is trying to achieve a supra-literary goal, I have felt compelled to make content—the sense of what Mechthild is saying—the primary concern, even when this involves failing to reproduce adequately the form into which Mechthild casts her meaning. I have occasionally added some explanatory notes regarding literary forms and devices to help the reader become aware of what the translation has failed to accomplish. One pervasive aspect of Mechthild's style, however, which I have not been able to approximate in the translation, needs a more elaborate explanation than can be achieved in notes to individual passages. This is her peculiar conception and use of a literary region between prose and verse.

As the critical edition points out, Morel's edition, by how it made the text appear on the page, divided Mechthild's writing sharply into prose and verse, as though she were following the tradition of prosimetrum, as found, say, in Boethius's Consolations of Philosophy.²⁸ Actually, Mechthild's style is much more differentiated, and she delights especially in transitional forms between prose and verse. The device she employs to create this diversity is colon rhyme; that is, units shorter than a sentence that are bound together by rhyme. Sometimes this device is used loosely and spread out over a section of text in such a way that it is scarcely noticeable. Frequently then, at the close of a chapter, Mechthild will intensify its use, so that it occurs almost without interruption over several lines of text. Before illustrating this through examples, we must also examine Mechthild's concept of rhyme, because it is quite foreign to modern sensibilities. More frequent than rhyme as it is normally understood—as the correspondence of vowel and consonant sounds at the end of a word (can-man; token-broken) — are occurrences of assonance or vowel rhyme, where only the vowels correspond (can-fat; token-over) .²⁹The following examples with their translations are offered to clarify:

II 15:
Swelch mensche wirt zu einer stunt von warer minne reht wunt , der wirt niemer me wol gesund , er enküsse noch den selben munt , von dem sin sel ist worden wunt .	Whoever at some point Is seriously wounded by true love Will never become healthy again, Unless he kisses the same mouth By which his soul was wounded.
I 10:
Swelch moensch die welt übersiget und sime lichamen allen unnützen willen benimet und den túvel überwindet das ist die sele, die got minnet . Tuot ir die welt einen stos , da von lidet si kleine not ; tuot ir das fleisch einen wank , da von wirt der geist nút krank ; tuot ir der túvel einen bih , des ahtet die sele aber niht . Si minnet und si minnet und si kan anders nit beginnen .	Whoever conquers the world And takes from his body all useless desires, And overcomes the devil, This is the soul that loves God. If the world gives her a shove, She does not suffer much. If the flesh gives her a jolt, The spirit will not get sick from it. If the devil gives her a push, The soul pays no heed. She loves And she loves (keep on loving), and she does not know how to do otherwise.

Ein bruoder in der predier orden der was so sere beswert mit einem guoten ambachte in der gehorsami, als vil maniger ist, das im entgieng sein jugentlichú maht und verlor sine menlichen kraft; doch tet er es mit guotem willen. A brother in the Order of Preachers was so weighed down by an important office accepted under obedience—as happens to many—that his youthful vigor was drained from him and he lost his natural strength; yet he still carried on with good intentions. So I begged our Lord that he might turn his favor in that direction. Our Lord instructed me and said: “I have heard and seen all the distress he is suffering, and what he reads and writes. All this shall become the following song of love praising me before my eternal court: Great God, eternal, mighty, marvelous, alleluia. And I shall lift up his head and increase all his might, just as I have done for you—not just by nature, but rather even more by grace.”

These three examples give the reader some idea of the diverse ways in which Mechthild employs different kinds of rhyme. The first example approximates closely a modern conception of rhyming verse, and the content is appropriate to the lyric form as well. The second example shows a predominance of assonance or vowel rhyme with an occurrence of conventional rhyme and an example of identical rhyme (minnet-minnet) thrown in for good measure. Again the linguistic structure and the content seem closer to verse than prose. In such cases I have, as here, usually cast the passage into verse-like lines without attempting to recreate the rhyme or assonance of the original. In like manner, I have not been overly concerned to reproduce the rhythms of the original, which are, in any case, most often irregular.

The third example contains a type of writing quite frequent in the FL. The passage begins as straight prose with no adornment of rhyme or assonance. The content, too, seems best suited to be expressed in prose. Then assonance sets in, punctuating the text at irregular intervals but in no way providing a verse-like structure for the whole. I have generally translated such passages into English prose. Also, following the practice of the critical edition and Schmidt in her translation, I have rendered several passages arguably more verse-like than prose-like in the original as prose. Hence, in such cases, there is no indication in the translation of this aspect of the original.

A few other matters regarding the translation need mentioning. Though generally of high quality, Mechthild's writing is uneven, and there are passages in the FL that could be improved upon. I have courageously resisted the temptation to improve her phrasing; neither have I altered anything aside from adding notes for the sake of clarity, unless the lack of clarity was rooted in syntactical differences in the languages themselves.

At times Mechthild's striving for rhyme or assonance seems to affect content negatively. So be it. I mention it here only because the reader has no way of knowing, especially in those passages rendered as prose, that rhyme or assonance may be affecting content. Sometimes, though rarely, an image will sound strange to the modern ear. The word nostrils is indeed uncommon in lyric poetry, but Mechthild uses it (IV 3). And when the divine Lover invites his beloved to sing to him, Mechthild has her reply: “Alas, my dear Lover, I am hoarse in the throat of my chastity” (11 25). But most of her images are appealing across the ages.

Another troubling area is the wide disparity in the amount of vocabulary—especially in the case of descriptive adjectives—available to Mechthild and to her translator into modern English. Mechthild had a relatively poor language at her disposal compared to the rich diversity and capacity for differentiating available in English. Should one always use the same English word to translate a Middle High German word? The answer is obviously that one should not, and I have not done so because it makes Mechthild's language seem primitive, which it certainly is not, though there is often an attractive naive simplicity about it, as there often is in the language of the best lyric poets. There are no rules that guarantee the right choice of words in translating. One can only try, as best one can, to get inside the world of the author and, from that perspective, choose what seems to be the nearest equivalent.

A few specific matters: 1. I have almost always used she and her as pronouns when they refer to the soul. I have not done so because soul is feminine in German and thus requires feminine pronouns in that language. Consistency would then demand that one treat similarly all feminine nouns, such as snake, keg, or sickness. My justification is, rather, that for Mechthild the soul is the bride of Christ, so that even in instances in which it or its might seem equally appropriate-or even more so than feminine pronouns, I have stuck with she and her. Only when pronouns refer to Christ's soul have I used the neuter pronoun. 2. Geistlich (spiritual) is frequently used by Mechthild to refer to persons who are religious in the sense that they are members of the clergy, of a religious order, or beguines. When this is not clear from the text, I have added an explanatory note. 3. Mechthild uses heilige/helige cristanheit (Holy Christianity) to refer to the whole Christian community on earth, and it could justifiably be translated simply as the church, as conceived of by a loyal and enthusiastic daughter thereof. I have decided to translate it literally because of the freshness of Mechthild's term for the modern reader and because of the additional baggage the term church has acquired since Mechthild's time. 4. Finally, in the chapter headings that are phrases and not sentences, retreating from literalness, I have not translated the Von (concerning, about, of) with which they almost all begin.

I have found translating Mechthild more difficult than other authors I have tried my hand at (Eckhart, Suso, Hartmann of Aue), but it has also been more rewarding. The act of translating forces one to ponder Mechthild's words meditatively. One approaches more closely that frame of mind in which the author intended that her words be read than when one is dissecting the text with purely scholarly intentions. Though I have not yet read Mechthild's book nine times, as its Foreword admonishes us to do, I am close. Each prolonged encounter with Mechthild's text has resulted in my esteeming her more. Her book has much to offer if one reads it in a contemplative and receptive spirit.

5. The most important section of the FL for biographical information is IV 2. I have also relied heavily on Neumann 1964; and Neumann, "Mechthild von Magdeburg," Die deutsche Literatur des Mittelalters: Verfasserlexikon, 2d ed. Kurt Ruh (Berlin: de Gruyter), Vol. 6 (1987) 260-70. Ursula Peters, Religiose Erfahrung, 53-67 and 1 16-29, is deeply skeptical about the factuality of almost anything presented as fact in the FL and in all other similar religious texts. Though her views have not won general acceptance, they bear consideration.

8. Peters, Religiose Erfahrung, 116-29, doubts that the confessor played a central role in the book's inception and considers the meeting with the confessor and his command to write to be a literary topos Mechthild employs to rid herself of the charge of arrogance in undertaking to write such a book as the FL. Because of the evident joy with which Mechthild often writes, one is certainly justified in questioning whether her confessor's command was crucial to her decision to write. Securing her confessor's approval, however, would certainly be a prudent thing to do if she was to claim that the book "comes from God and does not have its origins in human thought" (IV 2).
9. The Lux divinitatis also speaks of Baldwin's fine upbringing, which strengthens the general assumption that the family was of the aristocracy; and it reports that Baldwin became a subprior and enjoyed a reputation for virtue and knowledge. See Book IV, note 44 below.

12. Schmidt in a few of the explanatory notes accompanying her translation states her conviction that this or that phrase or sentence was probably formulated by Heinrich. Hans Urs von Balthasar, in notes he contributed to Schmidt's earlier translation of the FL (Einsiedeln, Zurich, Cologne: Benziger, 1955) also points out several formulations he thinks might well have been the work of Heinrich.

20. It seems legitimate to consider the vision, as it occurs in the FL, more as a form drawn from tradition than as the reporting of raw experience because, first, Mechthild's visions have been reflected upon and crafted, and, second, she draws upon the traditions of the vision coming from, among other sources, the Book of Daniel, Paul, and the Book of Revelation, as is pointed out in the notes.

21. Bernard McGinn, The Foundations of Mysticism (New York: Crossroad, 1992), xiii-xx. The most troubling term in this definition, for McGinn as well, is direct or immediate. For our present purposes we can avoid difficulties by weakening it to something like heightened or intensified.

26. At least this can be reasonably concluded from the first paragraph of VII 21.

27. The increase in imagery from and references to convent life in Book VII is quite evident.

28. N I, XXII-XXIII.

29. Mechthild also employs other kinds of rhyme that offend against modern taste, such as impure rhyme, identical rhyme, and cases where a rhyme occurs in an accented syllable of one word and in an unaccented syllable of the other word.

Mechthild of Magdeburg

THE FLOWING LIGHT OF THE GODHEAD

PROLOGUE TO THE LUX DIVINITATIS¹

Prologue of Brother Heinrich, Lector, of the Order of Preaching Brothers'

We read in the Book of Judges (4:4-5) that the holy woman Deborah, the wife of Lappidoth, full of the spirit of prophecy, was accustomed to set up her tent under a palm tree in the hills of Ephraim, residing there as a solitary to devote herself to God alone. Israel, God's people, would go up to her seeking judgment in all matters. Likewise, the Fourth Book of Kings (2 Kgs 22: 14-20) relates that Huldah, a prophetess living in Jerusalem, enlightened by the Holy Spirit as to the hidden judgment of God, informed the holy king Josiah about the coming scourges threatening the people. This just and pious king had sent priests and levites to her so that the holy woman might seek the Lord's guidance and pray on his behalf regarding the imminent misfortunes. Certainly there were at the time high priests of the seed of Aaron and other kinds of priests and levites learned in the law and of high moral integrity; yet, in spite of this, the Holy Spirit did not divulge his secret counsels to them. Rather, for these times he revealed them to these holy women of the weak sex, as he saw fit.

Quite often, in fact, almighty God has chosen what is weak in the world to confound what is stronger for its good. Therefore, let no one wonder or, lacking trust, fall into disbelief if God in the time of grace renews his marvels. He, who in the time of the law of Moses mercifully saw fit to perform similar works, now reveals his mysteries to the fragile sex. Because the people of Israel believed Deborah's prophecy, they won freedom from oppression and victory over their enemies. Also, a king, a religious man, was found worthy to gain solace and mercy through the prayer and advice of the prophetess Huldah. So, too, shall all who write or read this book, if they approach it with pious intent, attain an increase in solace and spiritual grace, as the Lord promises them in the book itself.

This writing must be read in a pious spirit, however. It must be understood, as is the case with other holy writings, in a wholesome manner and in good faith. In this way the reader will find nothing scandalous or offensive in it, and the writing itself will not be subjected to any perverse claim of falsehood. Its author is the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; it treats Christ and the church, as well as Satan and his body.' Its manner of proceeding is both historical and mystical; its purpose is the ordering of the present life, the useful calling to mind of things past, and the prophetic disclosure of things to come. The sincere devotion and dove-like simplicity of the woman through whom this writing was made public should completely suffice to guarantee the truth of what the pious faithful are asked to believe. From childhood she led a pure and innocent life. In her youth, at the urging of the Lord, she left everything she stood to gain and became an exile in a foreign land, leading a life of voluntary poverty. Finally, after many tribulations and at an advanced age, she was received into the community of holy sisters at Helfta. She lived there for twelve years and, as is confirmed by their testimony,' she flourished in the perfection of all virtues. She especially practiced charity, humility, long-suffering, and meekness. Raised up above all things by contemplation and made a sharer of divine illuminations and revelations, she was worthy to perceive from the Lord through her prophetic spirit numerous intimate divine mysteries concerning things past, present, and to come. Now, having been received by the Bridegroom of virgins, this holy virgin enjoys fully him whom she loved and whose wondrous love adorned his beloved with many marvels.

The revelations and visions that almighty God has deigned to disclose to his elect are founded upon and have their origin in the directness of their faith. Their purity of mind demands and expects them. The holiness of their life authenticates and corroborates them. For celestial secrets lie open to such people, and their testimony is greeted with belief by the hearts of those who hear them.

For this reason, before beginning this book, which is written in a primitive tongue and contains certain marvelous and previously unknown mysteries, I thought it worthwhile to point out beforehand a bit about the holiness of the person to whom these things have been revealed by heaven, so that the marvels mentioned in word might have the support of deeds more marvelous. For who shall describe for us more vividly the perfection of the elect than those very ones in whom and through whom God carries out his works? And who could have made known to the church more beneficially or better the perfection of Paul than Paul himself? In like manner, this holy one made public what the divine Spirit had wrought in her and with her, and proclaims his praise and glory.'

LATIN FOREWORD WITH TABLE OF CONTENTS AND MIDDLE HIGH GERMAN TRANSLATION¹

In the year of our Lord 1250 and for almost fifteen years thereafter this book was revealed² in German by the Lord through grace to a certain beguine who was a holy virgin in body and spirit. In humble simplicity, in the poverty of exile, weighed down by scorn, and in heavenly contemplation, as is made clear in this writing, she served the Lord with great devotion for more than forty years, following perfectly the footsteps of the brothers of the Order of Preachers. Always progressing day by day, she continually became better. It was compiled' by a brother of the aforementioned order and contains many good things, as is noted in these titles:

On the Trinity: 11 3; 111 9; IV 12 and 14; V 26

On Christ: 11 3; IV 14; V 23 and 27

On Our Lady: 1 22; 11 3; V 23

On the Nine Orders of Angels: 1 6; 111 1; V 1

On the Special Excellence of Certain Saints: IV 20, 22, and 23

On the Evilness of Demons: 11 24; IV 2 and 17; V 1; V 29

On the Dignity of a Human Being: I 44; IV 14

On Rapture and the Separation of the Soul from the Flesh: I 5

On the Description of Heaven: III 1

On the Description of Hell: 111 21

On the Many Kinds of Purgatory: 11 8; 111 15 and 17; V 14 and 15

On Many Virtues and Vices: I 22 and 25; 111 7 and 14; IV 4; and on Charity Especially: 111 13

On the Order of Preachers at the End of the World at the Time of the Antichrist: IV 27

And on many things unheard of that you shall understand if you read this book nine times in faith, humility, and devotion.'
Here is prophecy about the past, present, and future. Here also is the Song of the Three Persons: V 26.

[Middle High German translation:]

In the year 1250 after God's birth and for the fifteen years thereafter this book was revealed in German by God to a sister. She was a holy virgin both in body and in spirit. She served God devotedly in humble simplicity, in the poverty of exile, in heavenly contemplation, and weighed down by scorn, for more than forty years, and followed steadfastly and completely the light and the teaching of the Order of Preachers, and went forward from day to day and improved herself daily. But a brother of the same order gathered together and wrote this book; and much good is contained in this book on many subjects, as is noted in this list. You should read it through nine times in faith, humility, and devotion.

Book I

One Should Receive This Book Eagerly, For It Is God Himself Who Speaks the Words'

This book I hereby send as a messenger to all religious people both the bad and the good; for if the pillars fall,' the building cannot remain standing; and it signifies me alone and proclaims in praiseworthy fashion my intimacy. All who wish to understand this book should read it nine times.

This Book Is Called a Flowing Light of the Godhead

"Ah, Lord God, who made this book?"

"I made it in my powerlessness, for I cannot restrain myself as to my gifts."4

"Well then, Lord, what shall the title of the book be, which is to your glory alone?"

"It shall be called a flowing light of my Godhead into all hearts that live free of hypocrisy."

1. How Love and the Queen Spoke to Each Other'

The soul came to Love, greeted her with great deference, and said:

"God greet you, Lady Love."

"May God reward you, Mistress and Queen."

"Lady Love, you are indeed perfect."

"Mistress and Queen, that is why I am above all things."

"Lady Love, you struggled many a year before you forced the exalted Trinity to pour itself utterly into the humble virginal womb of Mary."

"Mistress and Queen, that was to your honor and benefit."

"Lady Love, you have now come here to me and have taken from me everything I ever gained on earth."

"Mistress and Queen, you have made a happy exchange."

"Lady Love, you have taken from me my childhood."

"Mistress and Queen, in its place I have given you heavenly freedom."

"Lady Love, you have taken from me all my youth."

"Mistress and Queen, in its place I have given you many a holy virtue."

"Lady Love, you have taken from me possessions, friends, and relatives."

"Come now, Mistress and Queen, that is a petty complaint."

"Lady Love, you have taken from me the world, worldly honor, and all earthly riches."

"Mistress and Queen, I shall make that up to you in one hour with the Holy Spirit on earth, just as you wish it."

"Lady Love, you have brought me to such a pass that my body is racked by a strange weakness."

"Mistress and Queen, in exchange I have given you much sublime knowledge."

"Lady Love, you have devoured my flesh and my blood."

"Mistress and Queen, you have thereby been purified and drawn into God."

"Lady Love, you are a robber; for this as well shall you make reparation."

"Mistress and Queen, then take me."

"Lady Love, now you have recompensed me a hundredfold on earth."

"Mistress and Queen, in addition you may demand God and all his kingdom."

2. Concerning Three Persons and Three Gifts'

God's true greeting, coming from the heavenly flood out of the spring of the flowing Trinity, has such force that it takes away all the body's strength and reveals the soul to herself, so that she sees herself resembling the saints, and she takes on a divine radiance. Then the soul leaves the body, taking all her power, wisdom, love, and longing. Just the tiniest bit of her life force remains with the body as in a sweet sleep.' Then she sees one complete God in three Persons and knows the three Persons in one God undivided.

He greets her in courtly language that one does not hear in this kitchen, clothes her in the garments that one fittingly wears in a palace, and surrenders himself into her power. Then she can wish for and ask whatever she wants. It is granted her and she is enlightened. What she is not enlightened about is the first cause of the Three Persons.' Then he draws her further to a secret place. There she is not permitted to beg on anyone's behalf or ask, because all alone with her he wants to play a game that the body does not know, nor the peasants at their plows, nor knights at their tournaments, nor his lovely mother, Mary-not even she may play it there. Then she soars further to a blissful place of which I neither will nor can speak. It is too difficult; I do not dare, for I am a very sinful person. Yet when infinite God brings the unfathomable soul to the heights, she loses sight of the earth in her astonishment and is not aware of ever having been on earth. Just when the game is at its best, one has to leave it.

Then God in full vigor speaks: "Young Miss, you must go down." She shudders and laments" her banishment. She says: "Lord, you have raised me up" so high here that I shall not be able to praise you in any fitting degree when in my body. Rather, I shall suffer as an outcast and shall struggle against the body." And he says:

"Oh, dear dove,¹²
Your voice is string music to my ears.
Your words are spices for my mouth.
Your longings are the lavishness of my gift."

She says: "Dear Lord, it has to be as the master of the house¹³ commands." And she sighs with all her might, which awakens the body.¹⁴

Then the body speaks: "Well, woman, just where have you been? You come back so love-struck, lovely, and vibrant, free and witty. Your carrying on has cost me my appetite, sense of smell, color, and all my strength."

She says: "Shut up, murderer! Quit your bellyaching. I'll always be on my guard with you around. That my enemy has been wounded-what do we care about that? It makes me glad."

This is a greeting that has many streams. It pours forth from the flowing God into the poor, parched soul unceasingly with new knowledge, in new contemplation, and in the special enjoyment of the new presence. O sweet God, inwardly on fire, outwardly blossoming, now that you have given this to the least," I would like to experience the life that you have given to your greatest. For that I would be willing to endure suffering even longer.

No one is able or is permitted to receive this greeting unless one has gone beyond oneself and has become nothing. In this greeting I want to die living." This the blind saints cannot ruin for me. They are the ones who love and do not know."

3. The Handmaids of the Soul and the Blow of Love¹⁸

All holy Christian virtues are the handmaids of the soul. The sweet listlessness of the soul complains to Love of her troubles:

"Well then, dearest Maiden, for a long time now you have been my chambermaid. Now tell me, where is all this leading? You have hunted me, trapped me, bound me, and wounded me so deeply that I shall never be healthy again. You have meted out to me many a cudgel blow. Tell me, am I ever going to recover from you? If I were not going to be killed by your hand, it would be better for me never to have known you."¹⁹

Love: "That I hunted you was my fancy.
That I captured you was my desire.
That I bound you made me happy.
When I wounded you, you were joined to me.
When I cudgel you, I take you into my power.
I drove God the almighty from heaven,
Took his human life,
And returned him to his Father in honor.
How do you, vile worm, expect to survive before me?"

The Soul: "Speak, my Empress, I fear a small secret medicine God has often given to me that I might thrive even in your presence."

Love: "If one does not want the prisoners dead,
One gives them water and bread.
The medicine that God has often given you

Is nothing other than a brief return to human life.
But when your Easter Day comes
And your body receives the death blow,
Then I'll embrace you tightly
And permeate you utterly,
And I'll steal you from your body
And give you to your Lover."

The Soul: "O Love, this letter I have written out of your mouth.
Now give me, Lady, your seal."

Love: "Whoever has succeeded in loving God more than self
Knows well where to get the seal.
It lies between the two of us."

The Soul speaks:
"Be silent, dear one, and speak no more.
Dearest of all maidens, let all creatures, myself included,
Bow down before you.
Tell my Lover that his bed is made ready.
And that I am weak with longing for him."

If this letter is too long, this is the reason: I was on the meadow where I found flowers of all kinds. This is a sweet lament: Who dies of love shall be buried in God.

4. The Soul's, journey to Court During Which God Reveals Himself

When the needy soul comes to the court, she is judicious and refined. She gazes at her God in high spirits. Oh, how tenderly is she welcomed there! She remains silent, longing boundlessly for his praise. With great longing he reveals to her his divine heart. It resembles red gold burning in a great fire of coals. He places her into his glowing heart. When the exalted Sovereign and the little waif thus embrace and are united as water and wine, she turns to nothing and is transported out of herself.²⁰ When she has no strength left, he is as lovesick for her as he always was; for he neither increases nor decreases. Then she says:

“Lord, you are my lover,
My desire,
My flowing fount,
My sun;
And I am your reflection.”

This is the journey to court of a loving soul that cannot exist without God.

5. The Torment and the Praise of the Soul²¹

My body is in great torment, my soul is in sublime bliss; for she has both gazed upon and embraced her Lover in her arms. He causes her, poor wretch, torment. When he draws her up, she flows. She cannot hold herself in check until he brings her within himself. She would like to speak but cannot, so utterly has she been enmeshed in sublime union with the awe-inspiring Trinity. Then he leaves her for a short while, that she might feel longing. She desires his praise but does not know how to find it as she would like. She would even want him to send her into hell that he might be praised beyond measure by all creatures.²² She looks at him and says to him, "Lord, give me your blessing." He looks at her, draws her up again, and gives her a greeting²³ that the body cannot express.

Then the body speaks to the soul:

“Where have you been?
I can’t take it anymore.”

And the soul says:

“Quiet, you are a fool.
I want to be with my Lover,
Even if it means you would perish.
I am his joy, he is my torment.”

This is her torment. May she never recover!
May you take this torment upon yourself as well,
And may you never escape it!

6. The Nine Choirs: How They Sing²⁴

Now hear,²⁵ my Beloved; listen with spiritual ears. Thus do the nine choirs sing:

We praise you, Lord, that you sought us in your humility.
We praise you, Lord, that you have kept us in your mercy.
We praise you, Lord, that you have glorified us in your humiliation.
We praise you, Lord, that you have provided for us in your generosity.
We praise you, Lord, that you have arranged us in rank in your wisdom.
We praise you, Lord, that you have shielded us with your might.
We praise you, Lord, that you have sanctified us with your nobility.
We praise you, Lord, that you have instructed us in your intimacy.
We praise you, Lord, that you have elevated us in your love.

7. God's Curse in Eight Things

I curse you:
May your body die.
May your words perish.
May your eyes close.
May your heart dissolve.
May your soul rise up.
May your body remain.
May your human faculties perish.
May your spirit stand in the presence of the Holy Trinity!

8. The Most Lowly Praises God in Ten Things

O you burning Mountain.
O you chosen Sun.
O you full Moon.
O you bottomless Well.
O you unscalable Height.

O you Brightness without measure.
O Wisdom without ground.
O Mercy without restraint.
O Might without opposition.
O Crown of all honors!
The most lowly person you ever created praises you.

9. With Three Things You Dwell on the Heights

Those who are on fire in true love and build on the firm ground of truth and bear abundant fruit for a blessed end-they dwell on the heights.

Explanation: This is about the Seraphim.

10. Who Loves God Triumphs over Three Things

Whoever conquers the world,
And takes from his body all useless desires,
And overcomes the devil,
This is the soul that loves God.
If the world gives her a shove,
She does not suffer much.
If the flesh gives her a jolt,
The spirit will not get sick from it.
If the devil gives her a push,
The soul pays no heed.
She loves
And keeps on loving,
And she does not know how to do otherwise.

11. Four Battle for God

O dove free of gall.²⁶
O maiden free of blemish.
O knight free of wounds.
O liegeman free of hesitation.
These are the four whom God can count on in battle.

12. The Soul Praises God for Five Things"

O Emperor of all honors.
O Crown of all sovereigns.
O Wisdom of all the learned.
O Giver of all gifts.
O Deliverer of all imprisonments.

13. How God Comes to the Soul

I come to my beloved as the dew upon the flower.²⁸

14. How the Soul Receives and Praises God

Ah, joyous sight!
Ah, lovely greeting!
Ah, dear embrace!
Lord, the wonder of you has overwhelmed me.
Your grace has crushed me.
O you lofty Crag.
You are so nicely honeycombed.
In you no one can rest but doves and nightingales.

15. How God Receives the Soul

Welcome, my precious dove.
You have flown so keenly over the earth
That your feathers reach to heaven.

16. God Likens the Soul to Four Things

You taste like a grape.
Your fragrance is like balsam.²⁹
Your radiance is like the sun.
You are an enhancement of my most sublime love.

17. The Soul Praises God About Five Things

O you pouring God in your gift!
O you flowing God in your love!
O you burning God in your desire!
O you melting God in the union with your beloved!
O you resting God on my breasts!³⁰
Without you I cannot exist.

18. God Likens the Soul to Five Things

O you beautiful rose among the thorns!
O you fluttering bee in the honey!
O you unblemished dove in your being!
O you beautiful sun in your radiance!
O you full moon in the firmament!
I cannot turn away from you.

19. God Caresses the Soul in Six Ways

You are my softest pillow,
My most lovely bed,
My most intimate repose,
My deepest longing,
My most sublime glory.
You are an allurements to my Godhead,
A thirst for my humanity,
A stream for my burning.

20. The Soul Praises God in Return in Six Ways

You are my resplendent mountain,
A feast for my eyes,
A loss of myself,
A tempest in my heart,
A defeat and retreat of my power,
My surest protection.³¹

21. Of Knowledge and Enjoyment

Love without knowledge is as darkness to the wise soul.³²
Knowledge without its fruition she likens to the pains of hell.
Fruition short of death she cannot lament enough.

22. St. Mary's Message and How One Virtue Follows Another. How the Soul Was Made in theJubilus33 of the Trinity, and How St. Mary Nursed All the Saints and Nurses Them Still

The sweet dew of the eternal Trinity gushed forth from the fountain of the everlasting Godhead into the flower of the chosen maid; and the fruit of this flower is an immortal God and a mortal man and a living hope of eternal life. And our Redeemer became a Bridegroom. The bride became exhilarated at the sight of his noble countenance:

Under this immense force she loses herself.
In this most dazzling light she becomes blind in herself.
And in this utter blindness she sees most clearly.
In this pure clarity she is both dead and living.

The longer she is dead, the more blissfully she lives.³⁴
The more blissfully she lives, the more she experiences.³⁵
The less she becomes, the more flows to her.
The more she fears,...³⁶
The richer she becomes, the poorer she is.
The deeper she dwells,³⁷ the more she expands.
..., the more forbearing she is.
The deeper her wounds become, the more violently she struggles.

The more loving God is to her, the higher she soars.
The more radiantly she shines in the reflected effulgence of the Godhead, the closer she approaches him.
The more she labors, the more contentedly she rests.
..., the more she grasps.
The more quiet her silence, the louder she calls.
..., the greater the marvels she works with his strength in proportion to her power.

The more his desire grows, the more extravagant their wedding celebration becomes.
The narrower the bed of love becomes, the more intense are the embraces.
The sweeter the kisses on the mouth become, the more lovingly they gaze at each other.
The greater the distress in which they part, the more he bestows upon her.

The more she consumes, the more she has.
The more humbly she takes her leave, the sooner she returns.
The more ardent she remains, the sooner she bursts into flame.
The more she burns, the more beautifully she glows.
The more God's praise is spread abroad, the greater her desire becomes.

Tell me, where did our Redeemer become the Bridegroom?

In the jubilus of the Holy Trinity. When God could no longer contain himself, he created the soul and, in his immense love, gave himself to her as her own.³⁸

"What are you made of, Soul, that you ascend so high above all creatures, mingle with the Holy Trinity, and yet remain whole in yourself?"

"You have brought up the question of my origin. I shall tell you honestly: I was made by love in that very place." For that reason no creature is able to give comfort to my noble nature or to open it up except love alone."

"Holy Mary, dear Lady, you are the mother of this wonder. When did this happen to you?"

"When our Father's jubilus was saddened by Adam's fall, so that he had to become angry, the Eternal Wisdom of the almighty Godhead intercepted the anger together with me. The Father chose me for his bride-that he might have something to love; for his darling bride, the noble soul, was dead. The Son chose me to be his mother, and the Holy Spirit received me as his beloved. Then I alone was the bride of the Holy Trinity and mother of orphans, and I brought them before God's eyes so that they might not all sink down, though some did. When I was thus the mother of many a banished child, my breasts became so full of the pure, spotless milk of true, generous mercy that I suckled the prophets and sages, even before I was born. Afterward, in my childhood, I suckled Jesus; later, in my youth, I suckled God's bride, Holy Christianity, under the cross when I was so desolate and wretched, as the sword of the physical suffering of Jesus cut spiritually into my soul."

Both his wounds and her breasts were open.
The wounds poured forth.
The breasts flowed.
The soul was invigorated and completely restored
As he poured the sparkling red wine
Into her red mouth.⁴⁰

As she was thus born and made healthy out of the open wounds, she was like a child, and very young. If she was going to recover completely after her death and birth, God's mother was going to have to be her mother and her nurse. This was and is as it should be, since God is her rightful father and she is his rightful bride. She resembles him in all parts.

"Lady, in your old age you suckled the holy apostles with your motherly instruction and with your powerful prayer, that God might reveal his honor and your will through them. Lady, thus did you suckle then and suckle still the hearts of martyrs with strong faith, the ears of confessors with holy protection, the virgins with your chastity, widows with constancy, married people with kindness, and sinners with patient hope."

"Lady, us, too, you must suckle, for your breasts are still so full that they are not likely to dry up. If you no longer wanted to suckle, the milk would cause you much pain. For truly, I have seen your breasts so full that seven streams pour out at one time from one breast over my body and over my soul. In that hour you relieve me of a labor that no friend of God can bear without inner suffering. In this same manner, you shall go on suckling until the last day. Then you shall become dry, for then God's children-and your children-will be weaned and fully grown for eternal life. Ah, then we shall know and see with inexpressible joy the milk and even the breasts themselves⁴¹ that Jesus so often kissed."⁴²

23. You Should Ask That God Love You Passionately, Often, and Long; Then You Shall Become Pure, Beautiful, and Holy⁴³

Ah, Lord, love me passionately, love me often, and love me long. For the more passionately you love me, the purer I shall become. The more often you love me, the more beautiful I shall become. The longer you love me, the holier I shall become here on earth.

24. How God Responds to the Soul

That I love you passionately comes from my nature, for I am love itself. That I love you often comes from my desire, for I desire to be loved passionately. That I love you long comes from my being eternal, for I am without an end and without a beginning.

25. The Way to Suffer Pain Willingly for God's Sake

God guides his chosen children along strange paths. This is a strange path and a noble path and a holy path that God himself trod: that a human being, though free of sin and guilt, suffer pain. Upon this path the soul that aches for God is joyful, for by nature she is joyful to her Lord, who suffered much pain because of his good deeds. Our dear Lord, the heavenly Father, delivered up his most beloved Son to be tormented by the heathens and martyred by the Jews despite his innocence. Now the time has come when some people, who have the appearance of being religious, torment the bodies of God's children and martyr their spirits. For he wants them to resemble his beloved Son who was tormented in body and soul.

26. The Path upon Which the Soul Draws the Senses and Is Free of Suffering of the Heart

It is a rarely traveled and lofty path upon which the devoted soul makes its way and guides the senses as one with sight guides a blind person. On this path the soul is free and lives without inner suffering, for she wants nothing but what her Lord wants, who arranges everything for the best.

27. How You Become Worthy of This Path and Keep to It and Become Perfect

Three things make a person worthy of this path-that one recognize it and enter upon it: first, that one submit to God relinquishing all human control, and that one piously hold on to God's grace and willingly keep it by being forgiving in all things as far as is possible for a human will. The second thing keeping a person on this path is that one welcome all things except for sin alone. The third thing keeping a person on this path is that one do all things equally for God's honor. Thus I think relieving my most basic need counts as much in God's sight as if I were in the highest state of contemplation that a human being can attain. Why? If I do it out of love in order to give honor to God, it is all one and the same. But when I sin, I am not on this path.

28. Love Shall Be Deadly, Boundless, and Unceasing; This Is the Folly of Fools

I delight in loving him who loves me, and I long to love him to the death, boundlessly, and without ceasing. Be happy, my soul, for your Life has died for love of you." Love him so fiercely that you could die for him. Thus you burn ever more without ever being extinguished as a living flame in the vast fire of high majesty.

Thus you become full of the fire of love.
This makes you here utterly happy.

You can no longer teach me anything.
I cannot turn away from love.
I must be its captive.
Otherwise, I cannot go on living.
Where it dwells, there I must remain,
Both in death and in life.⁴⁵
This is the folly of fools
Who live free of anguish.

29. The Beauty of the Bridegroom and How the Bride Should Follow Him in Twenty-Three Steps of the Cross` 6

Look at me, my bride.' See how beautiful are my eyes, how comely is my mouth, how on fire is my heart, how agile are my hands, and how swift are my feet. So, follow me! You shall be martyred with me, betrayed in jealousy, hunted in ambush, taken prisoner in hate, bound in obedience, your eyes covered so that one will not tell you the truth, slapped by the rage of the world, brought to trial in confession, struck blows by penance, sent to Herod in derision, stripped naked by abandonment, scourged by poverty, crowned with trials, spat upon by disgrace, bearing your cross in the hatred of sin, crucified in voluntary withdrawal from all things, nailed to the cross by the holy virtues, wounded by love, dying on the cross in holy constancy, pierced in your heart by constant union, taken down from the cross in true victory over all your enemies, buried in oblivion, arisen from the dead in a holy end, and drawn up into heaven in God's breath.

30. The Seven Hours`

Matins:	Love in abundance, a sweet delight. ⁴⁹
Prime:	Love's longing, a sweet burden.
Terce:	Love's pleasure, a sweet thirst.
Sext:	Love's feeling, a sweet cooling.
Nones:	Love's death, a sweet distress.
Vespers:	Love's flowing, a sweet pouring.
Compline:	Love's rest, a sweet joy. ⁵⁰

31. You Should Ignore Scorn

I was deeply scorned, and our Lord said: "Do not be much surprised. Since the precious unguent jar was utterly rejected and spat upon, what is going to happen to the vinegar jar, which has nothing of value about it?"

32. You Should Ignore Honors, Suffering, and Possessions. Be Sad After Sinning

If someone offers you honor, you should be ashamed.

If someone makes you suffer, you should be glad.

If someone does you a favor, you should be afraid.

If you commit a sin against me, you should be sad in your heart.

If you cannot feel sadness, then consider how greatly and how long

I was saddened for your sake.

33. Concerning Food, Consolation, and Love

My soul spoke thus to her Lover:

“Lord, your generosity is food for my body wonderfully.

Your mercy is consolation for my soul especially.

Your love is repose for my being eternally.”

34. In Suffering You Should Be a Lamb, a Turtledove, and a Bride

You are my lamb in your suffering;

You are my turtledove in your sighing;

You are my bride in your waiting.

35. The Desert Has Twelve Things

You should love nothingness.

You should flee somethingness.⁵¹

You should stand alone

And should go to no one.

You should not be excessively busy⁵²

And be free of all things.

You should release captives

And subdue the free.

You should restore the sick

And yet should have nothing yourself.

You should drink the water of suffering

And ignite the fire of love with the kindling of virtue:

Then you are living in the true desert.

36. Concerning Malice, Good Works, and Concerning a Marvel"

With the malice of your enemies shall you be adorned.

With the virtues of your heart shall you be glorified.

With your good works shall you be crowned.

With our mutual love shall you be raised on high.

With my delightful marvel shall you be made holy.

37. The Soul Responds to God Saying She Is Unworthy of These Favors

O dearly Loved One, in undeserved humiliation I take delight.
Virtues of the heart are my desire.
Good works, alas, I do not have.
Our mutual love I sully.
Of your beautiful marvel I am utterly unworthy.

38. God Boasts That the Soul Has Overcome Four Sins

In heaven God boasts about the soul on earth that loves him and says:

“Look, how she who has wounded me comes ascending.
She has cast from her the ape of the world.
She has overcome the bear of wantonness.
She has trod the lion of pride underfoot.

She has torn apart the jaws of the wolf of lust
And, like the hunted stag, comes running to me, the spring.
Like an eagle she rises out of the depths to the heights.”⁵⁴

39. God Asks the Soul What She Is Bringing

“You rush restlessly about in your love.
What do you bring me, my queen?”

40. She Replies: Something That Is Better than Seven Things

“Lord, I am bringing you my precious stone.
It is greater than the mountains.
It is wider than the world,
Deeper than the sea,
Higher than the clouds,
Brighter than the sun,
More numerous than the stars.
It weighs more than the whole earth.”

41. God Asks in Praise What the Precious Stone Is Called “O image of my divinity,

Glorified by my humanity,
Adorned with the Holy Spirit:
Tell me, what is your precious stone called?”

42. The Precious Stone Is Called Heart's Delight

“Lord, it is called my heart's delight,
Which I have taken back from the world,
Retained for myself,
And denied to all creatures.
But now I can carry it no further.
Lord, where shall I put it?”

43. Put Your Delight into the Trinity

“The delight of your heart
You shall put nowhere else but into my divine heart
And onto my human breast.
There alone shall you be consoled
And kissed by my Spirit.”

44. The Sevenfold Path of Love, the Three Garments of the Bride, and the Dance

“Ah, loving Soul, do you wish to know what your path shall be?”

“Yes, dear Holy Spirit, instruct me.”

“When you have passed beyond the need of sorrow and beyond the pain of confession and beyond the travail of penance and beyond the love of the world and beyond the temptations of the devil and beyond the influences of the flesh and beyond cursed self-will that thrusts many a soul backward with such force that she never achieves genuine love; and when you have struck down all your many foes, then you are so weary that you say: ‘Fair youth, I long for you. Where shall I find you?’ And the youth says:

‘I hear a voice;
It speaks its piece on love.
I have courted her many a day,
But the voice never addressed me.
Now I am moved;
I must hurry to her!
She is the one who bears anguish
And love joined together.’”

In the sweet dew of the morning-this is the cloistered inwardness that first enters the soul-her chamberlains, the five senses, speak thus:

"Lady, you should dress yourself."

"Dear ones, where am I supposed to be going?"

"We have definitely heard it whispered about that the prince intends to come to you in the dew and in the delightful song of the birds. Alas, lady, do not tarry!"

Then she puts on the slip of soft humility, so humble that it cannot bear anything underneath it. Over it comes a white dress of spotless chastity, so pure that it cannot bear anything in thought, word, or touch that might soil it. Then she puts on the cloak of her good name, which she has gilded with all the virtues. She enters into the woods, the company of holy people. There sings day and night the sweetest of the nightingales, the well-modulated union with God; and she hears many a sweet voice of birds, holy knowledge.⁵⁵ And still the young man did not come. So she sends out messengers because she is eager to dance. She sent for the faith of Abraham and the longing of the prophets and the chaste humility of our Lady, St. Mary, and all the holy virtues of our Lord Jesus Christ and all the excellence of his chosen ones. Then a splendid dance of praise takes place.

The young man finally comes and says to her: "Young lady, my chosen ones have shown off their dancing to you. Just as artfully should you now follow their lead."

She says:

"I cannot dance, Lord, unless you lead me.
If you want me to leap with abandon,
You must intone the song.
Then I shall leap into love,
From love into knowledge,
From knowledge into enjoyment,
And from enjoyment beyond all human sensations.
There I want to remain, yet want also to circle higher still."⁵⁶

And the young man has to sing thus:

"Through me into you
And through you from me."

[The soul:] "Willingly with you,
Woefully from you."⁵⁷

The young man speaks: "Young lady, you have done very well in this dance of praise. You shall have your way with the Son of the virgin, for you are delightfully weary. Come at noontime to the shade of the spring, into the bed of love. There in the coolness you shall refresh yourself with him."

The young lady says:

"Oh, Lord, that is too much
That she be your partner in love
Who has no love in her,
Unless she is moved by you."

Then the soul speaks to the senses, who are her chamberlains: "Now for a while I am weary of the dance. Leave me; I must go and refresh myself."

And the senses say to the soul: "Lady, if you wish to find refreshing coolness in the love tears of Mary Magdalene, they would certainly soothe you."

[Soul:] "Be still, my lords, you do not understand at all what I mean. Let me be on my own. For a time I want to drink undiluted wine."

[Senses:] "Lady, in the chastity of virgins great love is ready."

"That may be, but it isn't the noblest thing about me."

"In the blood of the martyrs you can cool yourself very well."

"I have been martyred so many times that I can't go there now."

"In the counsel of confessors the pure happily dwell."

"I shall always need counsel about what to do and what not to do; and yet I can't go there just now."

"In the wisdom of the apostles you will find much security."

"I have wisdom with me here. This shall always guide me to choose for the best."

"Lady, the angels are radiant and of love's color. If you wish to refresh yourself, rise up to them."

"The angels' bliss pains me in my love if I am not gazing upon their Lord and my Bridegroom."

"Then refresh yourself in the holy austere life that God granted to John the Baptist."

"The suffering I'm ready to bear, and yet the force of love transcends all austerity."

"Lady, if you want to refresh yourself in love, bow down to the small Child in the lap of the eternal virgin; and taste and see how the Joy of the angels sucked the unnatural milk."⁵⁸

"That is child's love, that one suckle and rock a baby. I am a full-grown bride. I want to go to my Lover."

[Senses:] "Oh, Lady, if you go there,
We shall go completely blind.
The Godhead is so blazing hot,
As you well know,
That all the fire and all the glowing embers
That make the heavens and all the saints glow and burn
Have flowed out from his divine breath
And from his human mouth
According to the plan of the Holy Spirit.
How can you stay there even for an hour?"

[Soul:] "A fish in water does not drown.
A bird in the air does not plummet.
Gold in fire does not perish.
Rather, it gets its purity and its radiant color there.
God has created all creatures to live according to their nature.
How, then, am I to resist my nature?
I must go from all things to God,
Who is my Father by nature,

My Brother by his humanity,
My Bridegroom by love,
And I his bride from all eternity.
Don't you believe I feel him intensely?⁵⁹
He can both burn powerfully and cool consolingly.
Now do not be overly sad.
You shall yet instruct me.
When I return, I shall certainly need your advice;
For the earth is full of snares."

Then the bride of all delights goes to the Fairest of lovers in the secret chamber of the invisible Godhead. There she finds the bed and the abode of love prepared by God in a manner beyond what is human. Our Lord speaks:

"Stay, Lady Soul."
"What do you bid me, Lord?"
"Take off your clothes."
"Lord, what will happen to me then?"
"Lady Soul, you are so utterly formed to my nature⁶⁰
That not the slightest thing can be between you and me.
Never was an angel so glorious
That to him was granted for one hour
What is given to you for eternity.

And so you must cast off from you
Both fear and shame and all external virtues.
Rather, those alone that you carry within yourself
Shall you foster forever.
These are your noble longing
And your boundless desire.
These I shall fulfill forever
With my limitless lavishness.”

“Lord, now I am a naked soul
And you in yourself are a well-adorned God.
Our shared lot is eternal life
Without death.”

Then a blessed stillness
That both desire comes over them.
He surrenders himself to her,
And she surrenders herself to him.
What happens to her then—she knows—
And that is fine with me.⁶¹
But this cannot last long.
When two lovers meet secretly,
They must often part from one another inseparably.⁶²

Dear friend of God, I have written for you this path of love. May God infuse it into your heart! Amen.

45. The Eight Days in Which What the Prophets Longed For Was Accomplished⁵³

This is a day of longing and blessed joy in the Annunciation of Christ.
This is a day of peace and dear tenderness in the Birth of Christ.
This is a day of charity and blessed communion,
Maundy Thursday.
This is a day of generosity and heartfelt love,
Good Friday.
This is a day of might and happy joy,
the Resurrection.
This is a day of faith and the pain of separation, the Ascension.
This is a day of truth and burning consolation, Pentecost.
This is a day of justice and the hour of truth,
the Last Judgment.
This is a week whose seven days we should celebrate with constancy.
The eighth day our Lord wants to celebrate on the last day with us all.

46. The Diverse Adornments of the Bride; How She Comes to Her Bridegroom; and How the Retinue Is Composed, Which Is Ninefold

The bride is clothed with the sun and has trodden the moon underfoot, and she is crowned with union.⁶⁴ She has a chaplain; this is fear. He has in his hand a golden rod; this is wisdom. The chaplain is clothed with the blood of the lamb and is crowned with honor; and wisdom is clothed with contentment and crowned with eternity. The bride has four bridesmaids. The first is love, who leads the bride. She is clothed with chasteness and is crowned with dignity. The second is humility, who holds the bride. She is clothed with lowliness and is crowned with eminence. The third bridesmaid is sorrow. She is clothed with small grapes⁶⁵ and is crowned with joy. The fourth bridesmaid is mercy. She is clothed with unguents" and is crowned with bliss. These two carry the coat of the bride, which is her holy reputation.

She has a bishop, which is faith. He brings the bride before the bridegroom. The bishop is clothed in precious stones and is crowned with the Holy Spirit. The bishop has two knights. The one is might and is clothed with battle and is crowned with victory. The other is daring and is clothed with boldness and crowned with all blessedness.

She has a chamberlain. That is watchfulness. He is clothed with constancy and is crowned with persistence. He carries a light before the bride and from behind her train. The light is understanding. It is clothed with insight and is crowned with generosity. The train is a holy conscience. It is clothed with good intention and is crowned with God's approval. She has a cupbearer, which is longing. He is clothed with desire and is crowned with peace. She has a minstrel who is amiability. His harp is intimacy. He is clothed with favor and crowned with help.

The bride has five kingdoms. The first are her eyes. They are founded in tears and adorned with restraint. The second are thoughts. They are founded in struggle and are adorned with good counsel. The third is speaking. It is founded in usefulness and is adorned with trust. The fourth is hearing. It is founded in the word of God and is adorned with consolation. The fifth is touch. It is founded in strength and is adorned with noble habit. These five kingdoms have an overseer. This is guilt. He is clothed with confession and crowned with penance. She has a judge. He is clothed with discipline and crowned with patience.

The bride has a beast of burden. This is the body. It is bridled with worthlessness: contempt is its fodder and its stable is confession. The pack it carries is innocence. The bride has a crimson silk cloth, which is hope. It is clothed with truth and crowned with song. She has a palm in her hand, which is victory over sin. In her other hand she has a canister that is full of longing and love. This she wants to bring to her Lover. She is wearing a hat of peacock feathers, which are her good name on earth and high honor in heaven. She follows a path, which is meekness. This is clothed with honey and crowned with safety.

And she sings:

"Chosen Lover, I long for you.
You take and give me many a heartache.
I have from you, besides, invisible suffering.
If you, Lord, command,
I shall be freed from myself."

And he speaks:

"Dearest love, think of the hour
When you may grasp the full treasure.
Do not let the time seem too long.
After all, I hold you constantly Embraced in my arms."

Then our Lord says to his chosen bride:

"Come, my beloved, come. You shall be crowned."⁶⁷

And he gives her a crown of truth that no one may wear but religious people." On the crown one sees four virtues: wisdom and sorrow, longing and perseverance. May God give us all this crown! Amen.

Book II

1. Love Brings Elevation to the Soul, Not Inhuman Toil; That Comes from Self-Will

The elevation of the soul comes about in love, and the glory of the body comes about in holy Christian baptism. There is no elevation beyond that of love, and outside Christianity there is no glory. For this reason they make great fools of themselves who imagine that they are scaling the heights with loathsome, inhuman toils,' even though their hearts are full of rancor. They are entirely lacking in holy, humble virtues that guide the soul to God. False holiness likes to hide where self-will holds sway in a heart.

2. Two Songs of Love of Him Who Was Seen in Love

I would willingly die of love
If it could happen to me.
Him whom I love I have seen
With my beaming eyes
Present in my soul.
Any bride who has offered a dwelling place
To her love has no need to go far.
Love cannot easily disappear
Where the maiden oft pursues the young man.
His noble nature is quite ready to receive
Her eagerly and place her close to his heart.
This is easily missed by foolish people
Who are not willing to seek out the lover.

O noble Eagle, O sweet Lamb, O flaming Glow, set me on fire!
How long must I be so dry?
An hour is much too hard for me,
A day is like a thousand years
When you are of a mind
To be far away from me.
If it were to last eight days,
I would rather go down to hell—

I'm there already—
Rather than that God be away from the loving soul.
That is anguish beyond human dying
And beyond the torments of hell. Believe me!
The nightingale must ever sing,
For by nature it voices only melodies of love.
If that were taken from her, she would be dead.
Alas, great Lord, be mindful of my anguish!

The Holy Spirit said to the soul: "Ah, noble maiden, make ready; your Lover is about to come." This startled her, and she was inwardly glad and said: "Oh, dear messenger, if it would only happen! I am so worthless and so utterly faithless that I can never find rest apart from my Lover. Whenever I find that my love for him is growing cold I am utterly in torment, but resolve to follow him in sorrow."

The messenger said: "You must tidy up and wash. Prepare the bed and scatter flowers."

The lonely soul said:

“When I tidy up, I must be ashamed.
When I wash, I must weep.
When I prepare the bed, I must hope.
When I break off flowers, I must love.
When my Lord comes, I take leave of myself;
For he brings me so many sweet strains with his strings
That it stops all impulses of my flesh.
And his strings are so full of all sweetness
That with his airs he relieves me of all interior suffering.”

3. The Tongue of the Godhead, the Light of Truth, the Four Rays of God Shining into the Nine Choirs, the Trinity, and St. Mary

The great tongue of the Godhead has spoken many a mighty word to me. I took them in with the feeble ears of my lowliness; and the brightest of lights opened up to the eyes of my soul. In it I saw the indescribable order and recognized the inexpressible glory, the incomprehensible marvel, the special intimacy with separation,' complete fulfillment, the greatest concentration in knowledge, bliss with interruption' in proportion to the capacities of the faculties, unadulterated joy in the common union, and the ever vibrant life in eternity as it is now and ever shall be.

There also four beams were visible that shot forth continuously from the crossbow of the Holy Trinity from the divine throne through the nine choirs.} There is no one, however rich or poor, whom the beam does not strike lovingly. The beam of the Godhead shoots incomprehensible light through them. Loving humanity greets them in fraternal company. The Holy Spirit touches them with the flood of the marvelous abundance of eternal bliss. Undivided God feeds them with the shimmer of his glorious countenance and fills them with the joyful breath of his flowing mouth. They glide effortlessly, as birds in the air do when not moving their wings, and they fly wherever they want, body and soul, and yet they remain separate in their own order.

The Godhead rings,
Humanity sings,
The Holy Spirit plucks the harp of the heavens
So that all strings resound
That are strung in love.

Also visible was that same glorious vessel in which Christ dwelt in body and soul for nine months, as she shall always remain, but as yet without the great adornment that the heavenly Father shall give to the bodies of the blessed on the last day. Our Lady will be without it as long as the earth floats on the sea. One saw how beautifully our Lady stood at the throne to the left hand of the heavenly Father, revealed in all her maidenly being; and how her human body is bathed and formed in the noble light of the soul of our Lady; and how her lovely uncovered breasts are so full of sweet milk that drops flow forth in honor of the heavenly Father and as a favor to humankind, so that man might be perfect above all creatures. The noble princes, the archangels, are so utterly amazed that other princes, who are human, have ascended above them, that it is praiseworthy that evidence of our perfection is there.'

On the right hand of our Lord stands Jesus, our Redeemer, with his open wounds bloody and unbandaged, ready to prevail over the Father's justice that severely threatens many a sinner. As long as sinning continues on earth, Christ's wounds shall be open: bloody, but not painful. But after judgment Christ shall put on such a garment as has never been seen, unless God revealed it, but this did not happen. Then the sweet wounds shall heal, as though a rose petal had been placed on the spot of the wound. One will then see the scars turned bright red-love's color; and they will never fade. Then the uncreated God shall make new all his creatures, so new that they can never grow old.

Now my German fails me; I do not know Latin. If there is something of merit here, it is not my doing; for there never was a dog so nasty that it would not come if its master coaxed it with a white breakfast roll.

4. The Poor Girl, the Mass of John the Baptist, the Transformation of the Host into the Lamb, the Beauty of the Angels, Four

Kinds of Sanctified People, and the Golden Penny

How useful it is for a person to have good will, even though she cannot perform good works. This was revealed by our Lord to a poor girl when she could not go to mass because unfortunately she was not well enough for his service. Thus did she speak to God: "Alas, my dear Lord, am I going to be without mass today?"

While she was in this state of longing, God took away all her earthly senses and brought her miraculously into a beautiful church. She found no one inside. She thought to herself: Oh, you poor lazy thing, you've come too late. That you got up just now isn't going to do you any good here. Then she saw a young man come in carrying a bunch of white flowers. He spread them beneath the tower and went away.' Then another youth came carrying a bunch of violets, which he spread in the middle of the church. Then a third youth came carrying a bunch of roses, which he spread decorously before the altar of our Lady. Then a fourth came carrying a bunch of white lilies and spread them in the choir.' When they had done this, they bowed reverently and went away. These youths were so noble and so beautiful to behold that, if a person could really see them, human bodily suffering could never be so great that all the suffering would not disappear. Then two school boys in white garments entered carrying two lights. They placed them on the altar. Then they withdrew properly and remained in the choir.

Then a fairly tall man came in, quite gaunt but not old. His clothes were so tattered that arms and legs showed through. He carried a white lamb on his breast and two cruets$ in his grasp. He went to the altar, placed the lamb on it, and bowed lovingly toward it. This was John the Baptist, who was going to sing the mass. Then a young man entered, quite delicate in his bearing, carrying an eagle on his breast. That was John the Evangelist. Then a simple man, St. Peter, entered. Then a strapping young man entered carrying a bunch of vestments, which the three men put on. Then a great throng came in. It was the mighty court of heaven that filled the church so full that the poor girl could not find a place where she might remain.

So she went back and stood beneath the tower, where she found a group of people dressed in white who did not have any hair. Instead, they wore simple crowns on their heads. These were those people who had not lived according to the law. They lack the ornament of hair, which is good works. How, then, did they get into heaven? By sorrow and good will at the hour of death. Farther away she saw people more beautiful, clothed in violet-colored garments. They were adorned with the lovely hair of virtue and crowned with God's law. She found people more beautiful still who were clothed in rose-colored garments. They wore the beautiful symbol of widows and the crown of freely chosen chastity.

The poor girl was wretchedly clothed and was physically ill. She was not able to remain in any of the three groups. So she went and stood in front of the choir and looked in to where our dear Lady was standing on the highest level. St. Catherine, Cecilia, bishops, martyrs, angels, and a large number of virgins were there. The poor thing looked at this imposing throng and then looked at herself. Did she dare stay there in her wretched condition? Suddenly she was wearing a deep red mantle woven out of love in proportion to the ardor of her faculties for God and all good things. The mantle was decorated with gold and also with a song that went: "I would willingly die of love." She saw that she was like a noble maiden and wore on her head a garland of splendid gold. On it was inscribed another song that went:

His eyes into my eyes,
His heart into my heart,
His soul into my soul
Untiringly enclosed.

And her countenance resembled that of the angels. "Alas, foul puddle that I am, what is happening to me? Unfortunately I am not nearly as blessed as I saw myself there."

All who were in the choir looked at her with a friendly smile. Our Lady motioned to her that she should stand above Catherine. She went and stood next to our dear Lady, for it could indeed rarely happen that she might address and behold God's mother: "Oh, dear and noble Lady!" She considered it a great favor that the lowly crow might stand next to the turtledove. All who were in the choir were clothed in radiant gold and enveloped in soaring bliss, brighter than the sun.

Then the mass began thus: Let us all rejoice in the Lord." As often as our Lady was mentioned, she genuflected," while the others just bowed, because God had given her the greatest honor. Then the wretched girl who had come to mass said: "Oh, Lady, may I receive the body of God since there are no dangers here?" The mother of God said: "Certainly, dear child, make your confession." Then the queen of heaven signaled to John the Evangelist. He went out and heard the confession of the sinful girl. She asked him to tell her how long she would live. John said: "I am not permitted to tell you. God does not want me to. For if it were to be a long time, you might in your great sadness fall into deep depression. But if the time were to be short, you might in the sadness of your heart fall into a desire to live a long time."

Then John went to read the gospel, the Liber generationis.¹² The poor girl said to our Lady: "Should I make an offering?" Our Lady said: "Yes, if you do not intend to take it back from him again." The poor girl said: "Dear Lady, you must give me this favor from God." Our Lady said: "Then take this golden penny your self-will-and offer it to my glorious Son in all things." With good manners and in holy fear the little maid took the large penny. She examined what image had been struck on the penny. On it was Christ being taken down from the cross. On the back was the whole court of heaven with the nine choirs and God's throne above. Then the voice of God spoke to her: "If you are offering me this penny with the intention of never taking it back again, then I will take you down from the cross and take you to me into my kingdom."

After that, the same priest, who had been ordained by the Holy Spirit in his mother's womb,¹³ celebrated a low mass. When he took the white host in his hands, the lamb, which was standing on the altar, got up and, at the words under the signs of his hand,¹⁴ joined itself to the host and the host to the lamb in such a way that I no longer saw the host, but only a bleeding lamb hanging from a red cross. It looked at us with such sweet eyes that I shall never, ever forget it. Then the poor girl begged our Lady thus: "Dear Mother, ask your glorious Son that he deign to give himself to me, wretched though I be." And she saw that a radiant beam shined forth from the mouth of our Lady onto the altar and touched the lamb with her prayer, so that God himself spoke out of the lamb: "Mother, I shall willingly put myself in the place you desire." The poor girl approached the altar with great love and an open soul. St. John took the white lamb with its red wounds and placed it between her teeth in her mouth. Then the pure lamb lay down onto its own image in her stable¹⁵ and began to suckle from her heart with its sweet mouth. The more it suckled, the more she gave it.

[Now the person to whom this happened is dead and gone beyond. May God help us that we might behold her in the company of the angels.] ¹⁶

5. A Song of the Soul About Five Things, and How God Is a Garment of the Soul and the Soul of God

You shine into my soul
Like the sun against gold.
When I may rest in you, Lord,
My joy is rich.
You clothe yourself with my soul
And you are her most intimate garment.¹⁷
That there must be a parting between them—
Never have I experienced greater heartache!
If you were to love me more intensely,

I would certainly pass away
To where I could love you as I wish unceasingly.
Now I have sung to you
And yet to no avail.
Were you to sing to me,
I would have to succeed.

6. God's Singing Response in the Soul in Five Things

[God:] When I shine, you shall glow.
When I flow, you shall become wet.
When you sigh, you draw my divine heart into you.
When you weep in longing for me, I take you in my arms.
But when you love, we two become one being.¹⁸
And when we two are one being,
Then we can never be parted.
Rather, a blissful abiding
Prevails between us.

[Soul:] Lord, then I shall persevere in hunger and thirst
In pursuing and in pleasure
Till that playful¹⁹ hour
When from your divine mouth
The chosen words shall flow
That are heard by no one
But the soul alone
That has stripped itself of the earth
And puts her ear next to your mouth.
She, indeed, grasps the treasure of love!

7. In Suffering Praise God; Then He Will Appear to You. The Two Golden Chalices of Suffering and Consolation

I, sinful, lazy creature, was supposed to pray once; and God acted as though he did not want to give me any kind of favor. I wanted to give myself over to deep sadness because of the weakness of my flesh, which seemed to me to be an obstacle to spiritual pleasure. "No!" said my soul. "Keep in mind all his faithfulness and praise your Lord thus: 'Gloria in excelsis deo.'"²⁰

As I thus praised, a great light appeared to my soul, and in this light God revealed himself in great majesty and indescribable brightness. Our Lord held two golden chalices in his hands that were both full of living wine. In his left hand was the red wine of suffering, and in his right hand the white wine of sublime consolation. Then our Lord spoke: "Blessed are those who drink this red wine. Although I give both out of divine love, the white wine is nobler in itself; but noblest of all are those who drink both the white and the red."

8. Of Purgatory; a Person Freed a Thousand Souls from It with the Tears of Love

A person should pray very simply and with great intensity to God in heaven for the poor souls. Once God showed her²¹ the horrible purifying fire and the kinds of torment in it as varied as the sins punished there. This person's spirit was so fiercely moved that she embraced the whole of purgatory in her arms. She carried on caringly and pleaded lovingly. Then God spoke from heaven: "Stop that now! Don't inflict pain on yourself! You are making it too hard for yourself." The spirit lamented: "Alas, dear Lord, then free some of them!" Our Lord said: "How many of them do you want?" The spirit said: "Lord, as many as I am able to make reparation for in your goodness." Our Lord said: "Then take a thousand and lead them wherever you wish." Then, black, fiery, slimy, burning, bloody, stinking they rose out of the suffering. Again the person's spirit spoke: "Alas, my dear Lord, what is going to happen to these poor ones now? With such disfigurement they can never enter your kingdom." Then God inclined himself exceedingly low beneath his nobility and said something that serves to give much comfort to us sinners: "You should bathe them in the tears of love that now flow from the eyes of your body." Then there appeared a large round lake. They arose in unison and bathed in love, bright as the sun. The person's spirit felt indescribable joy and said: "Praised be you, dear Lord, by all creatures forever. Now they are suited for you in your kingdom." Then our Lord bowed to them from on high and placed the crown of love on them, which had freed them from thence, and he said: "You shall wear this crown forever so that all those in my kingdom might know that you were redeemed by tears of love nine years before your allotted time."

9. God Praises His Bride in Five Things

You are a light of the world.
You are a crown of virgins.
You are a salve of the wounded.
You are a pledge among the false.
You are a bride of the Holy Trinity.

10. The Bride Praises God in Return in Five Things

You are a light in all lights.
You are a flower above all crowns.
You are a salve on all wounds.
You are an unwavering pledge free of falsity.
You are an innkeeper in all hostelryes.

11. Seven Kinds of Love for God

True love of God has seven approaches.
Cheerful love leads the way.
Fearing love takes on the task.
Strong love can accomplish much.
Loving love receives no honor.
Wise love has knowledge.

Free love lives without heartache.
Powerful love is forever happy.

12. Seven Kinds of Perfection

Willingly without honor,
Willingly unfeared,
Willingly alone,
Willingly quiet,
Willingly below,
Willingly high,
Willingly common to all.

13. Between God and the Soul There Should Be Love

Between God and you there should always be love.
Between earthly things and you there should be dread and fear.
Between sin and you there should be enmity and strife.
Between the kingdom of heaven and you there should be constant hope.

14. Where Bitterness, Low Spirits, Sickness, Terror, Sensitivity, Distress, Forsakenness, and Inconsolability Come From²²

Bitterness of heart comes from humanity.²³
Low spirits of the body come from the flesh alone.
Agility of spirit comes from the nobility of the soul.
Terror in the face of punishment comes from guilt.
Sickness of the body comes from nature.
Distress of loneliness comes from fickleness.
Infrequent consolation comes from restlessness.

15. How One Wounded by Love Is Restored to Health

Whoever at some point
Is seriously wounded by true love
Will never become healthy again

Unless he kisses that same mouth
By which his soul was wounded.²⁴

16. The Seven Gifts of a Brother

The soul is boundless in her longing,
On fire in her loving,
Amiable in her bearing,
A mirror of the world,
Small in her greatness,
Reliable in helping,
Recollected in God.

17. How God Woos the Soul and Makes Her Wise in His Love²⁵

Thus does God woo the guileless soul and make her wise in his love:

“Ah, precious dove, your feet are red,
Your feathers are smooth,
Your mouth is well-formed,
Your eyes are beautiful,
Your head is refined,
Your bearing is attractive,
Your flight is bold,
And you sink ever all too swiftly back to earth.”

18. How the Soul Interprets God's Wooing in Eight Things

“Lord, my feet are stained with the blood of your true redemptive act.
My feathers have been smoothed in your noble choosing.
My mouth has been formed by the Holy Spirit.
My eyes are brightened in your fiery light.
My head is ennobled by your constant protection.
My bearing is attractive because of your generous gift.
My flight is made bold by your restless exhilaration.
My sinking back to earth comes from your being united with my body.²⁶
The greater the freedom you give me, the longer shall I soar in you.”

19. How Knowledge and the Soul Converse and How the Latter Says That She Is Threefold. Of the Three Heavens

Knowledge speaks first:

“O loving Soul, I have beheld you.
You are quite wondrously lovely.
A light was given me that I might look upon you.
Otherwise, it never would have been my fortune.
There is a threeness about you.
You can indeed be God’s image:
You are a virile vassal in battle.
You are a finely attired maiden in your Lord’s presence in the palace.
You are an eager bride in your bed of love with God.²⁷
Loving Soul, in your battle you are armed with immense might
And with such great concentration of your faculties
That neither all the forces of the world

Nor all the aid of your flesh
Nor all the troops of the devil
Nor all the power of hell
Can bring you down from God’s favor.
No one can boast of that any more.²⁸
You constantly defend yourself with flowers.
Your sword is the noble rose, Jesus Christ.
That is how you defend yourself.
Your shield is the white lily, Mary.
It does not do them a bit of good
That they attack you.
Rather, they thereby enhance your beauty
And increase immeasurably in you God’s honor.

All who are pure and fight to the end
Shall receive ample recompense from the Emperor.
O overwhelmed²⁹ Soul, what is your honor like
In the palace of the Holy Trinity, when you stand
Before your Lord so attractively adorned?”

“Lady Knowledge, you are wiser than I am.
Why are you asking me this?”

“Lady Soul, God has chosen you before all things.
You are my mistress and my queen.”³⁰

“Lady Knowledge, I was born noble and free.
I cannot be dishonored
Because of whom alone I love.
And so I shall bring it about
That the Holy Trinity loves, cherishes, and honors me,
And everything in heaven and on earth
Shall forever be subject to me.
If I let love have power over me,
Giving it room,

So that it can bind me to holy patience
And so that my guilt may not increase,
Then it will lead me to noble meekness,
That I may be ready for all good things;
And it will yoke me to strict obedience,
That I shall become lovingly subject
To God and all creatures.”

“Mistress Bride, would you say a word to me
About the ineffable intimacy that exists between God and you?”

“Lady Knowledge, that I shall not do.
Brides may not tell everything they experience.
Holy contemplation and precious enjoyment
You shall learn about from me.
My privileged experience of God must always be hidden
From you and from all creatures except for myself.”

“Lady Soul, your marvelous visions and lofty words
That you have seen and heard in God—
If you move me to divulge just a little,
Then I shall cast the light of the Emperor
Into a dark and dank stable.
Cattle eat their straw contentedly.

But there are some who seem to be God’s children
And yet thrust about like unfettered cattle
In the dark stable and say:
‘What is the point of such swindle?
It was thought up by self-will
And carried out in fake holiness.’”

“Lady Knowledge, one finds it written
That St. Paul was taken up into the third heaven.³¹
This never would have happened to him
If he had remained Saul.
If he had found the truth
In the first and second heaven,
He would never have climbed to the third.”

“Lady Soul, there is a heaven
Which the devil made with his alluring false cunning.
There thoughts wander about with sad feelings,
And the soul remains completely unmoved
Because she does not find love corresponding to her nature.
The soul remains unconsolated there
And the simple faculties are deceived.³²
In this heaven the devil reveals himself

As a radiant angel,
Even like God himself as to his five wounds.
Simple Soul, watch out!
The second heaven was created
By the longing of the senses
And by the first stage of love.
In this heaven there is no light;
The soul does not see God there.
Rather, she tastes an indescribable sweetness
That permeates all her members.
She hears as well a voice speaking of certain things

That she really wants,
For she is still joined to her earthly senses.
If she at this stage has not attained profound humility,
The devil brings his light there.³³
What then happens is not from God.
But if she has perfect humility,
The soul shall travel on to the third heaven
Where the true light is given to her.”

Then the senses say:
“Our lady, the soul, has slept since childhood.
Now she has awakened in the light of open love.”
In this light she looks around herself to discover
Who that is who reveals himself to her,
And what that is that one is saying to her.
Thus does she see truly and understand
How God is all things in all things.

[Soul:] “Now I shall put aside all my cares
And go with St. Paul into the third heaven
If God in his love will beat down my sinful body.”

This third heaven is vaulted, ordered, and illumined brightly with the Three Persons.³⁴

20. How Sister Hildegund Is Adorned in Heaven with Three Mantles, with Seven Crowns, and How the Nine Choirs Praise Her

On the feast of the holy virgin St. Barbara, Sister Hildegund received her glory. God revealed this to a lame dog who is as yet licking its wounds in wretchedness.³⁵ It happened thus while I was at prayer. I do not know whether heaven descended to me or I was drawn into the blissful house of God. There stood Hildegund before the throne of the heavenly Father, adorned as a new bride that the king had brought home. She had three mantles draped over her and wore on her head seven crowns, and the nine choirs offered her special praise. When I looked at her, I recognized her in all the gifts that she had received from God. I was eager to speak with her and, in order to remain longer with her in this blissful state, I asked her: "Tell me, where did you get that rosecolored mantle?"

Hildegund said: "I was a martyr in fiery love, so much so that often my heart's blood poured forth over my head."

Then I asked her further: "Where did you get this golden mantle that shines so splendidly?"

She said: "From the example of good works."

I said: "Where did you get this flowering white mantle?"

She replied: "From the overwhelming³⁶ love, which I kept secretly in my soul and in my senses."

These were the seven crowns: the crown of constancy, the crown of holy faith, the crown of fidelity, the crown of generous mercy, the crown of holy understanding, the crown of love, and the crown of virginity.

Then I asked further: "Dear Sister, where is your crown of humility that is so becoming to religious persons?"

She answered: "I do not have it especially, nor did I ever attain it just enough that God took away pride with it."

These seven crowns are all specially adorned with a garland of the dignity of pure noble chastity. The nine choirs praise her for nine virtues thus:

"We praise you for your sorrow,
For your good will,
For your truth,
For your wisdom,
For your sweet grieving,
For your voluntary poverty,
For your strength,
For your justice."

The Seraphim praise her thus, for they are her equals: "We praise you for your love, God's Queen."

The Thrones praise her thus: "We praise the bridegroom because of the beauty of the bride."

I asked her about many things which I shall now pass over in silence.
Though the kingdom of heaven is colored by love,
The kingdom of earth is, alas, quite changeable
For me and for many a person
Who never was taken up to heaven
Where one shall behold the truth.

21. If You Would Behold the Mountain, You Should Have Seven Thing.'

I saw a mountain—
That took place very quickly,
For the body cannot endure
The soul's being there for an hour.
At its base the mountain was white, like clouds,
And high up at the summit, fiery bright as the sun.

Its end and its beginning
I could not find at all.
Inside, it playfully sparkled
And flowed golden in boundless love.

I spoke:
"Lord, blessed are the eyes
That shall forever gaze upon this surging of love
And grasp this wonder.
I can never describe it."

The mountain spoke:

"The eyes that are to see me thus
Must be graced by seven things; otherwise,
They can never experience it.
These are: Slow to borrow, quick to pay back,
To hold back nothing for yourself,
To be kind in the face of hatred,
To be loving in the face of cruelty,
To be pure as to guilt
And ready for all one might receive."

22. How Contemplation Asks the Loving Soul About the Seraphim and the Least of Men

"Lady Soul, would you rather be an angel of the order of Seraphim or a human being with body and soul in the lowest choir of angels?"

The Soul to Contemplation: "Lady Contemplation, you have certainly noticed that the Seraphim angels are exalted princes and that they are one love and one fire and one breath and one light with God."

Contemplation to the Soul: "Lady Soul, you have certainly noticed that the angels are simple persons and that they do not praise God nor love him nor know him beyond the limits of their nature. The least of human beings can catch up with them by Christian belief, sorrow, longing, and good will. It's just that the human soul cannot burn as intensely in the Godhead."

The Soul to Contemplation: "Lady Contemplation, you have certainly noticed that the Seraphim angels are God's children and yet his servants as well. The least soul is a daughter of the Father and a sister of the Son and a friend of the Holy Spirit and, indeed, a bride of the Holy Trinity. When the game is over, then let one see how the scales tip-the noblest angel, Jesus Christ, who soars above the Seraphim, who is undivided with his Father. Him shall I, the least of souls, take in my arms, eat him and drink him, and have my way with him. This can never happen to the angels. No matter how high he dwells above me, his Godhead shall never be so distant that I cannot constantly entwine my limbs with him; and so I shall never cool off. What, then, do I care what the angels experience?"

23. How Love Questions and Instructs Dull Souls and Would Like to Bring Them to Their Lover and Begins to Speak; and How the Dull Soul Responds

"Alas, foolish Soul, where are you, or what is your dwelling like, and what are you living for? Where can you find rest since you do not love your vibrant God more than your own will or beyond all your might?"

"Let me sleep. I don't know what you are talking about."

"One certainly has to wake the queen when the king intends to come."

"I am a member of a religious order. I fast, keep vigils, am free of serious sin; I am bound enough."

"What good does it do to bind an empty vessel if the wine still runs out? One has to fill it with the stones of external hardship and the ashes of transitoriness."

"I dwell in the comfort of my relatives and my dear religious friends. Besides, how can I enjoy loving someone I don't know?"

"What? You don't know how to recognize the Lord who has been spoken of so lovingly to you so often? You are more concerned about that mongrel body of yours than about Jesus, your sweet Lord; and so you are never going to win honor in his eyes."

"I live by my own will. That is what I like to do."

"If you want to render God genuine loyalty, for his love you should follow his spirit."

"I rest in the vigor of my body."

"You should be ashamed of yourself today in God's sight, that you call yourself a religious and yet busy yourself the whole time with your body."

"How am I supposed to stay well if I take on the burdens you involve?"

"Oh, traitor! He who made the soul so noble that she feasts on nothing but God-he will not let your body perish."

"You are rebuking me severely. If I knew where he was, I could yet change my ways."

"If you wish to dwell with him in noble freedom, you first have to clear bad habits out of this dwelling."

"If I knew what was best, I would choose the best."

"Alas! That many a man who is wise in learning and by natural good sense does not risk putting himself completely in the power of naked love! Rather, it is the simple and pure who seek God alone in all their actions to whom God, given his nature, must favorably incline."

"I imagined that, having entered religious life, I had climbed high enough."

"What good does it do to put fine clothes on a sleeping man and set gourmet food before him? As long as he is asleep, he can't eat anyway. Ah, my love, let me awaken you."

"Well then, tell me where his dwelling is."

"There is no other Lord that dwells in all his castles at the same time but him alone. He lives in the peace of holy affection and whispers to his beloved in the narrow confines of the soul. He also embraces her in the noble comfort of his love. He greets her with his loving eyes when they earnestly gaze at one another with love. He kisses her passionately with his divine mouth. You are happy, more than happy in this most glorious hour. He caresses her, as well he can, on the bed of love. Then she rises to the heights of bliss and to the most exquisite pain when she becomes truly intimate with him. Ah, dear Soul, let yourself be loved and don't fiercely fend it off."

"Who are those who defend themselves fiercely?"

"Those who pester others and themselves with their own spitefulness. Now I shall tell you who he is. He is the loftiest of all pinnacles, and this same loftiest of all pinnacles bent down into the deepest of all valleys, and this deepest of all valleys ascended onto the highest of all pinnacles. O dull Soul, look all around you and open your blind eyes."

"If he has climbed down from the highest pinnacle for love of me and given himself along with all creatures to me totally, and if he does not now intend to withdraw his goodness from me, then I might well be ever ashamed in his sight that I was never quite willing to give up my worthless copper in return for his precious gold. Alas, where have I been, poor blind me, that I have lived so long without strong love? With it I can indeed conquer all my troubles in spite of all my enemies. Poor wretch, although I have missed much that is good, I shall nevertheless still go out from all things and into God. O Love, will you still receive me?"

"Yes, I shall. God has never denied himself to anyone. This is an equal balance: If you want to have love, you must leave love."

24. How the Loving Soul Joins the Company of God and His Chosen Dear Ones and Shall Be Equal to All the Saints. How the Devil and the Soul Talk to Each Other

Oh, Lord Jesus Christ, that you suffered despite your guiltlessness gives me consolation, for in all that I suffer I am guilty; and your salvific death keeps my memory of you alive, and your immaculate blood has coursed through my soul.

Mary, dear Mother, I stand next to you under the cross with all my Christian faith, and the sword of holy sorrow cuts through my soul³⁹ because so many of those who have the appearance of religious persons" are so unreliable.

John the Baptist, I was taken prisoner with you because the treacherous slut of deceitfulness killed the word of God in my mouth.'

John the Evangelist, I fell asleep with you in tender love on the breast of Jesus Christ, and then I saw and heard there such glorious marvels that my body often took leave of itself.⁴²

Peter, I have been crucified with you because things never go right for me as a human being, and spiritually I am often in pain for the praise of Jesus Christ.

Paul, I was miraculously caught up with you" and saw such a house that nothing has ever surprised me as much as the fact that I have been able since then to remain a living person. When I recall that the heavenly Father is the blessed chalice-bearer there and Jesus the chalice, the Holy Spirit the unadulterated wine, and how the whole Trinity is the full chalice and love the mistress in charge of the wine cellar, then, God knows, I would be happy indeed if love would invite me into the house. But for now I am happy to drink gall here. Ah, dear Jesus, reward all those lovingly who have here poured out bitterness for me to drink, for they have made me rich in divine favors. I received a chalice filled with gall that was so powerful that it utterly permeated my body and soul. And so I offered special prayers to God for the pourer, that he would pour out for him celestial wine. And indeed, he did so, saying: "Noble Maiden, be of good cheer. The magnitude of my wonder shall come over you. Lions shall fear you. Bears shall accept your dominion over them. Wolves shall flee you. The lamb shall be your companion." I am certain of this and, up until now it has turned out that I have had to drain many a chalice of gall because, alas, the devil still has many a one among religious people willing to pour it out. They are so full of poison that they cannot drink it all up by themselves, but must pour it out maliciously for God's children.

Stephen, I kneel next to you in front of Jewish hearts under the sharp stones, for they fall upon me large and small." Those who appear to be good people stone me from the back and run away and do not want me to know anything about its having befallen me because of them: but God saw it.

Lawrence, I was bound next to you for more than twenty years on a horrible gridiron, but God preserved me unburned and freed me more than seven years ago.

Martin, I live with you in obscurity and God's true love martyred me beyond all adversity.

Dominic, my dear Father, I have something in common with you because I have desired many a day that the sinful blood of my heart might flow beneath the feet of disbelieving heretics.

Catherine, I go with you into battle because the lords of hell want to bring me down. One of them came to me splendorous as the radiance of the sun so that I might know that he was an angel. He was carrying a shining book and said:

"Go ahead and take this kiss of peace,⁴⁵ when you cannot make it to mass."

The soul spoke with deliberate prudence: "He who has no peace himself, cannot bestow peace on me."

He went away and transformed himself and returned looking like a very wretched, sickly man whose guts were falling out and said: "Oh, you are so holy. Heal me."

The soul spoke again: "He who is himself sick cannot heal anyone."

"It is written: Who can do it better should help the other."

"It is also written: One should not help anyone against God."

"What one does for good is not against God."

"If there is nothing good about something, no one can achieve something good in its regard. You have an everlasting sickness.⁴⁶ If you want to recover, go and show yourself to a priest or a bishop or an archbishop or the pope.⁴⁷ I have no power except that of being able to sin." The he replied in rage: "That I will never do!"

Then he became like black smoke and comported himself indecently and disappeared. But I am not afraid of him.⁴⁸

Mary Magdalene, I live with you in the desert wilderness, because all things are foreign to me except God alone.

Lord heavenly Father, between you and me there goes unceasingly an imperceptible breath in which I come to know and see many marvels and inexpressible things. Unfortunately, they do me little good because I am such a worthless vessel that cannot endure your slightest spark. Unbound love dwells in the senses because it is still mixed in such a way with earthly things that a person can cry out: "Love is in grace, distant in the senses and has, alas, not yet climbed atop the soul." Many people have fallen because their soul remained unwounded.⁴⁹ Solomon and David received the Holy Spirit in their human senses, but when the senses changed, they fell into false love. God knows, their soul had not sunk into the lowest depths beneath all creatures nor was it wounded by the powerful part of love, for he who never tasted the best wine often whoops it up the most. Bound love dwells in the soul and transcends human senses and concedes the body nothing it wants.⁵⁰ It is restrained and very calm. It lowers its wings and listens for the inexpressible voice and gazes into the incomprehensible light and works with great desire to achieve the will of its Lord. If the body can still flap its wings, the soul can never reach the heights that are attainable for human beings. In this bound love the wounded soul becomes rich and her external senses very poor because the more riches God finds in her, the deeper she humbly lowers herself because of the true nobility of her love. I cannot imagine a person bound by the deepest stirrings of powerful love falling into serious sin; for the soul is bound, she has to love. May God thus bind us all!

25. The Lament of the Loving Soul; How God Protects Her and Withdraws His Gift from Her Concerning Wisdom, How the Soul Asks God How She Is and Where He Is. Concerning the Orchard, Flowers, and the Song of the Virgins

"Oh, you treasure beyond reckoning in your abundance!
Oh, you incomprehensible marvel in your variety!
Oh, you infinite glory in the power of your nobility!
How painfully I long for you
When you want to spare me;
This all creatures would not be able to express to you fully
If they were to lament on my behalf;
For I suffer inhuman anguish.
Human death I would find more pleasant.

I seek you with my thoughts
As a maiden secretly does her lover.
I shall fall terribly sick from this,
For I am bound to you.
The bond is stronger than I am,
Thus I cannot become free of love.
I cry out to you in great longing,
A lonely voice;
I hope for your coming with heavy heart,
I cannot rest, I am on fire,
Unquenchable in your burning love.
I pursue you with all my might.
If I had the strength of a giant
And if I got onto your trail,
Still I would quickly lose your tracks.
Please, my Love, run not so far ahead of me
And tarry a while in love,
So that I can catch you.

Please, Lord, just as you have taken from me all things that I have from you,
Leave me, at least, through grace that same gift
That you have given to dogs through their nature—
That I might be loyal to you in my misery,
Free of all discontent.
This I do indeed desire
More than I yearn for heaven.”

“My dear Dove, now listen to me!
My divine wisdom is so utterly upon you
That I direct all my gifts to you,
As much as your frail body can bear.
Your secret sighs shall reach me.
Your heart’s anguish can compel me.

Your sweet pursuit shall so exhaust me
That I shall yearn to cool myself
In your limpid soul,
To which I have been bound.
The sighs and tremors of your wounded heart
Have driven out my justice from you.
That suits you quite well, as it does me:

I cannot be without you.
No matter how far we are apart,
We can still never be really separated.
No matter how softly I caress you,
I inflict immense pain on your poor body.
If I were to surrender myself to you continuously, as you desire,
I would lose my delightful dwelling place on earth within you,
For a thousand bodies cannot fully satisfy the longings of a soul in love.
And so, the higher the love, the holier the martyr.”

“O Lord, you pamper to excess my dank prison,
In which I drink the water of the world and eat in great misery
The ash cake of my frailty,
And am wounded to the death
By the beam of your fiery love.
Now you leave me, Lord, lying in my misery,
My wounds untended, in great torment.”

“Queen dear to my heart,
Must you always be so impatient?
When I wound you most deeply,
I immediately apply salve most tenderly.
The abundance of my riches is yours alone,
And even over me shall you hold sway.
You are very dear to my heart.
If you have the scales, I have the gold.
All that you have done for my sake, renounced, or suffered,
I shall balance off completely and shall give myself to you forever Expecting nothing in return, just as you will.”

“Lord, two things I ask you;
In your kindness instruct me:
When my eyes weep in loneliness,
And my mouth remains mute in its simplicity,
And my tongue is constricted in affliction,
And my senses ask me again and again
What is wrong with me,
Then, Lord, everything in me is directed toward you.
When my flesh wastes away,
My blood dries up, my bones torture me,

My veins contract,
And my heart melts out of love for you,
And my soul roars
With the bellowings of a hungry lion,
Tell me, dearest One,
What will it be like for me then,
And where will you be?²⁹⁵¹

“You are like a new bride
Whose one and only lover has slipped away as she slept.
She had entrusted him with all her love
And simply cannot endure his parting from her for one hour.
When she then awakens, she can only have as much of him
As she can carry in her thoughts.
That is the source of all her lament.
As long as his bride has not been delivered to his house,
She must often be apart from her young man.
I come to you at my pleasure, when I will.
If you are patient and calm,
And hide your cares where you can,

Then the power of love shall grow in you.
Now let me tell you where I shall then be:
I am in myself in all places and in all things,
As I always have been eternally,
And I shall be waiting for you in the orchard of love
And shall pluck for you the flowers of sweet union⁵²
And shall make a bed for you out of the soft grass of holy knowledge,
And the bright sun of my eternal Godhead
Shall make you radiant with the secret wonder of my attractiveness—
A bit of which you have intimately revealed—⁵³

And I shall bend down for you the towering tree of my Holy Trinity.
Then you shall pick the green, white, and red apples of my succulent humanity,⁵⁴
And the shadow of my Holy Spirit shall protect you
From all earthly sadness.
Then you will have no thought of your heartache.
When you embrace the tree,
I shall teach you the song of the virgins—
The melody, the words, the dulcet sounds,
Which those cannot understand in the least

Who have led unchaste lives.
Still they shall receive sweet compensation.⁵⁵
Beloved, begin the song and let me hear how well you sing.”

“Alas, my dear Lover, I am hoarse in the throat of my chastity,
But the sugar of your sweet kindness
Has let my voice resound, so that I can now sing thus:
Lord, your blood and mine are one, untainted.
Your love and mine are one, inseparable.
Your garment and mine are one, immaculate.
Your mouth and mine are one, unkissed.
Your breast and mine are one, not caressed
By any man but you alone.”⁵⁶

These are the words of the song.
The voice of love and the melody of the heart must be left unrendered,
For they can be captured by no merely human hand!

26. About This Book and the Writers of This Book

I was warned against writing this book.
People said:
If one did not watch out,
It could be burned.
So I did as I used to do as a child.
When I was sad, I always had to pray.
I bowed to my Lover and said: “Alas, Lord,
Now I am saddened all because of your honor.”⁵⁷
If I am going to receive no comfort from you now,
Then you led me astray,
Because you are the one who told me to write it.”

At once God revealed himself to my joyless soul, held this book in his right hand, and said:

“My dear One, do not be overly troubled.
No one can burn the truth.
For someone to take this book out of my hand,
He must be mightier than I.
The book is threefold
And portrays me alone.
The parchment that encloses it indicates my pure, white, just humanity
That for your sake suffered death.
The words symbolize my marvelous Godhead.
It flows continuously
Into your soul from my divine mouth.
The sound of the words is a sign of my living spirit
And through it achieves genuine truth.
Now, examine all these words—
How admirably do they proclaim my personal secrets!
So have no doubts about yourself!”

“Ah, Lord, if I were a learned religious man,⁵⁸
And if you had performed this unique great miracle using him,
You would receive everlasting honor for it.
But how is one supposed to believe
That you have built a golden house on filthy ooze
And really live in it with your mother, with all creatures, and with your heavenly court?
Lord, earthly wisdom will not be able to find you there.”

“Daughter, many a wise man, because of negligence
On a big highway, has lost his precious gold
With which he was hoping to go to a famous school.
Someone is going to find it.
By nature I have acted accordingly many a day.
Wherever I bestowed special favors,
I always sought out the lowest, most insignificant, and most unknown place for them.
The highest mountains on earth cannot receive the revelations of my favors
Because the course of my Holy Spirit flows by nature downhill.
One finds many a professor learned in scripture who actually is a fool in my eyes.
And I’ll tell you something else:
It is a great honor for me with regard to them, and it very much strengthens Holy Christianity
That the unlearned mouth, aided by my Holy Spirit, teaches the learned tongue.”⁵⁹

“Alas, Lord, I sigh, desire,
And beg on behalf of your writers
Who write this book after me,⁶⁰
That you see fit to give them, too, as a reward
A favor that has never been bestowed on human beings.
Lord, your gifts are a thousand times more numerous Than your creatures who might receive them.”

Our Lord said:

“They have written it in gold letters.
All these words shall appear written on their outermost garments, forever visible in my kingdom
In heavenly shining gold above all their adornment,
Because to love freely must always be the highest value for people.”

As our Lord was speaking these words to me, I saw glorious truth in its eternal excellence.

O Lord, I beg that you preserve
This book from the eyes of evil cunning,
For this has come among us from hell.
It was never taken from heaven;
It was begotten in Lucifer's heart
And was born of spiritual pride
And was puffed up in hate
And has grown so large in powerful rage
That it imagines that no virtue is its equal.

So must God's children perish
And allow themselves to be oppressed in degradation
If they want to receive the highest honors with Jesus.
A holy watchfulness we must keep about ourselves at all times
To preserve ourselves from shortcomings.
A loving watchfulness we should have toward our fellow Christians
When they blunder, that we say to them only
That which bespeaks our good intentions toward them.
This can keep us from much wasted speech. Amen.

Book III

1. Of Heaven and the Nine Choirs and Who Is Supposed to Fill the Breach.' Of the Throne of the Apostles and St. Mary and on Which Christ Sits. Of the Reward of Preachers, Martyrs, and Virgins, and of the Unbaptized Children²

The soul spoke thus to its longing: "I beg you, go off and see where my Lover is, and tell him I want to love."

Then longing went quickly off, for it is by nature swift, and reached the heights and called out: "Great Lord, open up and let me in."

The Master of the house said:

"What is it you want that you are making such a fuss?"

"Lord, I report to you that my lady cannot live much longer in her present condition. But if you were to flow, then she could swim. A fish cannot remain alive and stay fresh long on the sand."

"Go on back. I'm not going to let you in unless you bring me the hungry soul that I desire more than anything else."

The messenger returned and the soul heard about her Lord's wish. Oh, how she trembled with love! She rose up with a deft movement and in pleasurable flight. Very soon two angels came to meet her. God sent them to her out of tender love. They said to her: "Lady Soul, what are you doing way up here? You are still clothed with dark earth."

She replied:

"Ye lords, be completely quiet about that
And see that you extend to me a better greeting.
I am going loving.
The closer you sink to earth,
The more you hide your celestial splendor;
And the higher I climb, the brighter I shine."

Then they took the soul between them and with light hearts led her forth. Then the soul first gazed upon the land of the angels where she is known and meets with no ill will, and heaven opened up before her.

She stood there, her heart melting, looked upon her Lover and said: "O Lord, when I look upon you, I have to praise you for your astonishing wisdom. Where have I come to? Am I now lost in you? I cannot even remember earth or any of my interior sufferings. On earth, when I caught sight of you, I used to wish to complain to you about many things. Now, Lord, the sight of you has struck me down. You have elevated me utterly beyond my worth."

Then she knelt down and thanked him for his favors and, taking her crown from her head, put it on the rose-colored scars on his feet and begged that she might come closer to him. He took her in his divine arms and laid his fatherly hand on her breast and looked her in the face. Well, was she kissed at all? In the kiss she was drawn up to the most sublime heights above all the angel choirs. The least truth that I saw and heard and understood there was incomparably more than the loftiest wisdom ever uttered here on earth. I saw there things never heard before, my confessors tell me, for I am ignorant of reading or writing. And now I fear God if I keep silent, but I fear uncomprehending people if I write. Dear people, what can I do about it that this happens to me and that it has often happened? In humble simplicity, in lonely poverty, and in demeaning shame did God show me his wonders.

There I saw the creation and order of God's house, which he himself built with his mouth.' In it he put what was most dear that he had made with his hands. The creation of the house is called heaven; the choirs in it are called kingdom. Hence one says kingdom of heaven. The kingdom of heaven has a boundary as to where it is placed, but as to its being a boundary will never be found. Heaven goes around the choirs, and between heaven and the lovely choirs the worldly sinners are placed, always equal in height to the choirs, that they better themselves and convert. The choirs are so delicate, holy, and marvelous that no one can enter without chastity, love, and renunciation of all things. For they were all holy who fell from there, and accordingly they must also be holy who enter. All newly baptized and children up to six years fill the breach not higher than to the sixth choir. Then up to the Seraphim those virgins shall fill the breach who defiled themselves by their childish disposition, but never did so in deed, and who cleansed themselves afterward in confession. Still, they cannot recover from it completely since they have lost their purity. Those who are pure spiritual virgins shall after the last judgment fill the breach above the Seraphim, from where Lucifer and those closest to him were cast out. Lucifer committed at one and the same time three mortal sins: hatred, pride, and greed. These caused the choir to tumble into the eternal abyss as fast as one can say "alleluia. Then the whole kingdom was struck with terror and all the pillars of the kingdom of heaven shook. Then some of the others fell as well.'

The desolation' is as yet empty and bare. No one is there, and it is utterly pure in itself and sparkles with delight to God's honor. Above the desolation is God's throne vaulted with God's strength in blossoming, shining, fiery brightness, and it descends to the heaven opposite the Cherubim, so that God's throne and heaven are one glorious house; and the desolation and the nine choirs are enclosed within it. Above God's throne there is nothing but God, God, God. God infinitely great. Above on the throne one sees the mirror of the Godhead, the likeness of Humanity, the light of the Holy Spirit, and one understands how these three are one God and how they fit together into one. I am able to say no more about this.

John the Baptist will fill Lucifer's breach and will possess his honor in the sweet desolation above the Seraphim, and all pure spiritual virgins together with him. They are all destined for this desolation.

On the throne is our Lady, St. Mary, who shall not fill a breach; for with her Child she has healed the wounds of all men who accepted grace and could and willed to preserve it. Her Son is God and she a goddess. No one can be compared to her. The apostles dwell closest of all to God on the throne and have the empty places among the Seraphim as their reward according to how pure they are. John the Baptist is also a prince at the throne. Angels dwell no higher than the Seraphim. Those above will all be human beings. The holy martyrs and God's preachers and spiritual lovers enter into the choirs even though they are not virgins. Indeed, they enter gloriously into the Cherubim!

There without asking I saw the reward of preachers as it shall come about. Their chairs are wondrous, their reward is special. The front legs of the chairs are two burning lights. They signify true love, holy example, and faithful intent. The backs of the chairs are so pleasantly free and sweet in delightful repose-more than one can express-in contrast to the strict obedience to which they were subjected here. Their feet are adorned with various kinds of precious stones, so beautiful that I would truly be filled with joy to receive such magnificence as a crown. This they have because of the exertion required of their feet on earth. O ye preachers, how unwillingly now do you move your tongues and so grudgingly incline your ears to the mouth of the sinner! I saw in God's presence that in the kingdom of heaven it shall happen that breath shall shine forth from your mouths which will ascend from the choirs to the throne and will praise the heavenly Father for the wisdom that he placed on your tongues; and it will greet the Son for his glorious company, for he was a preacher himself; and it will thank the Holy Spirit for his grace, for he is Master of all gifts.

Then God's preachers, the holy martyrs, and the loving virgins shall stand up, for the highest honor is given them in the form of special garments, delightful song, and marvelous garlands, which they wear to God's honor. The virgins' garments are white as lilies. The preachers' garments are fiery, bright as the sun. The martyrs' garments are glowing rose-colored because they suffered with Jesus a bloody death. The virgins' garland is many colored; the crown of the martyrs is large, catching the eye. The preachers' garland is made entirely of flowers. These are the words of God through which they have come into great honor here. Thus does this throng of three blessed bands go merrily forth into the presence of the Trinity, dancing finely in a circle. Then toward them a threefold stream flows out playfully from God, filling their minds and hearts so that they sing the truth effortlessly with joy, as God had entrusted it to them.

The preachers sing thus: "O chosen Lord, we have followed your generous kindness in voluntary poverty and have gathered together your straying sheep whom your hired shepherds let go off the right path."

The martyrs sing thus: "Lord, your innocent blood has made our death full, so that we are sharers in your suffering."9

The blessed, who now live so blissfully in heaven hovering weightlessly, are all suffused with light and are permeated with love flowing through them and are united in one will, and yet they do not have the dignity that attaches to their glorious chairs."

They rest in God's strength and flow in bliss, keeping themselves in God's breath, as does the air in the sun. But after the last day, when God shall hold his festive dinner, one shall seat the brides opposite their Bridegroom and thus shall love come to love, body to soul, and they shall possess full power in eternal glory.

O you charming Lamb and delightful Youth, Jesus, Child of the heavenly Father, when you then rise and pass through all the choirs waving lovingly to the virgins, they shall follow you filled with praise to that most overwhelming place of which I can say no more to anyone. How they shall then entertain themselves with you and devour your love's desire-that is such intimate sweetness and intense oneness-that I know nothing equal to it.

The widows shall follow as well in heartfelt yearning and will be utterly fulfilled in sweet contemplation when they shall see how the Lamb joins the virgins. Married people, too, shall look on lovingly in the measure possible to them according to their nobility, for the more one satisfies oneself with earthly things here, the less heavenly bliss shall be left over for us there.

The choirs each have a special light illuminating them and heaven has its own as well. The light is so extraordinarily glorious that I cannot and may not describe it. Many a dignity has been bestowed by God on the choirs and on heaven, and I can say a word or two about each-about as much as the honey a bee might carry off on its feet from a full hive.

In the first choir¹¹ bliss is the most exalted among all the gifts they have.

In the second choir it is meekness.

In the third choir it is charm.

In the fourth it is sweetness.

In the fifth it is cheerfulness.

In the sixth it is noble fragrance.

In the seventh it is abundance.

In the eighth dignity.

In the ninth burning with love.

In the sweet desolation¹² it is pure holiness.

The most exalted thing on the throne is mighty honor and strong dominion. Towering above everything that was ever in heaven is a sense of wonder. The most sublime thing is that they may behold that which is now happening and shall happen forever. Ah, the grand expanse and sweet eternity and the keen power to see into all things and the special intimacy that unceasingly exists between God and each individual soul is of such overwhelming tenderness that even if I had the wisdom of all mankind and the voices of all the angels, I would be incapable of describing it.

Unbaptized children less than five years old dwell in their own special honor, which God from his kingdom has provided for them. They do not have the qualities of someone thirty years old because they were not Christians with Christ." They do not have a crown; God cannot reward them for anything. And yet he has granted them in his goodness that they live in great comfort. The highest thing they possess is an abundance of favors. They sing thus:

"We praise him who created us,
But whom we have never seen.
If we were suffering pain,
We would forever lament;
But, as it is, we are doing quite well."

Now some people might be surprised how I, a sinful person, can undertake to write such a description. I tell you in utter truth: If seven years ago, God had not offered support to my heart with special favor, I would still be silent and would never have written this. Now, because of God's goodness, no harm has come to me from it. This is because of the obvious lowliness I reflect-which is so clearly manifest to my soul-and the nobility of favors that are contained in God's true gift. Indeed, the higher the soul has climbed, the less praise one should give to the body in word and deed. One should also not complain about the troubles one sees, for he¹⁴ is by nature a coward. Rather, one should treat him like an old pensioner who can no longer serve at court, and so one gives him alms purely for the love of God. This is truly of practical value. The nobler the dog, the tighter the collar!"

Well, dear Lord, I commend this description to your generous goodness and ask, my dear One, with sighing heart, with weeping eyes, and with desolate soul that no Pharisee may ever read it. And I ask, in addition, dear Lord, that your children find that meaning in the text which you, Lord, in authentic truth have given it."

2. How the Soul Praises God and God the Soul for Seven Things. Of Balsam and Waiting

"O sweet Jesus, most handsome Image, unconcealed to my exiled soul in distress and in love! In love I praise you through yourself in distress and in love in union with all creatures; I yearn to do this above all things.

Lord, you are the sun for all eyes;
You are the delight of all ears;
You are the voice of all words;
You are the force behind all piety;
You are the teaching of all wisdom;
You are the life of all that lives;
You are the ordering of all that is."

Then God praised the loving soul in fine words. He took great delight in doing so:

"You are a light to my eyes;
You are a lyre to my ears;
You are a voice for my words;

You are a projection of my piety;
You are an honor to my piety;
You are a life living in me;
You are a praise in my being."

"Lord, you are constantly lovesick for me.
That you have clearly shown personally.
You have written me into your book of the Godhead;
You have painted me in your humanity;
You have buried me in your side, in your hands and feet.
Ah, allow me, dear One, to pour balsam upon you."

"O One dear to my heart, where shall you find the balm?"

"O Lord, I was going to tear the heart of my soul in two and intended to put you in it."

"You could never give me a more soothing balsam than to let me unceasingly lie weightlessly in your soul."

"Lord, if you were to take me home with you, I would be your physician forever."

"Yes, I want that.
Still, my solicitude bids you wait;
My love bids you labor;
My patience bids you keep silent;
My concern bids you suffer poverty;
My dishonor bids you bear up;
My sufficiency bids you refrain from complaint;
My victory bids you pursue to the end all virtues;
My goal bids you endure many things;
For this you shall have glory when I remove your heavy burden."

3. A Lament That the Soul Is a Maidservant for the Love of God

"O Lord, what a poor and forsaken soul it is that here on earth is a maidservant for love of you. Oh, who shall help me lament what pain she suffers? For she herself has no idea what it is that she is renouncing!"

"Mistress Bride," in the Book of Love you say to your Lover that he should flee from you.¹⁸ Tell me urgently, Lady, what caused you to do this? For I would rather die, if I might do so in pure love, than in darkened wisdom bid God depart from me. If I may play intimately with my Lover, there is no need for wisdom to teach me about separation. But when I busy myself with other things with my five senses, then I willingly accept its bringing me holy moderation."¹⁹

[The bride speaks:] "Listen to me, dear Playmate! I was pleasantly half drunk with love; this is why I speak tenderly from the senses. But whenever I become utterly inebriated, I cannot even think of my body; for love commands me. What she wants has to be. And what God hopes for I boldly undertake. If he takes my life, my soul belongs to him. If you wish to go with me into the wine cellar, it is going to cost you. If you have a thousand marks, you will use it up in an hour. If you drink the wine undiluted, you spend more than you have, and the innkeeper cannot fill your glass to the brim. Then you shall become poor and naked and despised by all those who prefer to enjoy the ooze rather than squander their hoard in the lofty wine cellar. You must also endure the envy of those who go with you into the wine cellar. Oh, how much will they often despise you because they will not risk the great expense! They want to mix water with their wine."

"Dear Mistress Bride, I shall willingly consume everything I have in the tavern. Let me be pulled through the coals of love and be struck with the firebrands of humiliation, so that I might very often enter the blessed wine cellar. This I gladly choose because regarding love I cannot lose. And so he who tortures and despises me actually pours out for me the innkeeper's wine that he himself drank. From that wine I shall become so drunk that I shall truly become so subordinate to all creatures that it seems to me, given my human lowliness and the baseness I have taken on, that no one has ever so wronged me as to have committed some sin against me, wretch that I am. Therefore, I cannot take revenge on my enemies for my sufferings, even though I well know that they may not break God's commandment in their treatment of me."

"Dear Playmate, if it happens that they close the wine cellar, then you will have to go out onto the road hungry, poor, naked, and so despised that you have no Christian sustenance left except faith. If you can then still love, you shall never go to ruin."

"Mistress Bride, I have such a hunger for the heavenly Father that I forget all cares. And I so thirst for his Son that it removes from me all earthly desires. And I have such a need for the Spirit of them both that it goes beyond the wisdom of the Father, which I cannot grasp; and beyond the Son's suffering, which I cannot bear; and beyond the consolation of the Holy Spirit, which I cannot receive."

Whoever becomes entangled in longing such as this must forever hang blessedly fettered in God.

4. How Our Lady St. Mary Can Sin and How Not, the Holy Spirit Teaches This

O Mary, glorious Empress, God's Mother and my Lady! I was asked concerning you whether you were able to sin like other humans when you were on this sinful earth. Now the Holy Spirit, who knows fully all your secrets, has instructed me, Lady, that you were able to sin; for you had been created a full human being in your complete feminine nature and in full virginity. There was no deficiency in your nature, and that makes your lifelong chastity noble and precious in God's eyes.

But, Lady, noble Goddess above all pure humans, you were also able not to sin. This you had not from yourself, for the heavenly Father watched over your childhood with the foresight of his having chosen you long before, and the Holy Spirit bound your youth with the fullness of his fresh love, and Jesus so passed through your body as the dew through a flower that your chastity was never touched. And the power of the Holy Trinity had so pervaded your nature that it did not dare, nor could it, experience all-too-human stirrings. And the eternal wisdom of the almighty Godhead gave you, Lady, a shadow in which you kept your human life so that you could suffer pain, despite not sinning, and so that your thriving humanity would not perish under the sun of the powerful Godhead. In this shadow you carried Jesus in human fashion and, as his mother, raised him. However, Lady, in the message from the Father,²⁰ in the conception from the Holy Spirit, and in the birth of the Son, Lady, the fire of the Godhead and the light of the Holy Spirit and the wisdom of the Son were so great in you that you could hardly notice the shadow. God knows, Lady, later you would turn wretchedly cold in poverty, in trials, and in heartache. In spite of this, in your heart you continued to burn brightly in good works from that fire which burns in itself unaided without a beginning. This, Lady, pierced your walls with light and drove all darkness from your house.

5. How the Soul Complains That She Hears No Mass Nor Hours²¹ and How God Praises Her in Ten Things

Thus did a forsaken soul complain when God excluded her from his ecstatic love and loved her by means of great suffering: "Alas, how sulkingly does a rich man bear it when after glorious wealth he is led into great poverty!"

And she says: "Oh, Lord, now I am extremely destitute in my sickly body and am so miserable in my soul which is so lacking in spiritual order that no one recites the hours of the office in my presence and no one celebrates holy mass for me!"

The loving Mouth spoke, the Mouth that wounded my soul so terribly with his sublime words that I never received worthily:

"You are the feelings of love in my desire.
You are a sweet cooling for my breast.
You are a passionate kiss for my mouth.
You are a blissful joy of my discovery.
I am in you
And you are in me.
We could not be closer,
For we two have flowed into one
And have been poured into one mold.
Thus shall we remain forever content."

"Ah, dear One, how intimately you speak to me. And yet I never dare think upon these words in joy. For I constantly notice with anguish the stench of that dead mongrel, my body; and others of my enemies are always assailing me; and I, Lord, when I consider the matter, have no idea how things shall turn out for me in the end. What is more, just beholding you I lose all awareness of suffering. Thus, Lord, have you taken me from myself and have stealthily entered into me. What you then promised me, may it happen and may it result in your praise."

Our Lord answers thus:

"Downward I reach,
Widely I roam,
Upward I yearn,
Long I wait.

"Again I must teach you: Noble maidens pay a high price for their good breeding. They must maintain restraint in all their suffering and must often tremble before their governess. So it is with my brides on earth as to their bodies. On earth I was oppressively enclosed for love of you, and my raging enemies bore my death in their hands before my very eyes, and in shame I suffered dire poverty. In all this I trusted my Father's infinite goodness. Direct your spirit accordingly."

6. If You Would Follow God Rightly, You Should Have Seven Things

Whoever wants to follow God in faithful toil should not stand quietly. He should often rouse himself. He should consider what he was in sin, how he is now in virtue, and what can yet become of him if he falls. He should lament and praise and pray day and night. When the faithful bride awakens, she thinks of her lover. If she cannot possess him then, she begins to weep. Alas, how often this happens spiritually to God's brides!

7. Concerning Seven Obvious Enemies of Our Happiness That Cause Seven Kinds of Harm

Aimless activity is a very harmful trait for us. Bad habits harm us everywhere. Earthly desires blot out in us the holy word of God. Base strife because of self-will brings about in us many a harmful murder. Enmity in our heart drives out the Holy Spirit. An angry temperament robs us of God's intimacy. False holiness can never win out. Pure love of God can never perish. If we are not willing to leave these enemies, they will take from us more than heaven; for if we live holy lives here, it is a pre-heavenly existence. But if we allow these enemies their deceptions and their power over us, they rob us of the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, and they extinguish for us the true light of the genuine love of God. They also blind our eyes to holy understanding and lead us thus blinded into the seven capital sins. Where else does that path lead but to the eternal abyss?

8. Seven Things That All Priests Should Have

The heavenly Father told me seven things that every priest of God should have and said: "They should be innocent in their persons, and the accoutrements for saying mass should be perfect. If there is any doubt about it, one should refrain from it²² and not do it. They should lay aside all fear from themselves and should forget the Jewish law and should eat my Lamb alive and should drink his blood sighing. Thus they can rightly call to mind his great passion. But if he has some personal guilt, then my children eat the Bread of Heaven and Judas goes to hell.²¹ And if the accoutrements for mass are not perfect, then God's table stands empty and the children's food is taken from them. But if they come into danger of death because of their age, it is better for them that they spill their own blood than his.

9. Concerning the Beginning of All Things That God Created out of Love

O Father of all goodness, I, an unworthy person, thank you for the faithful caring by which you have drawn me out of myself into your wondrous self in such a way that I have heard you in your whole Trinity and have witnessed the exalted decisions that took place before our time when you, Lord, were enclosed within yourself alone and your indescribable bliss was shared by no one. The Three Persons sent forth beautifully the beams of light in unison, each of them illumined by the other while remaining utterly one. The Father was adorned in his Person with the robust character of omnipotence; the Son was equal to the Father in infinite wisdom; and the Holy Spirit was equal to them both in full generosity.

Then the Holy Spirit in his superabundance played for the Father, plucking the Holy Trinity," and said to him: "Lord, dear Father, I shall give you out of yourself generous advice. We no longer wish to go on thus, not bearing fruit. We shall have a created kingdom and you shall form the angels in my image so that they are one spirit with me. For, dear Father, that alone is true joy, that in great love and infinite happiness one gather them in your sight."

The Father said: "You are one spirit with me. What you suggest and want is to my liking."

When the angel was created-you well know how it happened: If the angels' fall had been avoided, man would still have had to be created. The Holy Spirit shared his generosity with the angels, so that they serve us and are happy at the blessedness of us all.

Then the eternal Son spoke with great refinement: "Dear Father, my nature shall also bear fruit. Now that we want to undertake wondrous things, let us make man in my image. Even though I foresee great tragedy, I still shall love man forever."

The Father said: "Son, a powerful desire stirs in my divine breast as well, and I swell in love alone. We shall become fruitful so that we shall be loved in return, and so that our glory in some small way shall be recognized. I shall make a bride for myself who shall greet me with her mouth and wound me with her beauty. Only then does love really begin."

Then the Holy Spirit spoke to the Father: "Yes, dear Father, I shall deliver the bride to your bed."

And the Son spoke: "Father, you well know I shall yet die for love. Still, we want to begin these things joyfully in great holiness."

Then the Holy Trinity bent down to the creation of all things and created us body and soul in infinite love. Adam and Eve were formed and given a noble nature according to the eternal Son, who was born of the Father without a beginning. Then the Son shared with Adam his heavenly wisdom and his earthly power so that he possessed true knowledge and holy understanding in perfect love, and that he might command all earthly creatures. This is now rare indeed for us.

From the goodness of his heart God gave Adam a refined, noble, and delicate lady-that was Eve-and bestowed upon her the loving excellent moderation that his Son possesses to his Father's honor. Their bodies were to be pure, for God created for them no shameful members; and they were clothed with angels' garments. Their children were to be gotten in sacred love just as the rays of the sun play upon the water, though the water remains intact. But when they ate the forbidden food, they became shamefully deformed in their bodies, as is still evident in us. If the Holy Trinity had created us so hideous, we could never be ashamed of our being because of its noble nature.

The heavenly Father bestowed his divine love on the soul and said: "I am the God of gods; you are the goddess of all creatures, and I give you my solemn assurance²⁵ that I shall never reject you. If you do not yourself lose your way, my angels shall serve you forever. I shall give you my Holy Spirit as a chamberlain, so that you may not unknowingly fall into any serious sin. And I give you free will in abundance. Dearest Love above all loves, be prudently on your guard. You shall obey a small commandment, so that you will remember that I am your God."

The unblemished sustenance that God promised them in paradise was supposed to remain in great holiness in their bodies. But when they had eaten the disgusting food that did not agree with their pure bodies, they became so filled with poison that they lost the purity of the angels and forgot their virginal chastity. Then for many a year the soul cried out in great darkness for her Lover. Her voice filled with misery, she cried: "O Lord, dear One, where has your most delectable love gone? How bitterly have you called your wife and queen a whore! That is the meaning of the prophets .²¹ O great Lord, how can you bear this endless distress and do not give the death to our death? If only you were to be born. But, Lord, since all your deeds are perfect, so is your wrath."

Then another council convened in the Holy Trinity. The eternal Father said: "I regret my work. I gave my Holy Trinity such an admirable bride that the highest angels were to be her servants. Indeed, if Lucifer had retained his honor, she would have been his goddess, for to her alone was given the bridal bed. She decided not to remain in my likeness. Now she is ugly and hideously deformed. Who might accept this filth?"

But look! The eternal Son then knelt before his Father and said: "Dear Father, I shall be the one. If you will give me your blessing, I shall take bloody humanity upon myself. I shall anoint man's wounds with the blood of my innocence and shall bind all man's sores with the cloth of wretched disgrace until my end; and I shall, dearest Father, atone to you for human guilt by means of a human death."

Then the Holy Spirit said to the Father: "O almighty God, we shall form a splendid procession and shall go forth unchanged in great glory down from these heights. I was formerly, after all, Mary's chamberlain."

The Father then bowed to the wills of them both with great love and said to the Holy Spirit: "You shall carry my light before my dear Son into all the hearts that he shall move with my words. And, Son, you shall take up your cross. I shall traverse with you all your paths and I shall give you a pure virgin as your mother so that you might the more gloriously bear up under inglorious humanity."

Then in great joy the grand procession came down to the temple of Solomon.^{2'} There almighty God would be sheltered for nine months.

10. The Passion That the Loving Soul Has from God, and How She Rises and Ascends into Heaven²⁸

The loving soul betrays her true love in sighing for God.
She is sold in holy grief for his love.
She is sought with the host of many tears for her dear Lord,
Whom she likes so well.
She is captured in the first experience
When God kisses her in sweet union.
She is assailed with many a holy thought
That she not waver when she mortifies her flesh.
She is bound by the power of the Holy Spirit,
And her bliss is indeed manifold.

She is slapped with the great powerlessness
Of not being able to enjoy without interruption eternal light.
She is brought to judgment trembling with shame
Because God so often avoids her
Because of the stains of her sins.
She responds to all things in a holy manner
And cannot bear to treat anyone shamefully.
She is beaten at her trial
When the devils try her spiritually.
She is sent to Herod
When she recognizes herself to be worthless and unworthy
And despises herself with the great army of her thoughts.
She is delivered up to Pilate again

When she has to concern herself with earthly affairs.
She is buffeted and beaten with severe blows
When she must return to her body.
She is stripped of all things
When God clothes her with the silk of fair love.
She is delightfully crowned with manifold faithfulness
When she desires that God no longer reward her for all her woes,
Except to promote in the highest God's honor.
She is ridiculed in holy simplicity²⁹
When she is completely dissolved into God
That she forgets all earthly wisdom.
One kneels before her in great shame
When in delicate humility she puts herself under the feet of all creatures.

Her eyes are bound with her body's baseness
Because she is so utterly imprisoned in its darkness.
She carries her cross on a sweet path
When she truly surrenders herself to God in all sufferings.
Her head is struck with a reed
When one compares her great holiness to a fool.
With the hammer of the chase of love³⁰ she is nailed so fast to the cross
That all creatures are not able to call her back again.
She suffers terrible thirst on the cross of love as well,
For she would like to drink the pure wine of all God's children.
But they all come thronging and offer her gall.
Her body is killed in living love

When her spirit is raised aloft above all human senses.
After this death she descends into hell with her might
And consoles the dejected souls with her prayer about God's goodness
Without her body's knowing it.
She is pierced in the side by a blind man
With a sweet spear of innocent love.
From her heart flows forth many a holy teaching.
She hangs on the cross of sublime love,
High in the air of the Holy Spirit,
Facing the eternal sun of the living Godhead,
So that she becomes completely dry and bare of all earthly things.

Then in a holy ending she is taken from her cross
And speaks: "Father, receive my spirit; now everything is perfect."
She is interred in a sealed grave of deep humility,
When she becomes ever aware of being the most unworthy of all creatures.

She also rises joyfully on an Easter Day
After she has enjoyed a lament of love
With her Lover on the narrow bridal bed.
Then she consoles her disciples and Mary early in the morning
When she receives from God true assurance
That God has blotted out all her sins
Because of her love and sorrow.
She comes again to her disciples with the door shut
When she often repeats for her five senses the holy teaching of God.
Then she goes forth from the Jerusalem of Holy Christianity
With many a virtuous throng when the body becomes sad,

Which with its whole being in all its baseness would like to follow its own will.
And she says: "I am your master.
You shall follow me and obey in all things.
If I were not going to my Father,
You would remain as fools."
She also ascends into heaven
When God takes from her all earthly things in holy transformation.
She is received in a white cloud of holy protection
When she ascends in love and joyfully comes back again, free of all trouble.
Then the angels return and console the men of Galilee
When we call to mind God's chosen friends and their holy example.

This passion is suffered by every soul that in holy moderation of all her activity is truly permeated by genuine love of God.

11. Between God and the Loving Soul All Things Are Beautiful

When the loving soul gazes into the eternal mirror, she says: "Lord, between you and me all things are beautiful; and between the devil and his bride, the damned soul, all things are hideous and horrible indeed. When she remembers dear Jesus, she shudders and all her hellish suffering begins anew."

12. You Should Praise, Thank, Desire, and Beg. Concerning the Lantern and the Light

Oh, dear Lord, how poor I then was when I was not able either to remember all these words nor pray nor love! Yet I strove toward you with my forsaken senses and spoke thus: "Oh, dear Lord, by what means shall I now glorify you?"

And you said to the most worthless person you ever created:

"You should praise me for my faithful protection.
You should thank me for my generous gifts.
You should desire my holy wonder.
You should beg for a good end."

Then the soul asked in reverence: "Dearest, what wonder should I desire?" This I must continue writing, weeping all the while. May God help me, the poorest of humans, that I remain in Jesus!

My Lover then spoke thus: "I shall place the light onto the lantern, and for all those whose eyes look upon the light a special beam shall shine from the light into the eye of their knowledge."

The soul then asked with great submissiveness but without fear: "Dearest, what is the lantern supposed to be?"

Our Lord said: "I am the light and your breast is the lantern."

13. Sixteen Kinds of Love

Lavish love arising from holy mercy drives out empty honor and evil sickness.

True love arising from divine wisdom brings satisfaction and drives out contemptible lust.

Humble love arising from holy simplicity alone conquers pride and brings the soul forcefully into holy knowledge.

Constant love arising from good manners cannot engage in duplicity.

Grand love arising from a bold deed finds for itself good counsel in all things.

Love that has discovered God's intimacy effortlessly blinds the earth.

Bound love of holy habit never rests, yet lives with ease within itself.

Permeating love arising from great overflowing lies completely at rest and finds all things bitter but God alone.

Love that calls out from noble impatience is never silent and has happily forgotten all guilt.

Love that understands God's teaching is quick to incline to a child.

Beautiful love in its exalted power rejuvenates the soul, though the body become old.

Lovely love with guileless gift blots out the surly heart's complaint.

Powerful love of rich delicacies has the sweetest pleasure in God.

Hidden love turns precious treasure from good will into holy deed.

Bright love of playful flood causes the soul sweet distress. It causes her to die without death.

Stormy love arising from great power-that is something no one can grasp.

14. Concerning False Virtues; Whoever Dwells Therein Lives in Lies

I have a teacher; it is the Holy Spirit. He teaches me very gently what he wants. Other things he withholds from me. He speaks thus:

Wisdom without grounding in the Holy Spirit turns in the end into a mountain of arrogance.

Peace without the bond of the Holy Spirit very soon becomes empty frenzy.

Humility without the fire of love ends in open hypocrisy.

Justice without the depth of God's humility immediately turns into fierce hatred.

Poverty with constant cupidity is in itself sinful prodigality.

Dreadful fear caused by real guilt brings repulsive impatience.

Right-seeming conduct with wolfish intent is quickly seen through by the wise.

Holy desire out of full integrity is attained by no one without great effort.

A good life without adversity becomes lazy in pursuing useful things.

Presumptuous virtue without God's gift will be struck down by pride.

Lofty promises not kept by deed are duplicity counseled by the devil.

Sweet consolation without true security of the soul and approval of the Holy Spirit leads in the end to a miserable death.

Great patience without inclining one's heart to God is secret guilt, for all who are not sustained by God's truth in all things shall in great shame slip away from God eternal.

Love that does not have humility as its mother and holy fear as its father is orphaned from all virtues.

15. You Should Approach God's Table with Eight Virtues. By Ransom a Person Released Seventy Thousand Souls from Ghastly Purgatory, Which Is of Many Kinds

O you terribly foolish beguines, how can you be so insolent that you do not tremble before our almighty judge, since you so frequently receive the Body of God out of blind habit. Though I am the least among you, I must feel shame, blush, and tremble.

On a certain holy day I was so troubled that I did not dare receive him, because I was ashamed of my best piety in his eyes. So I asked my very dear One that he deign show me his honor in this matter. He said: "Truly, if you go before me in humble sorrow and holy fear, I shall follow you as the high waters follow the deep millstream. But if you come to me with the blossoming yearning of flowing love, I must go to meet you and caress you with my divine nature as my one and only queen."

I have to make my presence known if I am truly to be able to bring about God's goodness. And that" really does not hold me back any more than it impairs an oven to shove in a full load of white rolls. And so I went to God's table in a noble throng. They watched over me with much concern, but also exposed me to much harsh treatment:

Truth was cross with me.

Fear scolded me.

Shame scourged me.

Sorrow condemned me.

Yearning pulled me.

Love led me.

Christian faith shielded me.

Pure intention in all good things prepared me.

And all my good works sounded alarm over me.

Mighty God received me.

His pure humanity united itself to me.

His Holy Spirit consoled me.

Then I said: "Lord, now you are mine, for you have been given to me today especially in the passage where it says: 'A boy is given to us.'" Now, Lord, I desire your praise and not my advantage, that today your glorious body might come as consolation to the poor souls.' You are truly mine. Now, Lord, you shall be today a ransom for those imprisoned."

Then she received such power that with his strength she led him, and they came to as grim a place as ever was seen by human eye-a horrifying bath, a mixture of fire and pitch, of muck, smoke, and stench. A thick dark fog was drawn over it like a black hat. The souls were lying in it like toads in filth. Their form was like that of humans, and yet they were spirits and had about them a similarity to the devil. They boiled and roasted all together. They screamed and suffered countless torments because of their flesh, which had plunged them so deep. Flesh had blinded their spirit. This caused them to boil the most. The spirit of the person spoke: "O Lord, how many are there of these poor beings? You are my real price of ransom. You simply must show mercy."

Our Lord said: "They go beyond human numbering and you cannot comprehend their number as long as your flesh has an earthly share of you. They were all broken vessels and while on earth neglected the spiritual life. They are from all walks of life and from all lands."

Then the human spirit asked: "Alas, dear Lord, where are the hermits? I don't see any of them here."

Our Lord answered: "They sinned in secret. Now they are alone at the bottom, bound together with the devils."

Then the soul of the person became very sad and prostrated herself at the feet of our very dear Lord and yearned powerfully and toiled lovingly and said: "Very dear One, you know full well what I desire."

Our Lord said: "It was right for you to bring me here. I shall not let them go unremembered."

Around them stood an immense throng of devils that tended them in the accursed bath. They also were beyond my reckoning. They rubbed them, washed them, ate them, and were sated; and they struck them with fiery scourges. The spirit of the person spoke to them thus: "Listen, you devourers of sin, look upon this ransom. Is it not of such value that you will be satisfied with it?"

At that they all shuddered, quaking in ghastly shame, and said: "Yes, just lead them away. However wretched we may be, we have to speak the truth to you."

Then our Lord from his divine heart fulfilled a delightful wish for the poor souls. In great joy and love they arose. The stranger soul said: "Alas, very dear Lord, where shall they go now?"

He said: "I shall bring them to a mountain covered with flowers. There they shall find more happiness than I know how to express."

Then our Lord served them and was their chamberlain and their very dear companion. Our Lord told me that there were seventy thousand of them. The soul then asked how long their torment had lasted. Our Lord said: "They have been separated from their bodies for thirty years, and for ten more years they would have been in torment, had not such a precious ransom been offered for them."

The devils fled from them and did not dare accept it. "Dear One," said the soul, "how long shall they be here?"

Our Lord answered and said: "As long as seems good to us."

16. After a Gift There Follows a Scourge and After Disgrace Honor

The soul reminded our Lord of his earlier words thus: "Lord, you said there is no gift on earth that does not have a scourge connected with it. You said this to me with your own mouth and have afterward many a time carried through on it with respect to me. You also told me more than six years ago that religious people³" would hold me in great contempt. This they are still doing persistently and have done it viciously at times. Is that, Lord, the wonder I am supposed to long for?"

Our Lord answered and said: "My Father gave me power over his truth and the craft of his holiness; afterward he subjected me to numerous humiliations. Still later he gave me great honor and infinite dignity. In this same way do I wish to give my Holy Trinity to you."

17. The Purgatory of a Religious Person, His Five Kinds of Help out of the Torment, and the Nobility of the Order of Preachers

I also saw a religious man suffering. During his life I had a high opinion of him. For three months I prayed for his soul with anguished heart, that it might never happen that I might have to look upon his distress until the evening of the last day.

When he gave up his spirit, he was immediately shown to me in the prayer I was saying for the poor souls. I saw him alone, and he was not able to show me his suffering. He was pale in a white mist. I asked: "Alas, why did you not go to heaven?"

He answered me in obscure speech, ruefully ashamed and weeping all the while as he read from a book. All the words were screaming at him with all the books that he had ever read chiming in. He said: "In my life on earth I was too fond of ideas, words, and deeds."

Two dragons were lying at his feet and sucked out of him all the consolation that he was supposed to receive from Holy Christianity in return for meager obedience, since he for no reason wanted to live according to his own will rather than according to the determinations of his superiors. I asked him: "Where are the enemies who are supposed to torment you?"

He answered: "Because of the dignity of my order no devil was ever able to touch me. I had a great struggle with my body, and I wanted to achieve a certain thing that would have been very harmful if I had been successful. Because of this God did not let me live any longer. I am burning within myself; my own will must torment me."

I asked: "Alas, tell me, how can anyone help you?"

He said: "If a person were to offer up a hundred venias,'S twelve disciplines," and many tears with a sorrowful heart from pure eyes every day for a year, that would be a penance for me. And one should say masses for me. Alas, tell virgins' and priests that they should pray for me. The end of my torment I do not want to describe for you because I do not want to sadden my brothers" with it. Now, leave me!"

Then he took on the likeness of the devil, burned, and became mute toward me.

18. A Knight's Battle in Full Armor Against Sensual Desires

I prayed for a person, as I was bid, that God might free him from those desires of the body that occur without sin for the reason that an evil will does not cause them. But our Lord said: "Stop such talk! Would it please you if there were a knight fully armed, with noble prowess, true manliness, and able hands who had nothing to do, neglected his lord's honor, and lost his rich recompense and the ringing of worthy praise that is the due both of the lord and the knight of the realm? Another thing: if there were a liegeman without armor who never came to battle because he lacked the equipment-if such a person would then take part in a tournament of princes, he would promptly lose his life." For this reason I have to spare people who are so prone to fall. I let such people do battle with children so that they win a garland of flowers as a reward."

19. Two Kinds of Poor People: Those Who Are Cheerfully Poor and Those Who Are Unhappily So

I have seen two kinds of poor people. The ones are cheerfully poor and are always in fear that they will receive too much of this poor earth. The others are involuntarily and quite unhappily poor, and they constantly run around in great anxiety that nothing on this poor earth will ever be theirs. Our Lord commented on this and said: "The unhappily poor are within my justice, for if they had an abundance of earthly things, they would not care to return my love with love nor to know me to the benefit of their holiness. And so I must win them by being very hard on them. To those who are cheerfully poor I give more than they dare desire, but I cannot bear the dust on them that comes from their excessively weighing themselves down with earthly things; and I desire that their hearts remain ever open to me and that I might, unimpeded and unceasingly, illumine them and shine through them and they in turn into mine."

20. The Five Prophets Who Illumine This Book

Our Lord promised me he wanted to illumine this book with five lights:

Moses' great intimacy," his holy efforts, special humiliation, which he suffered through no fault of his own, his glorious won ders, his joyful teaching, and the intimate conversations that he was chosen frequently to have face to face with God eternal 12 on the high mountain-all these things should be a light; and God has granted and shall continue to grant that I should go forth with a light and cheerful step under his protection through all the evil scheming of my enemies, free of all shame arising through my own fault, just as Moses did with his friends through the Red Sea. And Pharaoh and his friends shall not pursue us very far. Alas, how they were drowned in this sea! Alas, have mercy, dear Lord, that our enemies be converted.

King David is the second light in this book with his psalter, in which he instructs us, laments, begs, admonishes, and praises God.

Solomon's words illumine-but not his deeds, for he is himself darkened-from the book of songs,"³ where the bride is found to be so drunkenly bold and the bridegroom says to her so passionately: "You are so exquisitely beautiful, my Darling, and there is no flaw in

Jeremiah illumines also for his part when he speaks of the intimate secrets of our Lady⁴⁵; for God told me that he possessed pure chastity, the most perfect love, and that he bore great torment in Christian faith, which he never saw with his fleshly eyes.

Daniel, too, illumines with marvelous wisdom. God, in his grace, gave him food for soul and body in the midst of all his enemies." The same thing happened to me, unworthy though I be, in my distress. This my enemies have noticed a bit and cannot tolerate it, and so they inflict much suffering on me.

21. Hell: How It Has Three Parts; How Lucifer and Sixteen Kinds of People Are Tormented; There Is No Help for Them. Lucifer's Garment⁴⁷

I have seen a city,⁴⁸
Its name is eternal hate.
It was built in the deepest abyss
From all kinds of stones of huge capital sins.
Pride was the first stone,
As is manifest in the case of Lucifer.

Disobedience, base greed, gluttony, lust—
These were four very heavy stones
Which our father Adam sent here.
Anger, duplicity, and murder—
These three stones Cain brought with him.
Lying, betrayal, despair of God, and rendering oneself lifeless:
With these four stones poor Judas murdered himself.
The sin of Sodom and false piety:
These are the essential cornerstones laid out for the structure.
The place was built many years ago.
Woe to all those who send their helpers there.
The more they send in advance,
The greater the shame with which they shall be received
When they themselves follow.

This place is so perverted that the highest are consigned to the lowest and basest place. Lucifer sits bound by his guilt in the deepest abyss. There flows forth unceasingly out of his fiery heart and out of his mouth all the sins, torments, sickness, and shame in which hell, purgatory, and the earth are so wretchedly entangled. In the bottommost part of hell the fire, gloom, stench, shuddering, and all kinds of intense pain are the greatest. It is there that Christians are placed according to their deeds. In the middle part of hell the suffering is more moderate. There the Jews are ranked according to their works. In the topmost part of hell the various kinds of pains are the least severe, and there the heathens are ranked according to their works. The heathens lament thus:

“Oh woe! If we had had a law,
We would not be suffering eternally such pain.”

The Jews lament as well:

“Alas! If we had obeyed God according to the teachings of Moses,
We would not be so terribly damned.”

The Christians lament even more, that they have lost great honor through their own evil will, though Christ had chosen them for himself with great love. In great anguish they constantly behold Lucifer and, naked with all their guilt, they are forced to parade publicly before him. Alas, how ignominiously they are received by him! He greets them grimly and speaks bitterly:

“O you cursed along with me,
What joys do you expect here?
You certainly never heard good spoken of me.
How could you then enjoy yourselves nicely?”

Then, first of all, he grabs the proud one and thrusts him under his tail and says: "I have not sunk so deep that I shall not lord it over you."

All the Sodomites pass down his throat and live in his belly. Whenever he draws a breath, they slide into his belly. But when he coughs, they are expelled again.

The false saints he puts upon his lap, kisses them hideously, and says: "You are my equals. I, too, was enveloped in false holiness; all of you are similarly duped."

Unceasingly he gnaws the usurer and rebukes him for never having been moved by mercy.

The robber he robs himself and hands him over to his henchmen to be chased and beaten mercilessly.

The thief is strung up by the feet to serve in hell as a beacon, but the damned do not see the better for it.

Those who were unchaste together on earth have to lie bound in like manner before Lucifer; but if such a one comes there alone, the devil is his partner.

The unbelieving teachers sit at Lucifer's feet so that they might look at their impure god directly. He also holds disputations with them that they might be humiliated.

The miser he eats, for he always wanted more. When he has swallowed him, he forces him out again by the tail.

Murderers must stand before him bloody and must receive fiery sword thrusts from the devil.

Those who here gave themselves over to fierce hatred must there serve as a smelling pot, ever hanging before his nose.

Those who here so keenly ate and drank to excess must there stand before Lucifer in unending hunger and eat glowing stones. Their drink is sulphur and pitch. There everything is sour instead of sweet. We see there what we have done here.

The slothful person is weighed down with all kinds of pain.

The hot-tempered is beaten there with whips of fire.

The bitterly poor minstrel who with high spirit⁴¹ can excite to sinful frivolity weeps in hell more tears than all the water contained in the sea.

I saw beneath Lucifer the ground of hell-a hard black pebblestone that shall bear the structure forever. Though hell has neither bottom nor boundary, it has as to ordering both depth and end.

How hell roars
And moans within itself.
And how the devils brawl
With the souls, and how these Boil and roast,
And how they swim and wade
In the stink and swamp
In the vermin and foul puddle;
And how they bathe in the sulphur and pitch—
Neither they themselves nor all creatures can fully describe it.

When I had seen this misery without my own doing but rather as a gift from God, I was so wretchedly in pain from the stink and the unearthly heat that I could neither sit up nor walk and was without the use of my five senses for three days, like someone struck by thunder." My soul, however, suffered no distress since that malady that is called eternal death had not brought it there. But if it were possible that a pure soul could be among them, that would be for them eternal light and a great consolation. For the innocent soul must of its nature ever radiate and shine since she is born painlessly out of the eternal light.' But if she takes on the likeness of the devil, she loses her beautiful light. Is it possible in eternal hell that any consolation at all might come to the damned from prayer and from alms? I never heard that. They are constantly in such a grim state of mind that they feel loathing toward anything good.

After the last day, Lucifer shall put on a new garment that has spontaneously come about out of the manure of all filthy sins that he was ever able to suggest to men or angels. For he is the primary vessel of all sin. Then he is released, but his grimness and fierceness are so much a part of all the souls and all the devils that one is aware of his presence everywhere. At times he will swell up enormously and his muzzle shall open very wide. Then in a single breath he shall devour Christians, Jews, and heathens. Still, they shall have their full reward in his belly and their special feast. Woe then to soul and body! What a human mouth is able to say about it here is nothing at all compared to the indescribable anguish taking place there. For in truth I cannot bear to think about it for as long as it takes to say "Hail, Mary." Alas, so horrible is it there!

At the top hell has a head that is hideous and has on it numerous fierce eyes which shoot forth flames and envelop the poor souls that dwell in the anteroom from which God took Adam and others of our fathers. This is now the worst purgatory that a sinner can enter. There I saw bishops, high officials, and great lords in longlasting anguish with countless sufferings. All who came there God had barely spared from everlasting hell.⁵² I found no one there who at the end had made a pure confession with his fleshly mouth. When because of the nature of dying their outer senses had been taken from them, the body lay still—though the soul and body still had a common will. When they had left behind earthly darkness, God gave them true knowledge in secret. Oh, how narrow there is the path to the kingdom of heaven! The union of body and soul, not yet separated, spoke thus: "True God, grant me pardon; I sincerely regret my sins!" This is a brief hour in which God has secretly saved many a soul that to all appearances had been lost. I never saw a case where this happened to a person who had not done something good with a well-intentioned will. The devils lead the stained souls from their bodies to purgatory because the pure angels cannot touch them as long as they are not radiant with a brightness similar to theirs. However, a soul can have the aid of friends on earth that prevents the devils from ever attacking the soul. But if she is very guilty, she must nevertheless suffer other torments. All this she can better endure if the devils are not able to grab her and constantly ridicule her.

When our holy fathers went down to hell, what they brought with them was true hope in the Christian faith with the holy love of God and very many humble virtues and faithful striving. Although they went to hell, they had been prepared for heaven. Nothing in hell could daunt them. What they brought with them that kept them from burning was love. This shall burn everlastingly in all the children of God; otherwise, they shall never reach heaven. This God has so ordained: What we take along with us we have to eat and drink there." But the procrastinators, who leave here without having done penance for great sins,⁵⁴ can never, short of being damned, suffer as terribly as they do before the mouth of hell. There at all times the breath of Lucifer shoots forth with all torments and permeates them so torturously that the poor wretches are just as utterly congealed in the flames and in the various kinds of savagery as the much blessed fathers were united in the sweet knowledge that God loved them. Of women there I saw only exalted ladies who here love all kinds of sins just as their husband lords do.

Hell also has a mouth at the top that remains ever open. All who enter into the mouth are never delivered from eternal death.

22. Of God's Mercy, His Concern, and Justice

I have heard and seen such boundless mercy from God that I said:

“Lord, how can this happen?
After all, your justice is equal to your mercy.
How is it that your goodness is so great?”

Then our Lord spoke a sincere word thus:

“I say to you by my divine faithfulness
That there are more Christians who from the mouth⁵⁵ enter the kingdom of heaven
Than there are who enter everlasting hell.
Justice has, indeed, its continual power.

Whatever is brought before it indicating guilt
Is never taken away by me from it.
Before all else, however, I want to come to the troubled soul as a Father⁵⁶
If I have heard anything clearly good about her.
This arises from the great concern that I have for my children.”

The soul said:

“Ah, my very dear Love, would you describe to me this concern
So that your pleasure and my desire might be united?”

Our Lord said:

“Now hear of my concern:
My goodness and my generosity,
My faithfulness and my mercy
Press me so urgently
That I let them flow over the mountains of pride
And over the valleys of humility
And over the bushes of confusion
And over the smooth paths of purity.
And my goodness actually presses me more insistently than an evil man is pressed
By his malicious disposition,
And yet my justice is even greater than the malice of all the devils.”

The soul said:

“Lord, your justice corresponds quite well with the living truth,
So that it gives me boundless joy without suffering of the heart.
Wherever it tends,
Truth is always joyful.”

23. The Intensity of Yearning Takes Away Words; God Cannot Do Without Virgins; God's Countenance, His Embrace, and His Joy Overcome a Thousand Deaths'

Whoever has burned in the powerful fire of love cannot endure abruptly cooling off through any kind of sin.

"Ah, dear Lover, when shall you yearn for what I yearn for?" Thus did a lonely soul speak.

Her dear One responded to her and spoke as though he did not know what she wanted: "What are you yearning for?"

She said in response: "Lord, the urgency of my desire has taken from me the ability to speak my thoughts."

He said: "Virgins do not know how to woo well because their modesty is by its nature refined."

She complained: "Alas, Lord, you certainly have been away from me much too long. If I could only win you, Lord, with magic, so that you could find rest only in me-ah, that would be a loving! Then you would have to beg that I behave sensibly."

Then he answered thus, saying: "O you spotless Dove, now grant me that I might spare you. The earth cannot yet do without you."

She said: "O Lord, if it could ever happen to me that I might gaze upon you as my heart desires and hold you in my arms, then the divine pleasures of your love would needs permeate my soul to the degree possible for people on earth. What I would be willing to suffer thereafter has never been seen by human eyes. Indeed, a thousand deaths were too little. Such, Lord, is my painful longing for you! For now I shall remain steadfast in my faithfulness. If you, Lord, can bear it, let me long pursue you in yearning. I know well, Lord, that the beginnings of desire for me will begin to stir in you. 1158

24. Two Kinds of Spirits from God and from the Devil Are Offered to Two Kinds of Religious People. The Seven Kinds of Love

Now I want to write you about a true spiritual sister and about a worldly beguine. They dispute with each other thus: The spiritual sister speaks from the true light of the Holy Spirit, free from interior suffering; but the worldly beguine speaks from her flesh in Lucifer's spirit with dreadful effort.

There are two kinds of religious people on this earth, to whom two kinds of spirits are offered. God offers his Holy Spirit to pure spirits who live here in a faithful holy attitude with their whole being. Here two pure natures meet: the hot fire of the Godhead and the flowing wax of the loving soul. If a pure wick of constant humility is there, a beautiful light shall burn by which one shall see far. O loving Soul, you shall become so rich that no one can make you poor-and yet you are the poorest of all! Humility makes one rich and well-brought-up; good habits make one noble and well-bred. Love makes one beautiful and praiseworthy." Being scorned exalts one aloft in God. Mark this well, spiritual Sister, and let no one drive you away from your good habits. Then shall you remain holy.

The devil, too, offers his spirit to the spirits who are ready to do the worst with hatred and with arrogant rapacity. They do not know what good things love brings. They become so poor from mean hatred and from the devil's grimness that it would be impossible for them to find or follow God's love.

Faithful love raises constant praise to God.
Yearning love causes a pure heart much sweet anguish.
Searching love belongs to herself alone.
Knowing love shares itself with all creatures.
Clamoring love is still mixed with sadness.
Silent love enjoys effortless pleasure.
Ah, the body knows nothing of what love does in stillness.
Pure love finds rest in God alone
Because the two of them have a single will,
And no creature is important enough to disturb them.

Knowledge has written this out of the eternal book:

Gold is often made very impure by copper.

Duplicity and empty honor do the same.

They erode all virtues from a person's soul.

The base soul is so attracted to transitory things

That she has never been shaken by love.

In her God has never spoken lovingly.

Alas, for her this life is total night.

Book IV

1. Pure Virgins Should Have Five Things

If you want to enhance virginity, which God has so glorified that for love of you he became the Son of a virgin just think what that means!-then you should be humbly silent and lovingly suffer distress and throughout all your days and in all situations practice virginal modesty. This will make your chastity thrive. O virgin, what God wants to give you then! He wants to be your handsome young man and wants to lead you in the heavenly dance. O wretched lame dog that I am, I would also shuffle along with you. Consider how I mean that: The number of pure virgins is small.

2. This Book Has Come from God; the Soul Praises Herself for Many Things; She Is Given Two Angels and Two Evil Devils. With Twelve Virtues She Does Battle Against the Flesh

All the days of my life before I began this book and before a single word of it had come into my soul, I was one of the most naive persons ever to be in religious life. I knew nothing about the devil's malice; I was unaware of the frailty of the world; the duplicity of people in religious life was also unknown to me. I have to speak to God's honor and for the sake of the book's teaching: I, unworthy sinner, was greeted by the Holy Spirit in my twelfth year, while I was alone, with such an outpouring that I could never, ever after that endure letting myself be led into a clear venial sin. This precious greeting occurred every day and lovingly spoiled for me all worldly sweetness, and it is still increasing day by day. This happened over thirty-one years. About God I knew nothing more than what the Christian faith teaches and I strove with constancy to keep my heart pure. God himself is my witness that I never in will or desire asked him to give me these things that are written in this book. Also, I never imagined that such things could happen to a human being. As long as I was with my relatives and my friends, to whom I was always the favorite, I had no knowledge of these things. Long before this I had had the desire to be despised through no fault of my own. Then for the sake of God's love I moved to a town where no one was my friend except for one person. I was afraid that because of him holy contempt and God's pure love would be withdrawn from me. But God nowhere abandoned me and let me experience such delightful sweetness, such holy knowledge, and such incomprehensible wonders that I found little enjoyment in earthly things.

Then for the first time my spirit was brought up through prayer between heaven and the air. I saw with the eyes of my soul in heavenly bliss the beautiful humanity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and I recognized in his sublime countenance the Holy Trinity-the eternity of the Father, the suffering of the Son, the sweetness of the Holy Spirit. Then I saw an angel, to whom I was entrusted through baptism, and my devil. Our Lord said:

"I shall take this angel from you
And shall give you two others instead.
They shall take care of you in these wonders."

When the soul looked at the two angels, oh, how completely was she unnerved in humble impotence, and she prostrated herself at the feet of our Lord, thanking him and urgently protesting that she was quite unworthy that princes such as this should be her chamberlains. One of the angels was from the Seraphim, and he is an igniter of love and a holy beacon for tender souls. The other angel was from the Cherubim; he is a keeper of the gifts and orders wisdom in the loving soul.

Then our Lord allowed two devils to come forth.
They were exalted masters, taken from Lucifer's school,
And had seldom come out.

When the soul looked upon the terribly hideous devils, she shivered a little, commended herself to our Lord, and quite freely accepted them. The one devil is a deceiver with beautiful angelic garments. Oh, what a lot of false cunning he presented to me at first! Once during mass he came down from on high and said: "I am so beautiful; don't you want to worship me?"

The soul replied: "God alone shall one worship in all good things and in all distress!"

He said: "Don't you want to look up and see who I am?" Then in the lower air he displayed a beautiful sham radiance, which has seduced many a heretic, and said: "In the throne room upon this seat you alone shall be the most exalted virgin, with me the fairest youth next to you."

But she replied: "A person would not be wise to take the worst when he could easily achieve the best."

He said: "Since you do not want to surrender yourself to me you are so holy and so humble-then I shall worship you."

She said: "No grace shall be given to you because you worship a foul cesspool."

Then he showed her the five wounds painted on his feet and hands and said: "Now you will see who I am. If you will live according to my advice, I shall give you great honor. You should tell people about this special favor; then much good would come of it."

She said-and his idle talk annoyed her greatly; nevertheless, she listened to it freely so that she might become more shrewd."You are telling me that you are God. Well then, tell me, who is that who is the Son of the living God now here in the true priest's hands?" He then wanted to depart, and she said: "By the almighty God, I admonish you that you now listen to me: I well know your intentions. If I were to tell everyone the secrets of my heart, things would be quite nice for me in the short term. But then you would intently strive to make the fun end badly. You would do this so that I might fall into doubt, sadness, unbelief, impurity, and thereafter into everlasting anguish. Another reason you are doing this is so that I might imagine that you come to me thus because I am so holy. Ha! You old archdeceiver, as long as God stands by me, all your efforts are for naught."

Then he cried out: "A plague on your magic; just let me get away from you. I'll never bother you again!"

The second devil who was assigned to me was a troublemaker and a master of concealed lewdness. However, God forbade him ever to come to me himself. Instead, he sent perverted evil people to me as his messengers who spoil good things for me and take what they can of my honor by their words. He also strives for this: where good people are together and are talking idly in a lewd manner, this cannot help but trouble poor me. Up to then that had never happened to me.

One night I was at prayer before my first sleep. This same devil came passing through the air and took a close look at the sinful earth. He was huge like a giant. He had a short tail and a crooked nose. His head was large like a tub. Out of his mouth fiery sparks came flying covered with black flame. He laughed with cunning malice and a horrible raucous voice. The soul asked him why he was laughing, what he was looking for, and what he was up to.

He answered and said: "I am glad, indeed, since I may not torment you myself, that I find so many who look like angels and are happy to torment you for me." Then he continued: "I am the chamberlain of religious persons and I look for two kinds of weakness in them that will separate them from God in an instant. One is concealed or secret impurity. Whenever a person in religious life seeks the comfort of the flesh without real necessity and in all his five senses, they become impure; that is, crass and lazy; and true love of God grows cold. The other is hidden hatred in open discord. This is a very useful sin for me. Wherever I find it unrepented overnight, there is a win for me, for it is the foundation of long-lasting malice and the loss of all holiness."

Then the soul said: "Since by your nature you have absolutely nothing good about you, how can it be that you can give a morally profitable explanation of your evil?"

And he replied: "Wherever I turn, God has me so firmly in his hands that I cannot do anything except what he directs me."

I, unhappy person, in my early childhood committed such a great sin that, if I had remained without repentance and without confession, I would have to have stayed in purgatory for ten years. But now, dear Lord, when I die, I shall cheerfully suffer torment there for love of you. I am saying this not from reason; love bids me say it.' When I entered religious life and took leave of the world, I looked at my body. It was fully armed against my poor soul with great fullness of strong power and with the energy of a complete nature. I saw full well that it was my enemy, and I also saw if I were going to escape eternal death, I would have to strike it down; conflict was inevitable. I also looked at my soul's weapon. This was the glorious passion of our Lord Jesus Christ. With this I defended myself. I had to remain constantly in great fear and throughout my youth had to deliver great defensive blows against my body. These were sighing, weeping, confessing, fasting, keeping vigils, scourging with rods, and constant adoration. These were the weapons of my soul by means of which I so completely conquered the body that in twenty years the time never came that I was not weary, weak, and sick-mostly from repentance and suffering, but also from holy longing and spiritual toil and, in addition, many a difficult day of sickness from my nature. There was also the violent force of love, which pressed me so intensely with these marvels that I did not dare remain silent about it. Still, because of my naivete, I had much to suffer. I said: "Ah, kind God, what do you see in me? You know quite well that I am a fool, a human being sinful and needy in body and soul. You should be giving these things to wise people; then you would be able to receive praise."

Then our Lord got very angry with little me and asked me for my judgment:

"Now tell me, are you mine or not?"

"Certainly, Lord, that is what I long for from you."

"Shall I then not do with you what I want?"

"Yes, Dearest to my heart, gladly; even if I should thus become nothing."

Then our Lord said: "You shall obey and trust me in these matters, and you shall also become sick for a long time, and I shall take care of you myself; and everything that you need for body and soul I shall give you."

Then, a wretch trembling in humble confusion, I went to my confessor, told him the whole story, and begged for his advice. He said I should boldly go forward with a light heart; God, who had been leading me, would certainly preserve me. Then he gave me a command that often makes me ashamed and causes me to weep because my utter unworthiness is obvious to my eyes; that is, he commanded me, a frail woman, to write this book out of God's heart and mouth. And so this book has come lovingly from God and does not have its origins in human thought.

3. Sinners Fall Away from God, of Three Gifts of Wisdom; of the Stone; of the Praise of the Virgin Who Is Christianity2

Just as one soothes a dear child, so does one spank a nasty one. Just so does our Lord act, saying: "Whoever has nothing good about him shall never enter my kingdom; and whoever cannot be made full by transitory things shall be satisfied with hunger for eternity. And woe to him who has goods that stick to his heart and who wants to set himself above other people. He shall slip away from me into the bottomless valley."

To this, holy knowledge replies that God has given us three different gifts in true wisdom from which we should take our fill and by which we should preserve ourselves from all injury.

The first is priestly wisdom and Christian teaching, as God revealed them to me in great glory. With the true eyes of my knowledge, effortlessly and in sweet bliss, I saw a stone that was like a well-shaped mountain and that had grown out of itself and had taken on the beauty of all kinds of colors and gave off the strong fragrance of precious heavenly spices. I asked the very delightful stone who it was, and it spoke thus: "I am Jesus." Then I went out of myself in love4 and leaned my head on it. I saw that outside it was shut off from all darkness and was filled inside with eternal light.

Upon the stone there stood the most beautiful of virgins that was ever seen aside from our dear Lady St. Mary, but she is her playmate. Her feet are adorned with a stone called jasper. This stone has such great power that it drives out base cupidity from the feet of its desire.' It also bestows pure fragrance and stimulates holy hunger. It drives all darkness from one's eyes. This precious stone is Christian faith. The virgin stood on two feet. The one is the bond, the other is the loosening of holy power.' All Christian believing priests have these. She carries in her right hand a chalice filled with red wine, which she drinks alone in untold bliss. The angels never get a taste of it. The wine is the blood of the eternal Son, which fills her spirit so full that she gives us many a sweet teaching. In her left hand she wields a fiery sword that is full of golden cymbals hanging from it that sound so sweet that everyone must approach her who strives toward the Holy Trinity. I asked the virgin why it was that she carried the sword in her left hand and the chalice in her right hand. She said: "I am supposed to threaten because on the last day of each human being God shall strike his blow. I am also supposed to give away his blood with my right hand, just as Christ is turned to his Father in glory."

She also has great strength in her hands with which she draws all to herself who choose God and casts off from herself as well all who deliver themselves over to the devil. Ah, she has such a fair countenance. I look at her with ever increasing joy. Unguent flows from her throat; this is mercy, salve for sin. In her mouth she has golden teeth with which she chews the celestial junipers. These are the sayings of the prophets. From her tongue drips honey that the bustling bees, the holy apostles, have sucked from the sweetest wild flowers. She wears on her mouth blossoming roses and her nose is adorned with sweet violets.' She wears on her brow verdant white lilies.' This means she is a mother to widows, a dear friend to married people and a glory to all virgins. Her eyes sparkle full of delight, just as the sparkling sun prods on before it the pale green dawn. And just as her eyes are threefold and yet one, so it is with the Holy Trinity. The white refers to the Father, the green to the Son, the radiant sun to the Holy Spirit." When they gaze at one another from their hearts, no greater joy can ever come about. This virgin also wears on her head a crown that is wrought from red gold. That is lofty counsel and holy action which one has from holy teachers. This crown is like a fortress with battlements before which lies a great pitiful army, and they have a terribly disloyal lord-that is the devil and his fol lowers-who is a treasonous wretch. Within the crown resides a praiseworthy army in full power with abundant defenses. They have a loyal Lord; that is Jesus our Redeemer. He constantly directs the defense of those under attack and leads the exhausted to the wine cellar.

In the crown there is a threefold horn"; in it the hardy shall dwell who are devoted to great love. They have to be the archers and sentries if the weakest are to survive. In the crown there is also a tower. The blessed who shall live there do not often need to enter the fray, but no one can climb up to it unless his complete earthly will has been taken from him by love. The crown has on the top of its battlements a great number of costly precious stones. These are those who have now gone from here to heaven. Inside in the heart of the virgin I saw a living spring flowing forth. Heathen children, all leprous and blind, were being brought there. Above this spring stood a deeply spiritual man. No one but him could reach into it. This was John the Baptist. He bathed the children in the spring that they might become seeing and radiantly healthy. I asked the virgin who she was. She said: "I am she whom you love so well, and I am your playmate. I am Holy Christianity and we both have the same Bridegroom." This is the virgin of blessed priests who so often gaze upon her with love.

The second wisdom comes from our natural faculties by means of which one can do both: lose and win. In this wisdom resides a throng of perverse lay persons and false priests and cunning religious." Never does a person become so holy that he learns how to guard against these three completely. So vicious are they that they pervert everything that is good. No one becomes spiritual from this gifts" unless he also is a fool for the sake of God's love. For pure holy simplicity is the mother of true divine wisdom. What good does it do that a refined gentleman has a lot of money and yet buys nothing but hunger, thirst, long-lasting disgrace, and eternal interior torment as well?

The third wisdom comes from grace and orders all of God's gifts. It never becomes so abundant that it dare compare itself to the lowest creatures. Their distress never saddens it; rather, it rejoices only in God's will. Also, it cannot bear that a single virtue remain locked outside its door.

4. Two Dissimilar Paths: the First Descends into Hell; the Second Ascends to Heaven¹⁴

Abundance of transitory things is a capricious guest;
Holy poverty offers before God a precious burden.

Vanity reflects not on its destructiveness;
Constancy is fully laden with all virtues.

Folly is comfortable only with itself;
Wisdom is never satisfied with what it learns.

Anger brings utter darkness into the soul;
Holy meekness is assured of every grace.

Pride always wants to be the best;
Humility can never rest, but must offer its service to all creatures.

Empty honor is before God deaf and blind;
Undeserved disgrace sanctifies all children of God.

Deceit has a most fair appearance;
Perfection is despised by the high and mighty.

Cupidity always has a loud mouth;
Blessed moderation has a delightful foundation.

Sloth misses abundant treasure;
Holy diligence does not overly seek out its own comfort.

Disloyalty always gives bad advice;
Full loyalty never omits a good deed.

True spirituality never avenges itself on anyone;
The uncultivated heart always seeks to break the peace.

Genuine devotion cannot do evil;
Evil will is subordinate to no one.

Malice by nature is grounded in evil;
Divine grace has a lovely countenance and a sweet mouth.

Worldly hearts like to be honored;
A spiritual soul always wants to go elsewhere.

Hidden cruelty has a plain mouth;
Open kindliness discovers God's treasure.

Deceitful concern is hate's neighbor;
Holy mercy alone shall stand with God.

A lie appears outwardly beautiful and inwardly hideous;
This is why it receives a friendly welcome from its companions.

Truth is rejected because it is little esteemed;
Hence all who love it must suffer many a humiliation with Jesus.

Hate rages unceasingly;
Love burns without injuring; it is free of all torment.

Evil disfavor hates God's generosity;
A pure heart full of love rejoices at everyone's happiness.

Malicious gossip feels shame neither before people nor God,
Who, after all, hears and sees all things.

Despair is a horrible fall;
True hope preserves it all.

False consolation will never be happy;
True guilt saddens it¹⁵ so.

After our dear Lord had revealed this to me, he then said: "He who considers how good I am always holds himself fast on me." To that end help us, Lord, for the sake of your own honor!

5. Our Sin, Future Fall, Earthly Being, the Kingdom of Heaven. God's Gifts Should Be Clearly Before Our Eyes

Lord, my guilt through which I have lost you stands before my eyes like an immense mountain and has created an extensive darkness between you and me, and an eternal distance of you, alas, from me! Ah, Love above all loves, draw me back into you!

But, Lord, a future fall's stands before my eyes like a fiery dragon mouth that at any time would like to devour me. Ah, my only Good, now help me that I might flow spotless into you!

Lord, my earthly being stands before my eyes like a parched field on which little of value has grown. O dear Jesus Christ, send me the sweet rain of your humanity and the warm sun of your living Godhead and the gentle dew of your Holy Spirit, that I might lament my heart's suffering.

Lord, your eternal kingdom stands open before my eyes like the most splendid wedding feast and the greatest celebration and the longest banquet. Alas, my Darling, there you shall forever draw your love-craving bride to your embrace.

Lord, your whole gift that I have received from you appears to my eyes like a wretched box on the ears, because your most sublime gift here makes me seem so worthless. Thus does God who gives it all speak:

“Your mountain shall dissolve in love;
Your enemies shall gain no part of you;
Your field has been penetrated by the warm sun;
And your fruit has nevertheless remained unspoiled;
And in my kingdom you shall be a new bride;

And there I shall give you a delicious kiss on the mouth,
That my entire Godhead shall soar through your soul;
And my threefold eyes shall forever sparkle unceasingly in your twofold heart.

So where is your grieving now?
Even if you pray for a thousand years,
I would not grant you a single sigh.”

6. Being Chosen by God Cannot Hurt Anyone; True Repentance Earns Remission and God's Grace, and Frees from Purgatory

A despondent person asked me to pray for him, which I did with fear and special concern. God heard me with his gaze, with his words, and with his true voice, saying: "There is no lamb so white or so pure that it cannot be vanquished by wolves; yet no one can deter my determinations. I have made this clear to him in three ways. First, I was merciful in regard to his guilt. Second, I have given him my grace. Third, I have never allowed untrustworthy people to exercise any power over him."

Then I lamented for him thus: "Lord, he still has great fears that you have not completely forgiven him his guilt."

Thus did God reply: "That would be impossible. Whoever is sorry for his sins I forgive. Those who repent with deep compunction I grant my grace; and whoever so repents them that he would sacrifice his life before he would ever do it again and remains constant in this shall not be condemned to any punishment after this life because of his guilt, unless he commits real venial sins and is found unrepentant of them.

7. How a Free Soul Speaks to God in Total Love

Lord, because I was subservient to all creatures, you have drawn me up above all things to yourself; and, Lord, because I have no earthly treasure, I do not have an earthly heart either. For you, Lord, are my treasure, just as you are also my heart; and you alone are my good, but I am capricious in all things.

8. Concerning God's Body, Which a Sick Person Vomits Up, and Concerning Power

That a sick person who is vomiting may not receive the Body of God-I was so naive about this that I did not know how to figure it out completely by my own powers of thinking and my own faith, because one can lose God only by sinning. So my soul asked our Lord in the union of love what the truth of the matter was. Our Lord gave this reply: "You are right. One can only lose me by sinning, but one's body can lose my body through sickness." In these words I saw in the Holy Trinity this explanation: Whenever we receive God's Body, the Godhead unites itself to our innocent soul and God's humanity mixes itself with our hideous body, and thus does the Holy Spirit make his dwelling in our faith. This blessed union we should preserve with great care.

9. Four Kinds of Offerings to Priests

Then our Lord said to me that priests should receive offerings from four things and from nothing else: from the altar; from bringing God's Body to the sick-but the sick person should give an offering for the last anointing according to his means and according to what he thinks is good; from the field" he should take what one wants to give him. A priest should not determine and should not demand, because what a sick person has given he should receive only as a favor and not as something rightfully his."

10. Concerning the Offerings of Laypersons According to Their Means

Laypersons who give an offering should keep themselves from evil parsimony when giving, as much as the priest should preserve himself from greedy cupidity. This is very important for both of us because the layperson should give his offering with great love and a cheerful soul into God's generous hand. The priest should take it in humble fear and quaking heart from God's hands and should in all his actions return it to God in a praiseworthy manner; for earthly goods are like slaves when one receives them, but they are like the freeborn when one gives them away.

11. Four Things Concerning How Christians Should Conduct Themselves in Dealing with Jews

Then God taught me how Christians should conduct themselves toward Jews. One should not observe their law. One should not reside with them. One should not even spend the night in their dwelling. One should buy and sell from them without acting too friendly and without cunning or greed.

12. How a Bride Who Is United with God Rejects Consolation from All Creatures Except for That from God Alone, and How She Sinks into Pain

So speaks God's bride who has taken her rest in the sealed treasury of the holy complete Trinity: "Oh, get up and depart from me, all you creatures! You cause me pain and you are not able to console me."

The creatures say: "Why?"

The bride says: "My Love left me as I slept, as I was resting in oneness with him.""

"Can't this beautiful world and all the good it contains console you?"

"No, I see the snake of deceit and how treacherous cunning slithers into all the pleasures of this world. I also see the hook of lust in the carcass of base sweetness with which she catches many."

"Can the kingdom of heaven console you at all?"

"No, in itself it would be dead if the living God were not there."

"Well then, Lady Bride, can't the saints console you?"

"No, if they were to be separated from the living God flowing through them, they would weep more bitterly than I; for they have ascended above me and dwell deeper in God."

"Can God's Son ever console you?"

"Yes, I certainly ask him when we stroll through the flowers of holy knowledge, and I beg him full of longing that he open up for me the playful flood flowing in the Holy Trinity from which alone the soul lives.

If I am to be consoled in proportion to my nobility,
God's breath must draw me effortlessly into itself,
For the sparkling sun of the living Godhead
Shines through the bright water of cheerful humanity,

And the sweet pleasure of the Holy Spirit
Who proceeds from them both
Has taken from me everything
That dwells beneath the Godhead.
Nothing tastes good to me but God alone;
I am wondrously dead.
I am freely willing to give up this taste
So that he be wonderfully praised.
For when I, a worthless human being, cannot praise God with my powers,
I send all creatures to court
And bid them that they praise God for me

With all their wisdom,
With all their love,
With all their beauty,
And with all their longing,
Just as they were created by God in innocence,
And also with all their voices
As they now sing.
When I look upon this great praising,
I feel no pain.

"I cannot endure that a single consolation touch me except my Lover. I love my earthly friends in the company of heaven and I love my enemies in holy aching for their happiness. God has enough of everything; caressing souls is the only thing he cannot get enough of."

After this marvel and this consolation had been going on for eight years, God wanted to console me way beyond what was due to my soul's nobility. "No, dear Lord, do not elevate me so much," said the unworthy soul. "It's much too good for me in the lowest part; for your honor's sake I am quite happy always to remain there."

Then the poor wretch sank down among those suspended ²¹ and among the damned souls, and she thought this was too good. After that our Lord pursued her as he does those who experience the lowest kind of joy,²¹ for God shines beautifully into all according to the degree of holiness they achieved here in love and according to how noble in virtues they became. St. John says: "We shall see God as he is."²² This is true. But the sun shines according to the weather. There are different kinds of weather on earth under the sun, and in like manner there are different kinds of dwellings in heaven. Hence, he is to me as I can bear him and see him.

Then our Lord said: "How long do you want to be here?"

The bride said: "Oh, leave me, dear Lord, and let me sink further for your honor."

After this both soul and body entered into such a great darkness that I lost knowledge and light, and I knew nothing of God's intimacies. Even blessed love went off on its own. The soul said: "Where are you now, Lady Trust? I now want to entrust to you the duties of love, and you must preserve God's honor in me."

Then this chambermaid took charge of her lady in such a holy spirit of suffering and cheerful patience that I was living without a care. But then disbelief came and enveloped me completely in such great darkness and screamed at me in such great rage that I shuddered at its voice. It said: "If this favor had been from God, he would not have so utterly forsaken you."

The soul said: "Where are you now, Lady Constancy? Command true faith to come to me!"

Then the Father of heaven said to the soul: "Remember what you experienced and what you saw while there was nothing between me and you."

And the Son said: "Remember what your body suffered from my pain."

This is what the Holy Spirit said: "Remember what you wrote."

Then both body and soul answered with the constancy of true faith: "As I have believed, loved, enjoyed, and known, so shall I go forth from here unshaken."

After this came constant estrangement from God and enveloped the soul so completely that the blessed soul said: "Welcome, very blessed Estrangement. Fortunate I am that I was born—that you, Lady, shall now be my chambermaid, for you bring me unusual joy and incomprehensible marvels and unbearable delight as well. But, Lord, you should take delight from me and let me have estrangement from you. Ah, how good I feel, darling God, that I may bear it because love is changeable. How it comes to me I dare not say; only that gall has become honey for the palate of my soul."

Then I desired that all creatures might praise our Lord with the Te deum laudamus.²³ But they did not want to do this and turned their backs on me. Then the soul became happy beyond all bounds, and herself said: "That you now despise me and turn your backs on me—look, I'm glad. This praises our Lord immeasurably. Now his honor is accomplished through me, for now God is strangely with me, now his estrangement from me is more welcome to me than he is himself." The soul knew full well that God would console her even in great estrangement. She said: "Remember, Lord, who I am and avoid me."

Our Lord said to her: "Grant me this: that I might cool the heat of my Godhead, the longing of my humanity, and the pleasure of my Holy Spirit in you."

To this she replied: "Yes, Lord, but in such a way that it is only good for you and not for me."

After this the bride entered such a great darkness that her body sweated and writhed in painful cramping. The pain was asked by someone² to be a messenger to God for her. She said: "Lady Pain, this I bid you: that you release me now, for you are now the most important thing about me."

Then pain arose from the soul and the body like a gloomy shine and ascended to God with judicious intent and called out in a loud voice: "Lord, you know well what I want."

Our Lord went to meet her before the door of the kingdom, saying: "Welcome, Lady Pain, you are the garment I wore next to my skin on earth and the whole world's contempt was my finest mantle. Despite how much I loved you there, you are not entering here. Rather, to the virgin who is willing to do two things I shall give two things. She should constantly prove herself well-bred and prudent. Then shall she help you be her messenger, and then shall I give her my embrace and union with my heart."

Then pain said this: "Lord, I make many blessed and yet am not blessed myself, and I consume many a holy body and yet myself am evil, and I lead many to heaven and yet do not enter it myself."

To this our Lord responded: "Pain, you were not born from the kingdom of heaven; therefore, you may not enter it. Rather, you were born from Lucifer's heart; there you shall return and shall dwell with him eternally."

Ah, blessed Estrangement from God, how bound I am to you in love! You strengthen my will in pain and make pleasant for me the difficult long wait in this miserable body. By whatever means I make myself more your companion, the more intensely and wondrously God falls over me. O Lord, in the depths of pure humility I cannot sink away from you; alas, in pride I easily stray away from you!

But the deeper I sink,

The sweeter I drink.

13. The Text of This Book Is Seen, Heard, and Felt in All Members

I do not know how to write, nor can I, unless I see with the eyes of my soul and hear with the ears of my eternal spirit and feel in all the parts of my body the power of the Holy Spirit.

14. Of the Holy Trinity, of the Birth and the Name of Jesus Christ, and of Human Nobility

I saw and still see three Persons in the eternal heights before God's Son was conceived in the body of St. Mary. They were then known and seen by all the holy angels in their distinctness, in their completeness, in their name, and in how the Three were one God. No matter how good the angels' eyes were, they saw neither bone nor flesh nor color nor the glorious name Jesus. This was miraculously hidden from them in the breast of the eternal Father. They called the Father the uncreated eternal God, the Son wisdom with no beginning, the Spirit of them both they called right knowledge of truth. The fiery angels of the highest order, who are suspended opposite the loving Godhead in the breath of the whole Trinity, served and were witness to the blissful decision when God became man. Gabriel brought only the name down at the Annunciation. He was entrusted with neither bone nor flesh nor blood. The Second Person-that was always the eternal Son. Although he had not yet assumed human nature, he had always been ours but had not been given to us before Gabriel brought the message. If this same Second Person had been flesh, for the sake of redeeming us, before the Annunciation, then it would have to be a beginning; but this never took place.² This same Second Person had become one nature with Adam's humanity before he debased himself in sin. Although Adam's nature was broken and changed and his inheritance lost forever, God never gave up on him. Hence we were and still are able to return. God has kept his noble loving nature intact. Hence he cannot withhold himself. God immediately cast Lucifer from himself into the eternal prison, but he pursued Adam, asked him where he was, and brought him back to the path. Lucifer had only a single nature in God. When he destroyed it, he could not return.

Man has a complete nature in the Holy Trinity, and God saw fit to fashion it with his own divine hands. When his holy efforts on our behalf went for naught, he was forced back within himself by a threefold delight. For this reason he wanted to restore us with his own feet and his own hands so that we would have great oneness with him. If man had remained in paradise, God would have been immediately visible to him, would have greeted his soul and refreshed his body. Thus did I see God come from heaven to paradise, like a great angel.

Also, this same nature forces God to greet us with knowledge and with holy intimacy to the extent that we are prepared through holy virtues and true innocence. When I reflect that divine nature now includes bone and flesh, body and soul, then I become elated in great joy, far beyond what I am worth. But angels are to some degree formed according to the Holy Trinity, but they are pure spirits. The soul alone with its flesh is mistress of the house in heaven, sits next to the eternal Master of the house, and is most like him. There eye reflects in eye, there spirit flows in spirit, there hand touches hand, there mouth speaks to mouth, and there heart greets heart. Thus does the Lord and Master honor the mistress at his side. But the princes and the vassals-these are the holy angels-these the Master keeps in full view. All service and all praise the angels engage in are offered totally to the mistress as well as to the Master. Our vassals rank in nobility according to how rich in holy virtues we are on earth.²⁶

15. Genuine Pure Love Has Four Things; If You Surrender Yourself to God, God Will Also Surrender Himself to You

Genuine pure love of God has four things about it that never rest. The first is growing desire, the second is flowing suffering, the third: burning sensation in soul and body, the fourth: constant union bound to great vigilance. No one can achieve this unless one enters into a full exchange with God, such that you give God everything that is yours, both inwardly and outwardly, and he truly gives you everything that is his inwardly and outwardly.

When the hour of bliss has passed when God gave his most sublime consolation to the loving soul, ah, then the beloved is so content that she considers everything good that estranged souls feel as pain. If you are then cross, you might well fear that the devil has anointed you.

16. Great Love Has More than Ten Parts and of Two Kinds of Complaint

Great love gets its nature from this: It does not flow with tears; rather, it burns in the great fire of heaven. Within this it flows forth most lavishly and yet remains within itself in utter calm. It climbs up closest to God yet remains utterly interior to itself. It grasps the most and keeps the least.

"O most blessed love, where are those who know you?"

"They are totally consumed in the fire of the Holy Trinity; they do not dwell in themselves. These blessed ones can never fall into mortal sin."

"Why?"

"They are so completely permeated with and absorbed in God; the more they are tempted, the stronger they become."

"Why?"

"The longer they are here in the struggle and keep on loving, the more noble does God seem to them and the more frail and wretched they seem to themselves."

"Why?"

"The holier the love, the greater the fear; and the more consolation, the more constant the fear. But the loving soul cannot cravenly fear; she fears nobly."

There are two things that I cannot condemn enough: the first, that God's kindness is so forgotten in the world; the second, that those in religious life are so imperfect. Because of this many a fall must occur, for the perfect have never fallen.

17. Concerning a Lady Who Liked Being at Court; Concerning Her Devil Who Recommended to Her Seven Kinds of Evil

A lady had retreated from the world" and yet still wanted to serve at court. I prayed for her with all my might, both day and night, for I saw that the damage to her was so great that, if she remained there, she would woefully become the devil's companion upon her death. Why? Because she loved her importance there to excess and did not strive for God's honor. Rather, she gave herself over to idle courtly manners and kept her eyes focused on the prestige of her lord and lady.

After this a huge devil came-fiery, bloody, black, with claws, with horns,²⁸ and with glassy eyes. It came and stood before me. But I was not afraid of it. I just blessed myself and went to sleep. Then it trundled over me like a sack full of water and tormented me so much that I sought relief from our Lord. A white angel came to my aid. It was from the fourth choir of angels and was the guardian angel of this same lady. I asked him who this enemy was and why he was assailing me.

Ah, then the lovely angel said in a heavenly voice: "He is one of the most malicious devils that hell can muster. His task is to bind up with ruinous love the hearts of the pure who really do want to be good, and he is tormenting you because you are trying to push him away from this lady."

"Alas, is he going to torment me for a long time?"

"No, God shall soon show his mercy."

After this the devil came again and shot fiery rays at me that inflicted hellish pain on me in body and soul.

I said: "Do everything to me that God allows you."

At this the devil was weakened and said: "Since you humbly submit yourself to this suffering, I am losing all my power."

The soul said: "By the living God, I admonish you to tell me your name and what your business with this lady is."

"My name-ha! That I shall not tell you because that would do me too much harm."

"You must, by the last judgment!"

"I am fostering in her fierce arrogance, deceitful cunning, and powerful lust; and I fend off from her all mercy. My name is Raging Anger that destroys spiritual hearts."

18. A Spiritual Person Resembles an Animal in Thirty Things as to His Nature²⁹

Thus does a despondent soul lament and speak forlornly to her Lover: "Ah, Lord, for a long time I have desired two things that have not yet been granted me. The first is a faithful spiritual life. Alas, Dearest to my heart, that has all been left undone.

The second is a holy end. I am so looking forward to it that I am losing my doleful earnestness."

To this our Lord replied by showing me a frail, insignificant little animal and saying: "Look, you are like this tiny animal."

Then I saw how the animal was brought forth on an island in the sea out of the slime that had separated from the sea between the hot sun and the water in such a way that the sun was the animal's father, the sea its mother, and the slime its matter.

Thus was Adam created by God's power on earth out of weak matter. The animal signifies true spiritual people. When a person receives a spiritual spirit, he is begotten by the burning Godhead and is conceived in his mother, God's humanity. The matter he is made of is the Holy Spirit, who rubs out his sinful nature in all respects. The animal grows toward the warm sun. So does a spiritual person who has received" God's Spirit. This is such noble seed; it sprouts and grows till the blessed person's end.

This animal does not eat. Rather, it has a large tail that is full of honey. This it sucks on every day. It also has a golden beard that rings so delightfully when it is sucking that its sweet voice and cheerful sound echo playfully in its heart; and its body is nourished by drinking the sweet honey. This tail is the death of holy people, which they cheerfully and prudently keep before their eyes in their good works and constant practice of virtue, and they joyfully practice faithfulness in patient waiting. The golden beard is God's noble love that chimes through the loving heart into the noble soul. Fortunate is he to have become a human being who ever really experiences this!

This animal has at times a natural desire to drink from the sea because of a misguided sense of thirst. It cannot regain its health unless it voids and gives back the bitter seawater. Thus it is with us sinners: when we drink of the foul puddle of the world and make use of the baseness of our flesh according to the counsels of the evil spirit, we poison ourselves with our selves. If we ever want to survive, we have to leave ourselves and give back what we owe to the world.

This animal has big ears. They are exposed to the heavens, and it listens for the song of birds. It flees vicious animals and fears the snakes of the earth. This, indeed, is also what the loving soul does. It constantly flees evil company and detests false wisdom, and its ears are wide open to hear God's wisdom.

This animal has a noble temperament. It cannot remain in the sea when animals do their mating dance and the water is raging. It loves chastity and hurries up the highest mountain that it knows, and it picks out the most beautiful tree and climbs it with cheerful effort and clasps the lofty trunk; and so does it rest with great pleasure in lofty freedom. This is what the loving soul does. She finds vanity bitter and flees urgently what is merely passing that flows onward like water. She also knows how to work with great virtues and holy efforts on the highest mountain in the beautiful kingdom of heaven. Effortlessly, she climbs further into grace upon the fairest tree of the Holy Godhead. There she embraces the loftiest trunk and is herself embraced by the Holy Trinity.

This animal has two sharp horns with which it defends its body with such intelligence that it goes free among all the animals. O loving Soul, this you well understand. You drive the devil away from you through God's intelligence and you live in holy purity, free of all sin.

This animal has two beautiful human eyes that pour forth tears toward the beautiful mountain where it would like to be again. Ah, loving Soul, how fair are the eyes of your knowledge, for you have gazed into the eternal mirror and your sweet tears are ready to fall from love. And yet you willingly endure the bitterness of the sea of sin.

This animal has a soft mouth and a pure tongue, but it does not have teeth. It can neither snarl nor bite. The loving person also has a useful mouth; he eagerly teaches and instructs at all times. His tongue is far from and closed to all harmful words. He, too, has no teeth for biting. He willingly consoles those who are sad. There is also no viciousness in him except against sin and derision of God. Indeed, nothing hurts him as much as this. The mouth of this animal is wide open on top and small at the bottom. The large part of our mouth is the unrestrained praise that we should offer to God in the company of all creatures in all our actions and in all things at all times. The lower part of our mouth is all too ready to speak about the sinful earth. Woe to all empty phrases! What shall become of the impostor saints who fraudulently nourish their sinful bodies with gifts meant for holy people and comport themselves as though they gained complete knowledge of God's holy truth? May God in his trustworthiness, who alone has loved the truth, preserve his innocent friends from them!

This animal is swift of foot and has no voice. It is quiet by nature. The soul in rapture has this same nature: at the height of love she is both swift and at rest.

This animal's skin and hair are of a common color, and is faded and ugly to behold. No one hunts it for its present beauty. But after its death, when other animals rot, its skin becomes so ennobled and its hair so richly beautiful that all the most prominent people that can get it wear its coat rather than the finest sable. The peace, useful habits, and holy teachings of people striving for perfection receive, alas, little notice during their lifetime; but after their death, whenever we sinners come into need and we then remember how holy their lives were and how solicitously they warned us, as sinners we feel shame that we kept our distance from them. And so their life becomes a beautiful sable that in its full beauty we sinners keep before our eyes and in our hearts. And yet during their life, we always fear for our worthless copper, so that we willfully neglect reaching out for refined gold.

This animal's flesh is eaten on Friday. It does not die unless it is beaten to death by the waves of the sea. The lives of holy people consist only of Fridays, for they constantly fast because of sin and do not eat forbidden foods; rather, they live in a godlike manner. The great stormy swells of tempestuous love make them die to all things and live in God alone. Indeed, all things are not really theirs except as shared with God in love. Thus does their love have the valuable power of praising God in all things.

This animal's bones are the skeleton of a noble fish.' From it one can fashion beautiful jewels that noble persons wear in honor. What a precious jewel is a holy body full of love and free from sin! God shows us this through the example of his dearest friends when we discover the true signs in them. In his holy friends God has given us many a valuable jewel. If we do not praise him for this, we cannot become one with the saints, whom one here elevates from the earth.³²

This animal's name is, in German: Valuable for Everything.³³ Fortunate is he that he ever became man who has this name before God.

19. The Task of Blessed Love Is Manifold

O blessed Love,
This has always been your task, and still is:

To bind together God and the human soul.
That shall be your task forever.

Greetings, my Lady, and take care
That I do not complain about you to my Lord.
If he intends to be away from me too long,
I would freeze too much.
Keep that from happening, Lady of my heart and Queen.
You have seduced me in God
So that I am blissfully bound.

O Love, Lady, help me
That I may die in his arms which now embrace me.
But still, willingly shall I suffer the pain of death
In my sinful body.

Love, you have ever more the greatest power of all the virtues;
For this I shall ever thank God. You free me from many a heartache.
I no longer have any virtue;
He serves me with his virtues.
That I ever could do anything good separated from my Lord:

That would be more difficult for me than death.
I dare not, alas, claim credit
For everything that I say about love.
It is God, rather, who is thereby reaching out
To all those chosen in his heart.

Those to whom this is addressed shall indeed know:
Love makes empty hearts full.
But when we are full of wrangling and discontent,
The game of love is completely closed to us.

Good night, Love. I'm off to bed, alleluia!

20. The Six Virtues of St. Dominic

On the feast of St. Dominic I prayed to our Lord for the whole Order of Preachers. Our dear Lord deigned to come to me himself and he brought along St. Dominic whom, if I dare say it, I love above all the saints.

Our Lord said: "My son Dominic had four things about him while on earth that all priors should have about them. He loved his fellow Dominicans so much that he could never bear to trouble them with things arising from some whim of his own. The second is that he often improved the food to help and show affection for his brethren, so that the young brothers might not think back on the world and so that the older ones might not succumb on the way. The third is that in holy wisdom he provided for them the model for being moderate, for the sake of God, in their whole being, in all their customs, and in all their wants. The fourth is that he was so merciful that he never wanted to burden his dear brethren with any kind of penance that the order did not require for wrongdoing."

And our Lord continued: "I shall mention two more things. Whenever Dominic laughed, he did so with true delight of the Holy Spirit. But when he wept, he wept with such sincerity that first and foremost among his desires he always put his brethren before my eyes and, in addition, with all his strength, Holy Christianity." Before this I did not know that any laughing could be free of frivolity and not wrong.

21. Sixteen Reasons Why the Order of Preachers Is Dear to God'

After this our dear Lord said: "I love two things in the Order of Preachers so much that my divine heart unceasingly smiles upon it. The first is the holiness of their life; the second is their great value for the church. In addition, they greet my Holy Trinity with seven things. These are: deep sighs, sincere weeping, intense longing, strict discipline, distressful exile, genuine humility, and joyous love."

Our Lord spoke again: "They also glorify my three names externally in seven ways: with hymns of praise, with sincere preaching, with correct remission," by lovingly consoling, with friendly help, by being models of holiness. They are also a wholesome bond of Christian faith."

In addition, our darling Lord said: "The alms they give to the poor for love of me are so holy that the sins of the poor people who receive them are reduced and, then too, the devil is not able to remain where their gifts are being eaten. This is because of the holiness of their pleasing poverty."

Ah, eternal spring of the Godhead, out of which I and all things flowed, I, unworthy creature, praise you with everything that is below you that, in spite of everything, Lord, I have been consoled by you. Amen.

22. Brother Heinrich's Fourfold Crown and of the Dignity of St. Dominic^{3e}

In the Order of Preachers a brother died on the solemn feast of Easter after he had preached, sung mass, and had given people the holy body of our Lord. And when he had taken care of all his duties, he had himself anointed and departed toward nightfall. After he was buried, a certain person³⁷ went to where his dead body was and greeted both soul and body. She did this regularly upon the death of religious people. There God celebrated in her soul a divine feast, and his soul was shown to her in God's embrace in great glory. She saw clearly that his glory was not yet complete, and she asked our Lord how long he was going to remain like that and whether he had suffered at all in purgatory. Our Lord said: "He shall remain like this for a week." That is, seven days and seven nights. He had rested himself on God's breast in untold bliss of spiritual fervor that he had not experienced on earth. Very quickly had he come there without suffering, just as a mother takes up her dear child out of the ashes onto her lap. He said: "Tell my sister³⁹ I shall console her with God in fourteen days." It happened. She died fourteen nights later.

Then he invited me to his feast, where he was going to receive his glory. The whole heavenly army prepared for it and joined together in a beautiful procession. St. Dominic came with a whole throng. They were all preachers, and they all wore the golden crowns of those who died in the order, crowns that differed in value according to how holy they had been in the order. St. Dominic brought a shining crown toward Brother Heinrich that sparkled as beautifully as the sun at its brightest. He gave it to him as a reward from God, because he had followed his holy example in the Dominican order.

St. Dominic is indescribably more beautiful than the others because he receives a special honor from each brother as a reward. I saw him especially well clothed because of three qualities. He wears a white garment of innate purity; in addition, a green garment of growing wisdom of God, and also a red garment decorated with clasps because he had suffered spiritual martyrdom. They carry a military standard displaying the order's honor, one that no one else carries. A fine banner precedes them that all follow who on earth have lived according to their teaching.

Our Lord sat in his omnipotence and crowned this brother with three kinds of honors. They were: simple obedience, voluntary poverty, constant humiliation. Brother Heinrich thanked our Lord thus: "I thank you, Lord, that you found me, preserved me, and received me." He then bowed to our Lord and turned to his brothers. St. Dominic said: "Welcome, dear son, now enter into the glory of your Lord, alleluia!"

That I might experience this favor and might see this was especially due to my being lonely for the love of God and to being constantly treated with malicious contempt by the friends of God.

23. About the Burial of St. John the Evangelist⁴⁰

I actually saw the body of St. John the Evangelist with the eyes of my unworthy soul. He lies unburied in great bliss above all corruptible things beneath the creation of the eternal kingdom." His body has now taken on so much of divine eternity that it glows like a fiery crystal. He lies there so lovely in his human form, as though his spirit had fallen asleep in the midst of a heavenly rapture. His eyebrows are still brown; his eyes are closed and he is lying on his back. Beneath, above, and all around him everything is bright, and every seven hours the holy angels come to his body with a song of praise that goes like this: "Holy, pure, simple, wise, and dear to God's heart." The song has a sweeter melody than the sound of a thousand strings or harps. Between his body and the creation of the kingdom of heaven exists only a thin wall, like the membrane of an egg, and yet it is forever tough, so that no body is able to pass through it until the last day.

24. How God Receives the Souls in Heaven; How He Crowns Three Kinds of People; How He Greet, Adorn, Praise, and Thanks Them

The kingdom of heaven has many beautiful gates and yet it has none. The many doors are the glorious different rewards with which God receives each soul, and all of heaven opens up for God's lovely bride. God descends through all the choirs toward the soul, and the whole heavenly host follows him with everything beautiful in proportion to what she may receive as her reward. Thus does the soul joyfully leave purgatory or her exile on earth. Many a fair angel follows her as well. At the gates of heaven the two lovers meet-God and the soul. The noble look with which he receives her and the holy reflection of his splendor that she receives from him have such power in her that she can never again think of what has caused her harm or interior sorrow.

The usual crown of the kingdom is placed upon her head at the gate; that is God's will. With it he leads her in with honor. That is why it is called the crown of the kingdom. That sinner who was evil to the end and to whom God then sends sorrow receives no other honor as his reward. God crowns three kinds of people with his fatherly hands: virgins, widows, and married people. Just as he receives them with all praise, so does he then crown them. Widows and married people are crowned by our Lord as he sits in almighty glory. But for the virgins he rises and crowns them, standing like the son of an emperor. He greets them inwardly with his living Godhead; he honors them outwardly with his almighty humanity; he adorns them with the generosity of the Holy Spirit; he also rewards them everlastingly according to rank with the whole Trinity in his kingdom for all that which they bring along. He thanks them all individually for coming, and they praise God fervently that he saved them from eternal death.

25. How We Are Now Present in Heaven, Purgatory, and Hell

We are now present in heaven. Just as we are now on earth clothed with virtues and adorned and permeated with holy love of God, so are we now visible to all the blessed, and they praise God and rejoice because of us, as though we were now with them there. They do not see in advance what is happening to us, but they do see that we are growing in nobility, increasing in splendor, and ascending to the heights. This is what is happening hour after hour to the blessed who are still on earth. Because of it the joy of the saints and angels increases. Alas! If we sink into great venial sins, our fair heavenly radiance is extinguished. Then the angels beseech and the saints beg our dear Lord that we turn back and become pure again.

We are also present in purgatory as soon as we have earned it on earth. This pains all those who are there, but they cannot help us because they are themselves burning in such torment. There are many poor souls in this purgatory with such guilt that they cannot know whether they are ever going to be redeemed." Why? Because they never wanted to confess with their fleshly mouth. We have seen how they may be saved in a different chapter.⁴

The sinner's presence is also manifest in hell. God's mercy follows him. Hence they are there today, and tomorrow they are the angels' companions.

Thus does our presence go in and out of heaven, purgatory, and wretched hell according to where our own free will seeks to align itself.

26. God Consoles the Depressed Brother Baldwin'

A brother in the Order of Preachers was so weighed down by an important office accepted under obedience-as happens to many-that his youthful vigor was drained from him and he lost his natural strength; yet he still carried on with good intentions. So I begged our Lord that he might turn his favor in that direction. Our Lord instructed me and said: "I have heard and seen all the distress he is suffering, and what he reads and writes. All this shall become the following song of love praising me before my eternal court: Great God, eternal, mighty, marvelous, alleluia. And I shall lift up his head and increase all his might, just as I have done for you-not just by nature, but rather even more by grace."

27. Concerning the End of the Order of Preachers and the Antichrist; Concerning Enoch and Elias

The Order of Preachers was under severe attack from false teachers and, in addition, from many greedy sinners. So I prayed to our dear Lord that he might protect in them his own honor. God said: "As long as I want to keep them, no one can destroy them."

I asked: "O dear Lord, will the order exist until the end of the world?"

Our Lord said: "Yes, they shall continue until the end of the world. But another kind of people shall come." They shall then instruct these people who then come so that they shall be wiser, mightier, and poorer in earthly needs, and made more fervent by the Holy Spirit because of the wretched ill fortune that is approaching for Holy Christianity."

Then I saw these people, their garb, their manner of life, and that there were a great number of them. They had no more than two garments; the undergarment is white and the outer garment red, signifying the pure humanity of our Lord and his holy death. Their hair and their beards were let grow as long as they would. Their belt is fashioned of woven material from an olive tree signifying holy mercy, which they bring to misguided Christianity. They all go barefoot, but in regions where it freezes they wear red shoes with white laces but no stockings. They wash their faces in summer with water, even in the woods, but not in winter, for they have no dwellings of their own. They are strangers in all places and suffer much distress. They have neither house nor home, and neither silver nor gold stored anywhere. Each of them walks with a white staff colored red. The staff has a curved upper part that is a span long and made of ivory. The ivory means they should be chaste and pure in all things. The staff is white and red; thereby they call to mind Christ's death. Into one side of the staff is carved the passion of our Lord; on the other side his ascension into heaven. They must keep this staff with them in all places, when eating or sleeping, praying or preaching, celebrating mass or hearing confessions. And when they put the staff aside, they must stick it into the ground before their eyes, so that they might constantly behold the passion of Christ.

When their journey is thirty leagues long and they must go to be of help or out of necessity, so may the two of them take along a donkey they may sometimes ride. In such cases they may not carry their staff at their side but must carry it upright in front of them in their hand as God's cross. They must ride this lowly animal so that they might resemble God in humility. Also, their feet shall cause them such pain that they cannot complete the whole distance. But they may not wear shoes any longer than from All Saints until the day on which St. Peter became pope.⁴⁷ They shall ask no one for breeches or other clothing, but when no one offers them bread, they should humbly ask for it and should eat and drink with the common people all the food that is given them with the exception of meat. Also, they should not fast any more than Christian law already commands, and they should find such shelter that they might pray and sleep under a separate roof away from other people.

As people come to recognize and acknowledge their holy way of life, they will be so improved because of it that they shall give them willingly what they need in great love. They should also not dwell under the same roof with any widow. People should wash their calloused feet with great tenderness, and they should thank God profusely that they go forth and anoint misguided Christianity, just as Mary Magdalene did for our Lord.⁴⁸ They anoint them also, but only men should do it because they are not God.⁴⁹ When people notice that their clothing is worn out, they should give them new clothing. If someone freely wants to give them much, they should not accept it. Rather, they should advise people to give with compassion wherever it does some good.

Their general chapter meeting takes place twice a year for the good and benefit of Christianity: in summer in the woods, in winter in the town hall. Whoever wants to enter this order should himself have two books at hand. He shall preach from the larger book. The first thing that is written in this book is the Credo in deum,⁵⁰ and thereafter it is filled with learned sermons all ordered according to the articles of Christian faith. From the smaller book he shall recite to our Lord the hours of the Holy Office. The first master⁵¹ who will take up this way of life will be the son of the king of Rome. His name before God in German is Alleluia. The pope shall invest him with his immediate power. After that he shall himself choose and shall receive this way of life from the pope.⁵²

Then many important masters shall join him. They should not be younger than twenty-four years of age. They shall accept no one except those who are healthy and have had advanced studies. They must all be priests, confessors, and sound, well-qualified masters. The first master shall be called their prince and should be accompanied by three brothers, because the Christian faith shall undergo trials most frequently in his case. There should be one master for every thirteen of them. They shall call him their protector, and he should be accompanied by two brothers. Their power is very great, for no bishop is their equal. Wherever they go, they shall be authorized to preach, hear confessions, and sing and say mass. In each diocese there shall be seven of them, signifying the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit. In an archdiocese there shall be thirteen of them, signifying the holy convent of our Lord.⁵³ At Rome there shall be thirty of them, signifying the blessed selling that took place with Christ." The greatest number of them shall be in Jerusalem where Jesus suffered death for our sake. Their small chapter meeting shall be held every three weeks, signifying the complete union with the Holy Trinity; by five brothers, signifying the five wounds; or by seven, signifying the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit; and thereafter by as many as can gather together. Wherever they eat or drink, the oldest in the order shall speak for a while about Christ's deeds and his holy life, and the others should be silent.

I also saw their bed-how they should lie on straw between two white woolen blankets with a pillow under their head. This should be placed under the bottom blanket on the straw. Their loins shall never sit nor lie comfortably, for they shall be hardy all their days until their holy martyrdom, as was the case with Christ. However, if an old master who has served well, and because of age cannot practice austerity up until the end of the order, should become sick or weak, he should be bedded in comfort and lovingly cared for, because they are still capable of giving much holy advice. And they should also be given the best nourishment. This holy life shall continue in great tranquility for thirty years. During that time they shall so greatly illumine and instruct Christians that no one shall turn away from the Christian faith because of untutored simplicity.

Woe, thereafter calamity shall strike! The Antichrist shall come⁵⁵ and assume power over the secular princes by means of gold, precious stones, and unimaginable deceptive cunning, to which they are now so drawn. Hence they follow him quite happily and say that he is their god and lord, and they follow him in solemn procession, presenting him with their seal and proclamations. Alas, then he comes to the spiritual powers. There he also discovers greed and brings such great perverse wisdom that very few bishops, priors, and priests withstand him. But these blessed brothers shall put their life on the line and preach fervently the Christian faith. And they shall give true indulgence for all sins to all those who die in the Christian faith with true sorrow, so that they will be saved without purgatory. Because these pious brothers dealt with people in such a pious manner earlier, many a holy martyr among them shall triumph. Many Jews and some wise heathens shall receive holy baptism and the Christian faith from these brothers. This shall so enrage the Antichrist that he shall impose his stern prohibition and intense severe oppression upon all those who go to their sermons. Whoever then goes there and stands by them is certainly a blessed person.

Then tribulation begins. The good separate from the evil and risk their bodies and all that they have. The Antichrist's messengers arrive there and, first of all, stab the holy preacher with an iron pole because of his Christian faith. God's dear friend must hang there writhing in front of the children of God. Thus do they carry the holy man impaled between them for all the world to see. The evil ones laugh, the good weep. And he sings with the voice of the Holy Spirit: "Credo in deum," and he consoles and calls out: "Follow me, ye holy children of God!" All who then follow him are captured, have their eyes bound, are struck with scourges, and are driven like sheep being stolen to a place where a flood of water is passing by. There, their blessed heads are all chopped off and hurled into the water. Where there is no water, they are driven onto a field and martyred. God gives the evil ones the idea to bind the eyes of the good so that in their prison they may not see the great splendor, the enormous power and honor that the accursed ones have from their lord, the Antichrist. So may they the better persevere; for they, too, are just human, as are these. They take the dead blessed preacher and put him high up on the same place from which he spoke God's word and was martyred. Those who wish to preach there according to the Christian faith have to be living martyrs and great saints.

The Antichrist's power is so great that no one is his equal. When the pope can no longer do battle against him, he turns to the holy brothers and suffers what they suffer. Then Enoch and Elijah come to their aid.⁵⁶ They are now in sweet paradise, living there in both soul and body in the same bliss and eating the same food that had been given to Adam if he had remained there. They, too, in obedience to God, must avoid the same tree from which Eve and Adam ate the apple when they broke God's commandment. I have seen this tree. It is not large, and its fruit is outwardly quite lovely and desirable like a rose; but under the surface it is by nature very sour. That signifies the bitter harm of sin, which God never intended for man. Because this fruit is so detrimental for a noble person that it is still poison for us, God has put his prohibition on it, for he never wanted to cause human beings distress.

In this final agony, after these blessed brothers have consoled the simple folk until no good person is left who has not suffered a martyr's death, most of these brothers will be still alive. Though innocent, their suffering is so great and their prayers so holy, that God then sends Enoch and Elijah to them, who console them and lead them out of the woods so that they might go preach again and prepare for death. These two lords, who then come from paradise, are so wise in divine truth that by their might they turn the Antichrist around and drive him off. They tell him clearly who he is, from what power his emblems derive, how he has gotten where he is, and what sort of end he shall have. When the perverted ones hear what a pitiful god had been given them because of their great greed and because of their lust for the many kinds of evil that God sees in their hearts, then many a noble man and many a fair woman among Christians who had followed the Antichrist are converted. And so these blessed must be martyred, for then the Antichrist is given supreme power on earth. He commands that all the men be rounded up so that he can test their Christian faith. On the streets red-hot griddles are made ready to which they are then driven all together. Their wives and fair children are summoned. Then they are commanded to choose: whether, by denying their faith, they prefer to keep their lovely wives and dear children, their riches and honor or, by keeping their Christian faith, they are willing to cook on the griddles and lose their lives. The men say: "Oh, dear wives and children, do not think about me; remember rather that you are Christians and offer your bodies to God. Then we shall not be separated."

Then the men are bound hand and foot and are thrown onto the griddles. The women and children say: "Lord Jesus, Child of Mary, for love of you we gladly want to suffer the same torment."

Then a pit filled with fire is made ready. The children and the mothers are hurled into it, and firewood and straw are heaped upon them. Thus are they burned to death.

An angel accompanies Enoch and Elijah from paradise. The radiance and bliss that show on their bodies shall always be preserved. When they behold the earth, they shudder, as men do who look upon the sea and wonder in fear how they are going to get across it. Then they" receive earthly appearances and, as a result, become human beings who are mortal. They eat honey and figs and drink water mixed with wine, and their spirits also receive sustenance from God.

28. The Fivefold Power of Love. Because of the Weakness of People and the Treachery of the World One Must Remain Silent About the Truth

This book was begun in love, it shall also end in love; for nothing is as wise or as holy or as beautiful or as strong or as perfect as love. Our Lord Jesus Christ said: "Speak, Father; I shall now be silent as you are silent in the mouth of your Son, angered because of the weakness of people. Just so did my humanity speak trembling at the treachery of the world; for it rewarded me with bitter death."

Book V

1. Three Kinds of Sorrow, Ten Kinds of Benefits, and the Path of Angels and Devils

There are three kinds of sorrow by which the sinner conforms himself again to the seal that was inscribed on the cross when sins crushed us. The first is sorrow for guilt, which has three qualities: bitterness in the heart out of which the sin flowed; shame in the senses that took pleasure in the sin; a clear image of the life in which the person became evil. This sorrow reconciles the sinful soul to the heavenly Father and frees her from the eternal pains of hell. The second is sorrow of penance, which also has three qualities: intense striving and constant aspiration and pure victory over all temptations. This sorrow completely frees the sinner from purgatory. The third is sorrow out of love, for it is true to God alone. It considers an insult to God much more serious than harm to itself or its own interior suffering. Also, it would rather go body and soul to hell than sadden its lover with a serious sin. This sorrow out of love makes people on earth holy and perfect, and raises them up before God in heaven. When the blessed soul is in such a state, God is dearer to her than she is to herself, and sin is her most serious regret.

The blessed person who has these three kinds of sorrow receives the honor here on earth that God lets his fiery spirit shine forth unceasingly from his Holy Trinity into this loving soul, just like a bright sunbeam shining forth from the hot sun lights up a new golden shield. The radiant light of God and the loving soul that so delightfully sparkles forth from both of them has such great power and shines so brightly for all who are in heaven, purgatory, and hell that the highest angels, Cherubim and Seraphim, feel an intimate closeness to the loving soul, and in this same light, on fire with boundless love, they descend to the soul as it flames with love.' That is the path of the noble princes² to the pampered soul in this poor body, for the angel and the loving soul are from God a whole nature in their innate chastity and in the fire of love in the Seraphim. But acquired chastity, adorned and illuminated with the flowing fire of divine love, beams forth downward into the Cherubim.' Toward them in turn fiery bright joys of love burst forth from the Seraphim, for they⁴ are on fire with love. This is why the exquisite radiance travels down, causing them⁵ to flash with love. The angels that are given to us in baptism cannot tend this burning love, for God has not given them the heat. Rather, they are given to us to cultivate our virtue; and their noble presence and our best free will sanctify all our actions and drive the devil's cunning and power away from our five senses. But the great fiery radiance that lights up everything, as it descends from the Holy Trinity into the loving soul, strikes such fear into the devils that they dare not pass through this holy ray. Because of it they suffer much humiliation. The paths that God has allowed them in the air-these can be taken from them by an earthly human being through union with God. They can freely travel over those paths where evil wants them to be. But where they sense a loving soul in a body, they must pass by under the earth. Also, they cannot foul the air where they find those blessed who truly live free of serious sin. All the sins they bring to us they must always begin on earth. As we then ascend to God with our Christian faith in our best strivings, they lose all their power and must hasten away from us.

2. Two Kinds of Suffering, Four Kinds of Benefits, and the Manifold Host of Sins

I thank God for all goodness and I find fault with myself the while I live, for God does not punish without a reason. As long as a person has the ability to sin, he needs suffering as well as virtues. That suffering is very profitable which a person inflicts upon himself for the love of God after seeking counsel. But that suffering is much nobler and more useful which God inflicts upon us by means of his enemies or his friends, since he is nobler than all tormentors. Christ did not redeem us with the pain that he inflicted upon himself; rather, he taught us how we should serve him in toil and suffering. But he redeemed us with the suffering that his enemies inflicted upon him, despite his innocence, and with his woeful, shameful death, when no one remained his faithful friend except one maiden: Mary, his mother, was truly inwardly united to him, as she outwardly remained there standing near him.

As I, in my disloyalty, was being ill-tempered because of my suffering, God gave me this consolation and said: "Look, no one can do without suffering because it purifies a person of his many sins from hour to hour." Alas, I saw such a huge and frightening host of sins of all kinds following us, as though all the mountains, all stones, every drop of rain, all grass, trees, greenery, and sand were all living persons and were trying to crush us so that we would never ascend to God. Alas, for the pitiful mote sins that we cannot express in words; for them that suffering is visited upon us here which we carry secretly on our wretched body. Second, the bitterness of suffering protects us from a future fall, which often causes a pure heart to tremble, though it carries enclosed within it God's spirit. Third, the nobility of suffering makes us worthy to receive God's favor; for if I receive all my comfort, my necessities, and my earthly consolation with fear, with dread, and with a lonely heart, then God is present with his consolation.

3. God Shall Weigh All Innocent Suffering and Also the Blood of Three Kinds of People

On the last day, Christ Jesus shall hold aloft a glorious scale before his Father. Upon it will lie his holy toil and his innocent suffering, and in it and next to it all the blameless torment, humiliation, and interior pain that was ever suffered by human beings for the love of Christ. Indeed, when the right side of the scales sinks, those rejoice the most who have much upon it. The blood of virgins by its nature, the blood martyrs shed for their Christian faith, and other blood spilled through killing but shed in innocence during justified self-defense: this is what the holy Son of God shall weigh together with his blood, because it was poured out in true innocence. Marriage blood is not put onto the scale. Why? It is beforehand impure, but it extinguishes that very sin that arises from carnal knowledge.⁶

4. The Power of Marvelous Love Is Manifold; How the Soul Sinks. Four Kinds of Humility. The Sevenfold Beauty of the Loving Soul

O wondrous Love of God, you possess great sacred power, you illumine the soul, teach the senses, and bestow full strength on all virtues. Fortunate am I, poor village maid, that I ever beheld you, dear Lady. O Love, you are full of delight and worthy of praise in all your acts. This is what I experience in my soul. All virtues are your subjects. But sinking humility that has not been fouled with arrogance in spirituality, and chastity-innate or acquired, that are both completely pure-these two virtues must accompany love, though they are subject to her.

This love passes through the senses and storms the soul with all its might. All the while that love grows in the soul, it ascends to God longingly and, richly flowing, opens up to receive the wonder that is approaching. It dissolves through the soul into the senses. Then does the body gain its share, so that it is refined with respect to all things.

Can someone who loves God have evil habits? Nowhere do I find this to be the case; such great power does genuine love of God have. And yet the soul is never so utterly flooded with divine love that she is not often tempted by earthly things. This love a soul can never receive that is riddled with false love. When love has grown to ripeness in the soul, it has also ascended as far as is humanly possible. For love is limited in its capacity. If it did not have a limit, alas, sweet God, how many a pure heart would burst in sweet bliss.

When the soul in her pursuit of love and the great longing of her God-stalking heart has ascended the lofty mountain of powerful love and beautiful knowledge, she acts like the pilgrim who has climbed mountains with great zest but then climbs down the other side in great fear, so that he does not take a tumble. Just so, when the soul has been permeated by the radiant heat of long love and has thus become faint in the embrace of the Holy Trinity, she begins to sink and to cool, as does the sun when it descends from its highest point and sinks down into the night. God knows, this is what happens to the soul and also to the body. The soul, rich in love, sinks downward under the pull of profound humility and constantly retreats from what God does to her out of love. This is very agreeable to her because of her noble nature, which God and she fill to the same single end. Also, she turns the eye of her desire from all things in order to be able to gain much praise for God. The body, too, sinks far down when it serves its enemy,' obeys without complaint, and avoids its friends to God's honor. The soul sinks deeper still because she has more strength than the body. She sinks with great zeal to the lowest place that God holds in his power. Oh, how dare I name this place for those who know nothing of sinking humility.

First humility is external, having to do with one's dwelling place and clothes-that they are proper, are tailored to a religious cut, and yet are clean. Second humility has to do with conduct in the company of others-that it is lovingly attuned to all needs and in all things. Out of this grows the holy love of God. Third humility has to do with the senses-that a person make proper use of them in all things and love in the right amount. Fourth humility dwells in the soul. This is sinking humility, which performs many a sweet marvel in the love-rich soul. It chases her up into heaven and drags her down again into the abyss. It leads the soul to all creatures one by one and says: "Now look, all this is better than you are!" And it brings her then to the spot where she can go no further: under Lucifer's tail.' If, in her desire to honor God as she would want, she could remain there, she would prefer nothing better. So tightly is the poor love-rich soul bound by humble love that she feels no fear or shame except in the temperate way one is accustomed to fear in heaven.' But the poor body must feel both fear and shame because of the darkness of its heart and the weakness of its external senses, because it has not yet been transformed by death.

The soul, on the other hand, is just as beautiful in her body as she is in heaven, but she is not as secure.
She is just as bold but she is not as strong.
She is just as powerful but she is not as constant.
She is just as lovely but she is not as happy.
She is just as generous but she is not as rich.
She is just as holy but she is not as innocent.
She is just as content but she is not as full.
That soul alone is satisfied which is here flooded with the humble love of God.

When she has thus ascended to those heights possible for her while she is still attached to the body and has sunk to the deepest point that she can find, then she is fully grown in virtues and holiness. Then she shall be adorned with the suffering of long waiting.

Then she goes to wait faithfully
And looks upon all things with great wisdom;
Nothing can escape her;
She makes it all yield its praise to God.

5. The Purgatory of a Beguine Whom No Prayer Helped Because of Her Selfishness

Woe, Sin, you are so destructive since even holy works that one performs without counsel are very destructive if one speaks thus: "No, I am beyond the need for human counsel. I intend to live according to God's counsel." I always shudder at these words because no person in any situation can humble himself to better advantage than by following Christian counsel with an obedient heart. This became clear to me in the case of a woman who loved our Lord from her heart and cherished this love with such superhuman exertion that her nature shriveled up and she died. As is the Christian custom, I prayed for her. In a rapture of my spirit I saw her spirit, which was in itself bright as the sun. This came from the faithful love in her pure heart. She was surrounded by great darkness and urgently desired to reach eternal light. Whenever she was ascending, dark night always blocked her. This was her selfish will refusing counsel that so utterly held this person back.

I asked her: "How can one help you?"

She replied: "While on earth I never wanted to follow anyone's advice given according to Christian custom. Because of this no one's prayer or desire can be of help to me."

So I turned to our dear Lord and asked him how it could be that a person could be delivered over to suffering who, while on earth, has assumed so much holy suffering out of love for him.

Our Lord said: "All virtues are worthless to me that come about apart from counsel; for I came to earth because of counsel." And I served my Father and all men on earth with great submission, and then I ascended into heaven in complete freedom. But in what I always did, no one follows me. The longing, prayer, and all the effort that one expends on her on earth shall adorn her when she ascends to heaven."

The soul: "Everything that is given to us as a help on our path to heaven is rightfully ours. But once we arrive there, it is shared by the souls. This God does for us for our own good, so that they might more readily come and help us praise God in eternal glory."

In justice, her suffering was to last seventeen years, but God's mercy reduced it to seventeen months because she had acted out of such intense love. May God help us to right moderation! Amen.

6. How the Soul Praises the Holy Trinity

Lord Jesus Christ, you have flowed spiritually out of the heart of your eternal Father from eternity and were born in the flesh from a pure and untouched virgin, St. Mary, and are with your Father one spirit, one will, one wisdom, one power, one superior might over everything that ever was, forever!

Lord, eternal Father, I, too, the most unworthy of all human beings, have flowed forth spiritually from your heart and, Lord Jesus Christ, was born in the flesh from your side and, Lord God and Man, I have been purified by the Spirit of you both. Thus do I, poor despondent human being, speak:

“Lord, heavenly Father, you are my heart.
Lord Jesus Christ, you are my body.
Lord Holy Spirit, you are my breath.
Lord, Holy Trinity, you are my only refuge and my eternal rest!”

7. How God Praises the Soul in Return

You are a solid foundation for my divine flowing.
You are a glory of virginal constancy.
You are a flower of sublime delight.
You are a vanquisher of devils.
You are a mirror of inward contemplation.

8. A Good Person Should Have Three Children for Whom to Pray

No one knows what consolation or suffering or longing is unless he is touched by these three himself. I am seeking help because I am sorely afflicted. I have three children that I see suffering great distress.

The first child is poor sinners who lie in eternal death. There is nothing to console them with except that they have a living human body." Alas, I look at the child with a bloody heart and I take it into the arms of my soul with weeping eyes and carry it before the feet of its Father from whom I got it. Then I look at the child and beg its faithful Father, Jesus, that he awaken this child with the same voice of his divine mercy with which he awakened Lazarus.¹²

To this God replies: "I shall heal the sickness of this child. If it does not again succumb to this death, it shall be like me in my beauty, in my nobility, and in my abundance, surrounded and permeated by all bliss in eternal everlastingness. Arise, my dear child, you are healed! Free will I have given you and shall never take it away, for according to it all your dignity shall be measured, like that of the saints, in the beautiful kingdom of heaven." Alas, this child still lies motionless upon its own selfish will.

My second child: these are the poor souls who are tormented in purgatory; to them I must give my heart's blood to drink. When I pray for them and see the many kinds of distress and the bitter thirst that they suffer in a specific manner for each sin, then I suffer the pain of a mother. And yet I am happy that they suffer torment for their real guilt to the glory of God. They accept their suffering with great patience because they see all their guilt clearly. They suffer their pain with acquired wisdom and drink into themselves much interior suffering. If this child is to recover soon, its mother has to be very faithful and merciful.

My third child: these are the imperfect in religious life. When I look upon all my sick children, for none do I feel more distress than for this one because, alas, it has so completely estranged itself from heavenly things through its external preoccupation with transitory things that it has utterly lost its noble way of life and its sweet intimacy with God, to which God had drawn it by especially choosing it. Because of this they become so completely disoriented that no one can turn them around with words. And so they revile the interior life, pervert God's sweetness, and maliciously interpret everything they see and hear, as well. Thus they appear wise outwardly but unfortunately are all fools inwardly. This child has the worst chance of recovery because it is the first to slip into stubborn contentiousness, then into indolence, then into false consolation, then into despair, and then, alas, it loses all grace. And so this poor child creeps along in its sinful existence till its end. Thus it is very doubtful indeed which direction this confused soul will take.

9. Concerning the Glory of Seventy Men Who Arose with Christ as Testimony

On the glorious day of Easter, when our redemption was so clearly made manifest and Jesus Christ arose in such might and left his grave in such majesty that the Jews and the heathens lost their power and all their honor and true Christians were blessed by the Father's good will, were made fortunate by the power of the Son, and were made holy evermore by the teaching of the Holy Spirit: on that day seventy men arose together with our Lord. They had been obedient to God's commands when they fought God's fight. They were found to be just when they were tempted and, in their great thirst, they splashed water with their hands to their mouth. Their souls were joined again by God to their bodies but in such a way that one could clearly tell that they had been dead.'

But the sinful human juice that Adam bit from the apple, that still courses through all our members because of our nature and, in addition, the cursed blood that originated in the apple for Eve and all women-that was not given back to them because their transformation was supposed to be a divine testimony with God that eternal death was dead. They were no longer subject to death because they did not have in themselves these two things.' Their soul separated from their body without pain or suffering. Their bodies lie in beauty above the air and above the stars. Because they did not die a second time in a human manner, their bodies did not need to be buried on earth.

Adam, and all men with him, retained this juice. Eve and all women kept this shameful blood. This alone it is that by nature torments our flesh and our senses, and ultimately has to die bitterly within us. For after Adam's fall the only affliction Jesus Christ took from us was eternal death and he ordained that, through sorrow, we might come back. He did, however, give us very much sweet consolation, counsel, and teaching through which we might easily recover from all our debilities.

10. How Sin Is Like God's Greatness

The greatness of almighty God is similar to nothing as much as it is to the sinful immensity of my wickedness.

11. A Religious Name Shall Be Exalted. Concerning the Conduct of Sisters. How They Should Pray and Toil with God

O religious Name,¹⁵ how noble you are above all earthly names. For this reason Jesus Christ himself wanted to bear you so faithfully his whole life that all lofty names-king, emperor, count, and all names that are named for nobility-must decay; but a religious name alone shall be exalted to the extent that it has been here nobly borne. Indeed, it shall be wonderfully, especially, and in sanctity raised up near Brother Jesus and Sister Mary, who were the very first always to bear a religious name, suffering outwardly such great contempt but with such holiness inwardly. This is very much contrary to those people who here with much ostentation adorn themselves spiritually with holy bearing and deep bowing, and drape themselves in public in beautiful words that one might well imagine that inwardly they possess the flood of the Holy Spirit which is causing it all to come gushing forth. No, unfortunately it is sometimes a very cunning temptation that causes a person to assume out of self-will that, without effort and without striving, he has a good name; and yet he does not feel in his heart the full birth of the Holy Spirit. This comes clearly to light when he turns into a fierce bear and a roaring lion in the presence of his closest companions, when he should be a lamb as to meekness and a dove as to virtues. Thus their life before the world is a sham, and before God and their equals a very damaging lie.

Woe to you, most wretched Lust, how my heart is enraged by you! For you rob my dear sisters of their inward sweetness of God and the outward loveliness that should be preparing them and leading them to the holy bridal bed of the Holy Trinity. You make them so hard inwardly and so indignant outwardly that one cannot utter a spiritual word in their presence without their immediately twisting it.

No, dear Sister, before all else you must have an open mind. Then you will get an obliging heart and an open soul into which grace can flow. If you expand too much your basic needs without reason or necessity, truly you shall never have a share in the heights of holy longing, the breadth of divine feeling, and the depths of God's flowing sweetness. It is an eternal shame and an extreme crudity that a king's bride so much enjoys wallowing in muck.

Ah, Sister, if you are to pray as you should, surrender yourself to God completely and say: "Dear intimate Friend, Jesus, this hour belongs to you alone, to poor sinners, to Holy Christianity, and to distressed souls, but not to me. All power and strength of my heart I give you today, Lord, that you, my Love, to your own praise might come to their aid in accordance with my desire; and grant me thereafter, Lord, that I really know who I myself am. Then I shall really be downcast."

But, dear Sister, when you go to your work, bless yourself and say: "Lord, this hour belongs to you and me. Help me, Jesus, Love of my heart, that I may burrow my soul and my mind so deeply into you that earthly desire may not devour me." Indeed, Sister, if you are just humanly wise, desire will attack you fiercely. But if your wisdom comes from grace, no evil can seduce you or betray you. For in that grace which flows forth from the Holy Trinity into a heart that remains ever open to heaven, one finds truth and good judgment in all things. It is quite easy to seem good to people. But if truth is absent, you are snake's venom. Make your heart ever pure within and be humble outwardly. Then you are one with God.

12. How God Responds to a Brother Concerning What Is Written in This Book"

Master Heinrich, you are surprised at some of the words that are written in this book. I am surprised that you can be surprised at this. Indeed, ever since I, sinful woman, have been required to write, it has been a matter of great distress to me in my heart that I am able to describe this authentic knowledge and these holy sublime contemplations to no one except through these words. They seem to me, compared to eternal truth, all too feeble.

I asked the eternal Master what he had to say about this. He replied: "Ask him how it happened that the apostles, after having been so timid, became so bold when they received the Holy Spirit." Ask also where Moses was when he saw nothing but God.' Then ask as well how it happened that Daniel spoke in childhood.'"

13. Ten Kinds of Benefit a Good Person's Prayer Has

That prayer has great power
Which a person undertakes with all his might.
It makes a bitter heart sweet
A sad heart happy
A poor heart rich
A foolish heart wise
A faltering heart bold
A weak heart strong
A blind heart seeing
A cold soul burning.
It draws great God down into a small heart.
It drives the hungry soul up to God's fullness.
It brings together two lovers, God and the soul, to a place of bliss.
There they talk much of love.
O woe! That I, unhappy sack of misery, cannot die there!

14. The Purgatory of Bad Priests

It has been a long time since I saw purgatory. It was like fiery water and boiled like fiery bell metal. Above it was a cloak of murky fog. In the water fish were floating about that had human form. These were the souls of wretched priests who in this world floated in greedy desires and burned in damned lust that so utterly blinds them that they are unable to love anything good. Upon the water were fishermen who had neither boats nor nets. Instead, they fished with their fiery claws because they actually were spirits and devils. When they brought them to the shore, they cruelly tore their skins off and threw them right into a boiling pot. Then they jabbed them with fiery pitchforks. When they decided they were well done, they gobbled them with their beaks. Then the devils went back out on the water, expelled them from under their tails, and then fished for them, boiled them, and devoured them again.

15. The Purgatory of a Good Priest

A pure priest died in his own assigned parish. I prayed for him, as one Christian is accustomed to do for another. Then my soul saw him in marvelous honor, as he was yet in the state of waiting for heavenly glory. Four angels led him across the storms in the first heaven and plucked harps with heavenly strings for his enjoyment. This was the purgatory by which they prepared him for heavenly bliss. I asked him how he had gained this special honor.

He said: "On earth I loved solitude and was fearful only in my prayers."

I said: "Ah, most blessed Man, why did you not ascend right to heaven with these delightful angels?"

He replied thus: "The glory that I am to receive because of my pure priestly life is so great that I cannot yet enter into it."

16. It Is Diabolical to Sin

Some people who are learned say it is human to sin. In every temptation of my sinful body, in every movement of my heart, in every bit of knowledge of my senses, and in the whole nobility of my soul, I could never find anything else but that it is diabolical that one commit a sin. Whether the sin be small or great, the devil is always its companion. Indeed, it is the devilishness that we take upon ourselves through our selfish free will that is much more harmful to us than our whole human nature. This is human: hunger, thirst, heat, frost, pain, grief, temptation, sleep, weariness. These are the things that Christ, who was true man, bore upon his person because of us and with us. Indeed, if sin were purely human, then he should have sinned, too. For he was true man in the flesh, a just man in wisdom, a man steadfast in virtue, and a perfect man in the Holy Spirit. Beyond that he was eternal God in eternal Truth and not a sinner. But if we are to become like him, we also have to live like him or be saved by sorrow.²⁰

17. This Is a Greeting, Praise, and Prayer of a Sinner²¹

Greetings to you, living God.
You are mine before all things.
I am endlessly glad
That I can speak to you without guile.
When my enemies pursue me,
I flee to your arms
Where I can complain about my suffering
While you incline yourself to me.
You well know how you can pluck
The strings of my soul.
Ah, begin at once

That you may be ever blessed.
I am a low-born bride;
And yet you are my lawful husband.
I shall ever rejoice about this.
Remember how well you can caress
The pure soul on your lap
And do it, Lord, to me now,
Even though I am not worthy of you.
Ah, Lord, draw me up to you.
Then I shall be pure and radiant.
If you abandon me to myself,
I shall remain dark and sluggish.

18. How God Responds to This

Thus does God answer:

"I respond to your greeting with such a heavenly flood:
Were I to give myself to you in all my power,
You would not preserve your human life.
You well know I must hold back my might
And hide my splendor

To let you remain in earthly misery
Until all my sweetness rises up
To the heights of eternal glory,
And my strings shall play sweetly for you
In tune with the true value of your patient love.
Still, before I begin,
I want to tune my heavenly strings in your soul,
So that you might persevere even longer.
For well-born brides and noble knights
Must undergo a long and intensive preparation at great cost.”

19. How Seventeen Kinds of Sin Pursue a Person

These things drive a person so far from God that he can never come back to God unless great force is exerted upon him by the Holy Trinity.

Vanity is the first sin that begins to chase a person away from God;
And if we don't leave it, then lust rises up;
But if we don't leave lust, then greed rises up;
If we don't leave that, then sloth rises up;
If we don't leave that, then lying rises up;
And if we don't leave that, then perjury rises up;
If we don't leave that, then anger rises up;
And if we don't leave that, then slander rises up;
If we don't leave that, then pride rises up;
And if we don't leave that, then hatred rises up;
And if we don't leave that, then vengeance rises up;
And if we don't leave that, then despair rises up;
If we don't leave that, then insolence rises up;
If we don't leave that, then shamelessness rises up;
If we don't leave that, perverted wisdom rises up;
If we don't leave that, unbelief rises up and says: “It is not as they say.”

Alas, they then receive all things coming from God with such distrust that one scarcely dares say anything at all to them. And what they produce themselves is so twisted and utterly shot through with lies that, alas, no one can find the Holy Spirit in their words. But sometimes they act in a praiseworthy manner. Unfortunately it is deceptive.

Perfect soul, rejoice.
You alone are like God.
This is indeed fitting;
For you drink in with godlike patience
Many a bitter draught though guiltless.

You are often saddened by your enemy like hell's frost on heaven's flowers. Yet they go on blooming, exalted in their noble beauty. For through the Holy Spirit the root of their constancy is green in all seasons.

20. Praise of God in Eight Things. An Offering for Sins

O great dew of the noble Godhead,
O tender flower of the sweet maiden,
O beneficial fruit of the fair blossom,
O holy sacrifice of the heavenly Father,
O faithful pledge of redemption for the whole world!
You, Lord, are my refreshment
And I am your blossoming.
You are small before me, Lord, in your submissiveness,
And I am great before you in the misery of my wickedness.
Daily I offer you whatever I have:
Nothing but baseness.
And you, Lord, shall infuse me with your grace.
Then I can flow from your love.

21. Why Man Is Rejected and Yet Loved, and How You Should Bless Yourself

Thus does the mind of a person speak who has experienced truth: Lord, my body has been killed through the elimination of all wickedness. That is why your enemies have cast me from their presence like a dead man who smells foul. And yet, Lord, my soul is alive in you. That is why I am loved by your friends. Ah, Bridegroom dear to my heart, my sweet Jesus Christ, I bless myself unceasingly in my heart before all earthly things and I beg you that you keep me untouched by them; for no matter how holy they are, they draw me away from you at the highest point. That I cannot bear, and that is why I must creep away from them.

22. The Seven Things of Judgment; Shame and Good Will

The noblest joy of the senses, the holiest peace of heart, and the greatest delight in doing come from keeping one's integrity in all that one does. Our dear Lord speaks about this and teaches me seven things that all the blessed shall have about them who shall preside over the last judgment with Jesus Christ.²² Whoever does not have these things shall stand before the court like a sold servant before his master. For all who here struggle against God's truth on the side of crafty lying sell off these virtues.

The first is: to be just in the present life. This means: if I see my friend treating God's enemy and mine unjustly, then I should in loyalty reprove my friend and in charity help my enemy. The second is: to be merciful in distress. Explanation: if I see my friend and my enemy in equal distress, I should help both equally. The third is: to be faithful in public. Explanation: I should never scold my companion except for his unrepented sins. The fourth is: to be ready to help in secret. Explanation: that one search out and inquire where the lonely, sick, and prisoners are; and that one soothe them with words and bid them tell you their secret distress, so that you might be able to come to their aid. Woe to those who pass by those who are sick and alone without groans, tears, or any sign of compassion. How ill that befits those in religious life and, alas, drives them so far from God that they immediately lose sweet intimacy with God; yet they do not want to believe that God's judgment has struck. The fifth is: to be silent in distress. Explanation: that one not speak those reckless words that arise out of an arrogant and angry heart. If one so refrains, one shall find unfathomable favor with God. The sixth is: to be full of the truth. Explanation: that person is genuinely full of the truth whose heart, to the best of his knowledge, reproaches him with not the slightest wrongdoing and who is glad that God's eye sees into his heart, and who would not need to feel ashamed anywhere, even if everyone looked into his heart. The seventh is: to be the enemy of lies. Explanation: that we reproach lies in everyone and we do not cover them up in our own case.

These seven things we should practice and accomplish against the desires of our miserable flesh and against lust and the weakness of the human senses. We can accomplish them in no other way.

But the nobility of our soul gives us the first counsel for all good things with God's true sweetness; however, our perverted flesh in its baseness neglects many a godlike deed. Whenever we remember the blessed hour when God so skillfully created us out of the infinite depths of his heart, and out of his wisdom and out of his cheerful disposition, which pours out in all its goodness without surcease, and out of his sweet mouth-spiritually into our soul, with wisdom into our mind, with benefit to our body, then we must outwardly be ashamed of our evil habits and inwardly of our fickle heart. We should also, alas, be consciously ashamed that with so little benefit we bear the noble and numerous gifts of God, that they return such puny fruit to the place from which they flowed out.²³ Good will brings all virtues to their rightful place, even when the body is incapable of the deeds.

23. St. Mary's Prayer, Gabriel's Light, the Child's Blanket, Where the Milk Came from, the Gifts for the Child, the Devils, and the Hunger Cloth

I saw a maiden at her prayer. Her body was bowed to the earth and her spirit had raised itself toward the eternal Godhead; for before the time when Jesus Christ opened heaven with the key of the holy cross, no human being was so holy that his spirit could or would ascend to the eternal heights by striving and soaring, by longing and embrace with the love of the Holy Trinity. This is why the spirit of the pure virgin was not able to enter heaven because Adam had shoved the bolt shut so fast. But God inclined himself at times so close to the earth that he consoled his friends and they perceived his will. And the prophets cried out and entreated our Lord to come down. But it was this virgin who drew our Lord down here with the sweet voice of her soul; and she said in her prayer when she was alone: "Lord God, I am happy that you intend to come in such a noble manner that a maiden shall be your mother. Lord, I want to serve in this with my chasteness and with all that I have from you."

Then the angel Gabriel strode down here in a heavenly light. The light surrounded the virgin all around, and the angel wore garments the likes of which I never discovered anywhere on earth. When she glimpsed the light with the eyes of the flesh, she arose and was frightened. Looking at the angel she discovered in his face the same chasteness that she had. She stood there with great composure, inclined her ear, and raised up her mind. Then the angel greeted her and announced God's will to her. His words were pleasing to her heart; her senses became full and her soul fiery. But still she asked for clarification. Her maidenly modesty and divine love moved her to do so. When she had been instructed, she opened her heart willingly with all her might. She knelt down and said: "I surrender myself to God's service according to your words."²⁴

Then the whole Holy Trinity, with the power of the Godhead, the good will of its humanity, and the noble delicacy of the Holy Spirit, passed through her whole virginal body into the fiery soul of her devout will, placed itself in the open heart of her most pure flesh, and united itself with all that it found in her, so that her flesh became its flesh in such a manner that a perfect child grew in her body and she became a true mother of his flesh, while remaining an unblemished virgin. The longer she carried him, the more radiant, beautiful, and wise she became. Then she arose and said: "Lord Father, I praise you because you have made me great, and my family shall become great in heaven and on earth."²⁵

When the time had come, when other women are sad and move about with difficulty, Mary was agile and cheerful. And yet her body was quite swollen because she had within it the fully developed Son of God. Mary did not know in advance when God wanted to be born of her until she saw him in her lap on the road on that night in Bethlehem-in a strange town where she herself was a poor homeless guest. The almighty Father with his wisdom, the eternal Son with his human truth, the Holy Spirit with his delicate sweetness passed through the intact wall of Mary's body with blissful ease and without any effort. It had happened just as quickly as when the sun in loving calm sends forth its light upon the sweet dew.

When Mary gazed at her fair child, she inclined her head to his face and said: "Welcome, my innocent Child and mighty Lord, all things are yours." At the conception of our Lord, while his mother was expecting, at his birth, and while he was on the lap of his mother before being placed in the crib, the power of the Holy Trinity and the blissful celestial fire in Mary were so intense that the spirit of hell, which travels about the whole world and knows everything that happens to all things, was not able to approach closely enough to the land and place where Mary was to learn of the miraculous way the Child had gotten there.

Mary took a coarse blanket from Joseph's saddle-one that the donkey had on his back under the saddle-and the upper part of her shift under which she had carried our Lord. The other part she tied around her body again. The delicate virgin wrapped the hardy Savior in this blanket and laid him in the crib. Then he immediately began to cry like a newborn child. As long as babies are unable to speak, they never cry except to express a real need. This is just what our Lord did when, despite his noble nature, he was put to bed in a cowshed because of base sin. He wept for all humankind, hiding all his happiness and all his power. The virgin was sad, and the Child was hungry and cold.

Then the mother had to nurse her Son. This was his Father's will and the Holy Spirit's pleasure. In maternal love, with maidenly bearing, the virgin bent down to her afflicted child and offered him her youthful breast. Now hear of the marvel! The bright blossoming of her fair eyes, the spiritual beauty of her maidenly countenance, the sweetness flowing from her pure heart, and the delightful sparkle of her noble soul: these four things drew together according to the will of the Father, the need of the Son, and the delight of the Holy Spirit in her maidenly breast. And sweet milk flowed forth from her pure heart without any pain. The Child suckled like a human child and his mother rejoiced in a holy manner. The angels sang to God a hymn of praise. The shepherds came and found for all to see our true pledge of redemption in a crib belonging to another.

Then I asked Mary where Joseph was. She said: "He has gone into town and is buying us some small fish and plain bread." Water is what they drank. Then I said: "Lady, you should be eating the very best bread and drinking the finest wine." "No," she said, "that is the food of rich people. We don't have any of that in this poor life."

When the strange star appeared, Satan, too, came to Bethlehem and cunningly followed the three kings; and he gazed with much malice at the Child.

As they were offering the Child great honor with expensive gifts, Satan's thoughts became very confused and he said this to himself: "Poor wretch, what is happening to you now? This could well be the same child of whom the prophets have written, whom your master Lucifer so long and so often put in your charge-that you should come to his birth and make it impure. Then the whole world would remain subject to hell. This child was begotten and born without sin. Otherwise, it would not have been hidden from me. Now all my wiles have been lost. Now I will have to return to my master and lament to him my distress, for this child is going to be too much for us. If it is going to climb above us, how are we supposed to put up with that? Never was any child born who was given such honor."

When Lucifer heard this news, the archfiend sat there gnashing his teeth and shrieking, and the fire of his wrath lit up all of hell. He spoke: "If a human being is to be judge over us, we shall have to tremble evermore before all men who live according to his will. Go back again, Satan, and get the help of the princes of the land, the teachers of the Jews, and teach them how to kill him while he is still a child before he goes to school."

When Satan came to Herod, he discovered Lucifer's likeness in this evil man: hate, pride, greed. On these three paths the great devil proceeded into his bulky heart and spread out into all his five senses and made the king so murderous that he carried out the devil's will on innocent children, who are now glorious saints in heaven.

I asked Mary what she had done with the gifts²⁶ since she did not buy a sacrificial lamb.²⁷ She said: "Sacred flowing generosity, mercy to those in distress, and the love of voluntary poverty took this treasure from me. My sacrificial lamb was Jesus Christ, the Son of God almighty, who was born out of my heart and whom, according to the decree of his Father, all immaculate lambs signify who were ever brought for sacrifice in honor according to his Father's intention. He is my true sacrificial lamb; I was to have no other. The offerings that were brought to my Child I used to remember all those whom I found truly to be in need. These were poor orphans, and pure virgins who were thereby able to marry and not be stoned.²⁸ Also, those who were alone and ill, and those far advanced in age: these were supposed to have the advantage of it, and God intended it for them. But thirty marks of gold were left over after I soothed the distress of these poor. These I was supposed to give for a hunger cloth to which the common people went for their prayer; for there were many symbols pictured on it."²⁹

The cloth was half black and half white. On the north side in the temple the cloth was black. This signified the long-lasting darkness during the old law.³⁰ Upon it were embroidered green images; for although the old law was darkened by many serious sins, yet there were some people during that time who did not shrivel up from their sins; rather, they were dark because of the legalistic observances. All the pictures showed the guilt and distress that so greatly moved mighty God to preserve Noah the just man and his household and let the whole world perish. On the south in the prayer house the cloth was splendidly white. This was a sign of the pure radiant chastity of St. Mary, through which we all should still overcome all the sufferings of our hearts. Upon it were embroidered pictures in gold, likenesses of the birds that Noah sent forth from the ark, which were recognized as signifying the faithless greedy ones who seek all their comfort here on earth. Also embroidered there was the pure dove with the green branch who, guiltless of this, came back again, who did not take the carrion flesh into its mouth. This signifies those who day after day approach God with new virtues and keep themselves steadfastly flying on course toward heaven, drawn by the Holy Spirit.

All the way down the middle, where the pieces came together, was a stripe of gold. Through the middle of this went a green border encrusted with precious stones. This signified the most precious wood that bore the body of our Lord when the gates of heaven were pierced through and beat upon with hammers, and the bolt of Adam flew off them. Although few recognized the meaning, the two ornaments were a glorious cross.³¹ Upon the cross was embroidered a white sacrificial lamb and it was adorned with precious stones and bright gold, as though it were about to catch fire. This was a prophetic symbol-and it then came to pass when the innocent Lamb of God suffered a great death of love upon the lofty tree. This is why, at the passion of our Lord, the lifeless hunger cloth fell, together with the dead lamb, so that the living Lamb of God should ever be adored on that very spot. Mary sewed for her Child Jesus a coat with an adjustable seam, so that when the coat became too short or tight, she would widen and lengthen it. The coat was brownish and of coarsely fibered thread.

Joseph was a poor people's carpenter and earned many a penny for their needs. Mary sewed and spun to make clothes for the three of them. When they fled into Egypt, God's angel embraced them with a heavenly light, so that the devil did not know where the Child had gone off to until the time when it had grown to a youth thirty years old and was a perfect man. Then the devil became aware of him in the desert and thereafter on many occasions when he manifested his divinity. Then he turned to the Jewish teachers; they were inwardly very wicked but outwardly quite handsome in their bearing. He taught them how they might resist Jesus with twisted words and not accept his teaching, but might stand firm in their Jewish law.

Then Satan went again to Lucifer and said: "Alas, Master, our honor shall fall! I have found on the sinful earth a man who is by himself stronger and wiser than were all of us before we fell. Even with all my wits I cannot make him entertain a sinful thought."

And Lucifer again bared his fangs like a dog and snapped with his hellish mouth and said: "You shall stir up all men against him. If he is the most exalted of all men, he will be able to escape all sin."

"Master, we can easily get out of this mess, for I can find a lot of people who would gladly kill the man."

He said: "No, I am afraid it might well turn out bad for us, for with the power of God on high he so easily frees people from infirmities of the flesh and from human death. If his body were taken from him, I fear even more that his soul would come to us and free those who are his. For that goes far beyond our power that he frees people on earth-contrary to nature-from all kinds of suffering and even death. Still, because of original sin he must go down to hell himself. But if he remains pure of all sin and if one takes his life from him though he is innocent, then he does not belong in hell, for never was an angel or a human being damned without being guilty. But if he is noble and free, then whatever he wills shall happen, no matter what we want. But you can see to it with your artful ways that the greatest crowd belongs to us, to hell. And you should constantly strive that people revile him to the limit and that they torture him with the most excruciating pain. If he then turns out to be simply human, he will fall into great despair and thus will remain ours."

Mary, our Lady, spoke to our Lord with her thoughts as often as she wanted, and his Godhead then answered her sometimes. This is why she bore the sufferings in her heart with such control. Mary Magdalene, however, was quite unprepared when she did not see our Lord with the eyes of the flesh.³² She was inconsolable and her heart was the while full of grief and distress. She burned intensely in simple love without lofty knowledge of heavenly things until the hour when the apostles received the Holy Spirit." Only then was her soul wounded by the Godhead. But our Lady was very calm when our Lord arose from death so gloriously. And yet of all humankind her heart was most deeply filled with divine knowledge.

24. The Six Kinds of Children of Our Lord God and the Virtues of St. Dominic and How God Has Honored His Order in Four Ways

An exalted prince has a son who is an advantage for him and brings much consolation to his people. The son is such a cause of praise for his father and such a gloriously dear son that the memory of the son and all his deeds engender the father's glory wherever the son turns. This exalted prince is our dear Lord, the heavenly Father. He has gotten seven capable sons and a very beautiful daughter by our mother, Holy Christianity. His first Son, our dearest Brother-that was our Lord Jesus Christ. What honor the heavenly Father has from this Son and what consolation his people have from him are quite obvious. And how the heavenly Father united himself with this Son and how he has put him at his right hand and how much majesty and honor he has given him-that is boundless and yet fitting. The second son of the heavenly Father were the holy apostles, who preserved for us the precious treasure that was dug out of the lofty mountain³⁴ that a tree bore, and our enemies pierced through it³⁵ at five places and drove out and smashed all our heavenly treasure. The third son were the bold martyrs who drenched the path to heaven with their blood. The fourth son were the steadfast confessors who cleanse us and teach us. The fifth son were the pure virgins who have preserved their chastity out of love for God. They are able to move the heavenly Father on our behalf because they bear his likeness fully in themselves. He wants to have them for himself alone, and they shall wear their garlands in his embrace forever. Indeed, they shall not cover their heads in shame, as is the custom for earthly brides.

When our Lord so gloriously put these worthy children near him in such sublime hospitality that all their earthly suffering and practices had been forgotten, his common folk wandered so far off from the true faith and from sincere confession that the heavenly Father felt compassion and got then two more sons at one birth by our dear mother, Holy Christianity. And she nursed these two sons herself at her two breasts which are so full of sweet milk that never in the least can they be sucked dry. These breasts were and are the old law and the new law with which our mother, Holy Christianity, nurses all God's children.

Our Lord said this, too: "One should not ordain anyone a priest unless he is familiar with both the Old and the New Testament, because with just one leg no one can go to court or serve for any length of time."

The two sons are the preachers and the lesser brothers, of whom St. Dominic and St. Francis were the first roots. Alas, how much of what they faithfully practiced has been lost! The more that is lost, the weaker the order becomes. The less long it stands, the sooner another son shall be born out of the faithful heart of the eternal Father, who does not want to desert his children in these times.

St. Dominic watched out for his brothers with true devotion, with a friendly face, and with holy wisdom; not carelessly, not with perverse intentions, and not in a cruel manner. The wise man he taught, in addition, to temper all his knowledge with divine simplicity. The simple man he taught true wisdom. Those suffering temptation he helped bear all their interior suffering in secret. The young he taught to hold their tongues; because of this they became outwardly proper and inwardly wise. The sick and the frail he consoled quite lovingly and also showed serious concern for all their distress. They were all very happy that he stayed with them so long, and his sweet company soothed them for all their wearying toil. In its beginnings this order was pure, simple, and full of burning love of God, as well. The pure simplicity God gives to some people is at times so ridiculed by others that the gift in which one finds and chooses God's wisdom is lost. This extinguishes the burning love of God as well.

That member of the order who finds it painful to be highly esteemed and who considers all earthly honor to be a serious temptation cannot desert this way of thinking because of the nobility of his religious spirit that he accepted from God in an attitude of holy submission of his heart to all creatures. Either he will retain the honor in shame and fear, in constant zeal, in compassionate helping, and in cheerful joy, or he must strive with all great wisdom to put down the burden honorably. For the heart of a religious must have calm peace and must blossom forth in love toward the Holy Trinity.

God has given special honor to these two sons in four things. He did this so that they would have no other concern about themselves except to avoid sin. "Rather," our Lord said, "all their concern and striving should be directed toward my people's becoming blessed and holy." The first thing is that they are handsomely welcomed by people. The second is faithful help without payment with the necessities of life. The third is holy wisdom coming from divine truth. The fourth is power in practical matters in Holy Christianity. When one mercilessly drives the brothers to work without gentle counsel, much damage results, about which I must now be silent.

25. Something That One Misses in Heaven in Seven Things; Thereafter Follow Seven Things; the Praise of a Disheartened Person Is Beneficial in Seven Ways

One thing in heaven I miss most of all. It is also the noblest, shines forth toward the Trinity most beautifully, and costs the most in this life as well. This is that one is willing, able, and skillful in praising God well from the heart and in thanking him cheerfully and in raising one's desires aloft and in bringing one's works to fruition while one is in poverty, in disgrace, in loneliness, in times of suffering, in spiritual aridity-which is most difficult of all, while compelled by obedience, and in all kinds of bitterness both within and without. Because of this the soul and body in heaven become so worthy of esteem and praise that they sing more beautifully of love than the others, shine more radiantly in joy than the others, soar higher than the others, and live in greater bliss than the others. They are more finely adorned than the others, have a greater abundance of honor than the others, enjoy greater delight, and drink more deeply in the Holy Trinity than the others.

"Lord God, I ask you: How fragrant do you find this praise and these acts of thanksgiving that a despondent person offers without experiencing any sweetness?"

Now hear what he said: "It rises up majestically, its honor is and shall become manifold; for all that ever was shall yield to it until it arrives at the abode of my Holy Trinity and there performs such marvels that it utterly permeates my Three Persons and stirs, charms, and enamors my whole Trinity. The soul senses quite well the fragrance I possess. I cannot be completely intimate with her unless she is willing to lay herself in utter repose and nakedness in my divine arms, so that I can take delight in her. For it was for this that I surrendered myself into her power-like a child, poor, naked, bare, scorned, and finally into death-that she alone-ah, if she desires it-might be my closest, my dearest companion. And she shall ever more in soul and body soar about and play to her heart's content in my Holy Trinity and drink herself full like the fish in the sea. And all the pain that she suffered for love of me and in imitation of mewhere has it all gone then? Thus shall I prepare for her sweet amusements.

26. How God Praises Himself and Celebrates Himself in Song

Ah, now listen how the Holy Trinity praises itself with its wisdom that has no beginning, with its goodness that has no end, with its everlasting truth, and with its whole eternity. Now harken to that sweetest, most sublime, and bliss-filled voice, as the Holy Trinity sings with full voice within itself from where have flowed forth the sweet voices of all the saints that have sung in heaven and on earth, and shall do so eternally.

The Father's voice recites a hymn of praise to himself: "I am a flowing spring that no one can block; but a man can easily block up his heart with an idle thought, so that the restless Godhead that continually toils without toil cannot flow into his soul."

The Son sings thus: "I am a constantly recurring richness that no one can contain except the boundlessness which always flowed and shall ever flow from God, and which comes again in its fullness with his Son."

The Holy Spirit sings this praise: "I am an insuperable power of truth. This one finds in a person who to his honor perseveres in God, come what may."

Thus does the whole Trinity sing: "I am so strong in my undividedness that no one can ever separate me or shatter me in all my eternity."

27. The Heavenly Father Received His Son, Jesus, with Twelve Words

With these words the heavenly Father received his Son when he had come out of this earthly strife into heavenly peace: "Welcome, my glorious Son, who are I myself, my hand in your works, my honor in your power, my strength in your struggle, my praise in your victory, my will at your resurrection, my marvel at your ascension, my wrath at your judgment. The immaculate bride that you are bringing me shall belong to you and me indivisibly forever. My Godhead is your crown, your humanity is my reconciliation." The Spirit of us both is one will, one counsel, one strength in all things without end and without beginning. Your soul is the most intimate bride of our Three Persons."

Oh, how delightfully the soul of Christ sparkles in the whole Holy Trinity, just like the delightful flashing in the beautiful sun that no one can see who does not have the fairest of eyes.

28. The Seven Crowns of Brother Albert. Disposition Is One Thing, Choice Is Another

Wherever knowledge includes wisdom and love, choice brings fruit; and no one knows whether one is good until one is tempted by evil.

I prayed for the soul of Brother Albert of Minden, and God showed me his excellence. I saw the crowns of seven virgins suspended above his head. I was greatly puzzled how this could be, because he had been a penitent.³⁷ Our Lord said: "He won these crowns because he preserved seven virgins' chastity through much effort simply out of love for me; and all of them shall enhance his dignity eternally, but they shall never touch his body or his soul."

I saw this in heaven: reward, dignity, and crown; and it is not all the same thing. Reward has to do with actions, dignity with virtues, the crown with love. But the reward's abundance is determined by the number of good actions. Dignity is extended by the amount of virtues. The crown shines on high according to the intensity of the fire of love.

Brother Albert told me then that a brother was going to die in six years, but this turned out not to be true. In the seventh year I asked our Lord why this was the case. Our Lord said: "He saw the predetermination and not my choice. I choose for my special friends long humiliation for which they are not at fault, and I keep alive in them the holy desire to live longer."

Whenever a person scrutinizes his heart in the light of love, that is, in truth, then he discovers nothing other than that he should by rights be scorned more than anyone else. In this state his desire grows with boundless hunger and draws the person out of himself and into God's will to such an extent that God sees fit to prolong his life and bestows upon him completely new favors, if he is willing to keep and preserve them with diligent care.

29. After Ecstasy with God a Person Would Be Like an Angel If He Were to Follow It, and Concerning the Wickedness of the Devil

If a person were to conduct himself rightly after the ecstasy that comes from God and after the light which he experiences, he would enter into such great delight and such holy knowledge that no heart would be able to bear it. He would thus be like an angel ever in all things united in love with God. He would thus become the hell of the devil and the heaven of God. But when a good person leaves this rapture, God sends the devil to him to tempt him with those things that are hardest of all, so that he might wake him up again. But our dear Lord takes the devil's power away from him and protects the person so that he cannot bring him down. And yet he really thinks that he has been given leave to bring the person down as he would like. This is why he is so busy day and night. Alas for me! This has often happened to me!

God revealed to me such a glorious thing, promising to fulfill it, that because of my worthlessness I did not dare believe it. And so, alas, I did not thank him for it. Then the devil came and wanted to inflict pain on me.

I said: "What do you want? You see quite clearly that God is with me. How dare you torture me in his presence!"

The devil said: "I want now what I have always wanted-to put my chair next to his. Indeed, I would like to drive him from the chair of your soul, if I could, and sit down on it, and I would like heaven, paradise, purgatory, and earth to be one big hell in hell eternal."

And I said: "Don't you wish that all these things were heaven, so that you, too, might receive favor?"

He said: "No, that I can never do."

I said: "Alas, how very miserable you are, that you feel no shame before God!"

He said: "Whoever has anything good about himself is not completely evil, and he who sins loses all sense of shame; for if he felt shame he would not commit any sins. I am as cocky as a fly and land on everything. I spare no one.

Only the one who defends himself with virtue
Remains untroubled,
And he who stands firm in God
Conquers gloriously all the sorrows of his heart."

30. Twenty Powers of God's Love and Many Kinds of Names

Ah, dear divine Love, ever embrace my soul,
For it would murder me beyond all pain

If I were to be separated from you!
Ah, Love, let me now not grow cold,
My actions are all dead
When I do not feel you.
O Love, you cause sweet pain and distress;
You give the true children of God instruction and consolation.
O Fetter of love,
Your tender hand is strong.
It binds both young and old.
O Love, you make large burdens light,
And to you small sins seem heavy.
You serve without reward
Ministering to all creatures.

Ah, sweet divine Love, whenever I sleep too long
And miss good things,
Be so kind and awaken me,
And sing to me, Lady, your song
With which you touch the soul
Like a sweet chord of strings.

Ah, Lady Love, throw me beneath you.
I would gladly suffer defeat.
If you would only take my life,
That would be, Lady, all my solace.
Alas, generous divine Love, you pamper me too much.
This shall be my constant complaint.
Love, your most elegant greeting
Has filled my spirit.
Love, your most pure sufferings
Make me live without sin.

Love, your constant devotion
Has brought me to such sweet distress.
O divine Love, how can I be patient in your absence
If you want to be estranged from me?
Love, it is a blissful, heavenly exhilaration
That your absence is so pleasant for me.
O wondrous Love, ever blessed is he indeed,
Whom you instruct.
That is his most blissful humility,
That, Lady, he asks you to leave him.

Ah, Love, how few do you find
Who seek you with all their might in all things,
And with constant effort enjoy you
And who in the pangs of love bid you
That you flee from them.
But there are many
Who call out to you with their mouths
And turn from you in their actions.

Love, your leaving and coming
Are equally welcome to the well-ordered soul.
Love, you have worked that great miracle,
That God has performed with us in heartfelt love.

Love, your most refined purity
Standing like a lovely reflection
Of the chaste soul in God's presence
Creates in the breast of virgins
Hot pangs of desire
For Jesus their Love.
Those who love intensely and are virgins,
These are the maidens of the Seraphim.

Love, your holy mercy
Causes the devils much suffering.
Love, your sweet peace
Fosters calm minds and a pure life.
Love, your holy fulfillment
Makes spirits free
In voluntary poverty.
Love, your true perfection
Does not easily complain about misfortune or hardship.

31. Of Ten Powers of Love and That No Creature Can Fully Imagine the Longing of the Soul for God

O Love, how far your light shines in the soul
And how fiery is your glow
And how incomprehensible is the wonder of you
And how rich is your wisdom

And how ready is your gift
And how powerful are your bonds
And how perfect is your being
And how pleasant is your flow
And how abundant are your refreshments
And how faithful is your labor
And how holy is your discretion.

When you pass through the soul with all these things and she then rises up and begins to fly with the wings of a dove, which are all the virtues, and she then begins to desire with the longing of the eagle, she follows the heat up to heaven, for she finds everything transitory to be cold and tasteless.

Thus do I then speak from the mouth of truth:

Lord, the desire I have for you when you draw me up,
Lord, the wisdom I then receive in the flights of love,
Lord, the union I then grasp in your will,
Lord, the constancy I then preserve as your gift,
Lord, the sweet remembrance when I think of you,
Lord, the pampering love that I feel for you is so rich in itself and is in your divine eyes so great-even if you did not know it, Lord, not even all the grains of sand, all the drops of water, all the grass and leaves, stones and wood, all lifeless creatures; in addition, all living creatures: fish, birds, animals, worms, flying and creeping things, devils, heathens, Jews and all your enemies; and more: all your friends, humans, angels, saints-now if all these persons could speak, were willing to, and called out unceasingly till the last day; truly, Lord, as you well know, they could not make clear to you even half of the intensity of my longing and the pain of my suffering and my heart's pursuit and my soul's striving for the fragrance of your balsam, to hang inseparably in your embrace forever.

Indeed, Lady Mary, Mother of God, how did you fare when with your Son you began to experience the love of the eternal Godhead that a soul free of duplicity has in this life, united with the eternal Godhead, and the caresses with which he cherishes her? Lady, you could become weary and your Son would become faint, for the fiery energy of divine love surpasses all human strength.

32. The Sublime End of Sister Mechthild

Now I must, though under duress, write this story that I would gladly pass over in silence, because I greatly fear the stealthy sword thrust of empty glory. But I fear much more, if God gives me my due, that I, poor woman of God, have already kept silent about too much. Misery, fear, and constant suffering of the heart have I borne secretly from childhood regarding a good end. Now, most recently, God has revealed to me that two throngs came down from heaven in procession. These were virgins and angels. The virgins signify virtues with which a person has served God. The angels signify a pure life in which a person has followed God.

Our Lord and his glorious mother followed this delightful procession until the first ones stood before the person's mouth. The path was peaceful; all around it was brighter than the sun from the radiance of the saints who came out of God's bliss. Then the soul said: "Lord, this path suits me just fine, out of all proportion to my worth. But I greatly fear that I shall come out of my body."

Our Lord said: "If that should happen, I shall draw you into my breath, so that you will follow me like you would a magnet."

On both sides of the procession was a throng of devils. There were so many of them that I was unable to encompass them all with my sight. Still, I was not afraid of a single one. They thrashed about with great ferocity and they clawed each other like madmen. The soul was all the more elated when she then saw our Lord before her. In great astonishment she asked our Lord how this could be. Our Lord said: "The elation comes from the positive certainty that you know for certain that all these devils can never, ever keep you from me."

33. How Small Sins Harm Perfection and How Through Them the Devil Draws Close to the Soul

It impedes people in religious life most of all in their pursuit of perfection that they pay so little heed to small sins. I tell you truly: whenever I blunder with a laugh that harms no one, or with an annoyance in my heart that I reveal to no one, or with a bit of impatience at my own suffering, then my soul becomes so dark and my mind so dull and my heart so cold that I must weep in my gloom and lament in misery and amicably beg and strongly desire and humbly recognize all my deficiencies. Only then is the favor granted me in my wretchedness that I may creep back like a beaten dog into the kitchen. Further: when I have a defect about me that is unrecognized and unrepented, there immediately arises a hell stain on my soul. There is no help for it. The devil who is in charge of purgatory, where the sin shall burn, immediately thinks he is seeing his likeness. Terror begins to come over me since I am alone, though my soul had been made free of all terror when I received the gift that one calls conscious love. Then I fall immediately to the ground and say: "Have mercy on me, God" or "Our Father." And then I return immediately into my sweet paradise out of which the stain had driven me.

34. Five New Saints Sent for the Sake of Bad People and How God Will Hereafter Wash Christianity in His Own Blood

Given the nobility of holiness and the weakness of human nature, I am very surprised that St. Elizabeth was so quickly canonized a saint after having been buried so short a time." Our Lord explained this to me and said: "It is right for messengers to be quick. Elizabeth is and was a messenger whom I sent to wretched women living in castles who were so permeated with lust, so covered with arrogance, and so constantly engulfed in vanity that they by rights should have gone into the abyss. But many a lady followed her example to the extent they could and wanted. I sent St. Dominic as a messenger to unbelievers and as a teacher to the ignorant and as a comfort to the despondent." I sent St. Francis as a messenger to greedy priests and arrogant lay persons.' St. Peter, the recent martyr, is my messenger of blood in which heretical Christianity so miserably lies imprisoned .12 They all say they are pure, but in my eyes they are impure. They say they are faithful, and yet in my eyes they are false. They say they love me, but they love their own flesh much more. Whoever wishes to remain with me, let him renounce with St. Peter his earthly body. Hidden guilt ultimately creates public distress."

I, poor wretch, became so bold in my prayers that I acted foolishly and took depraved Christianity into the arms of my soul.

I groaned to raise her up. Then our Lord said:

“Give up, she is too heavy for you.”

“No, sweet Lord, I shall lift her up and carry her to your feet with those very arms of yours with which you carried her on the cross.”

And God granted wretched me my wish
So that he might make me hush.

When poor Christianity then stepped before our Lord, she was like a maiden. I looked at her and I noticed that our Lord was looking at her as well. I became very ashamed. Our Lord said: "Now just look! Isn't this maiden clearly the right one for me to love without end in my eternal nuptial bed and for me to take in my lordly arms and gaze upon with my divine eyes? She is blearyeyed in knowledge and her hands are crippled as well. She can hardly do any good works. She hobbles on the feet of her desires, for she seldom and listlessly thinks of me. Her skin is filthy as well, for she is impure and unchaste."

Then the poor spirit" said: "What can be done for her then?" Our Lord said: "I shall wash her in my own blood, and all the blessed who are truly guiltless I shall protect and take unto myself secretly in a holy death. What is more," said our Lord, "Sister Jutta of Sangerhausen I have sent as a messenger to the heathens with her holy prayers and good example."

Our Lord said this as well: "I hereby send this book as a messenger to all religious people, both the good and the bad; for if the pillars fall, the building cannot remain standing." Truly, I say to you," said our Lord, "in this book my heart's blood is written, which I shall shed again in the last times."

Our Lord told me about three kinds of blood: "The first blood that was shed by Abel, the holy innocents, John the Baptist, and all those who shed their holy innocent blood before the death of our Lord-that was Christ's blood because for his sake they suffered a holy death. The second blood was the blood of the heavenly Father, which Christ poured forth from his innocent heart. The third blood, which shall be shed in Christian faith before the last day, is the blood of the Holy Spirit, for without the Holy Spirit's help no good action has ever been performed. The blood of the martyrs shed for the love of Christ gives participation⁴⁶ and a crown. The blood of the Father in Christ gives redemption and faith. The last blood in the Holy Spirit gives perseverance and glory."

35. How Sister Mechthild Thanks and Praises God and Prays for Three Kinds of People and for Herself

Ah, kind Father, God in heaven, draw my ever-flowing soul unimpeded into yourself and flow toward her, Lord, with all the delightful things you have within yourself. Then she can beg and demand and praise you to the fullest for your goodness.

Ah, and give me, Lord, the rapture of your Holy Trinity in the sweet soaring of love, Lord, so that I may enjoy with honor all your generous gifts and so that, sweet Lord, I may never ask you for something, Lord, which you do not want to give me for your glory. Amen.

Ah, Father of all goodness, I, a poor sinner, thank you for all your faithful concern for my ravaged body, for my forsaken soul, for my sinful heart, for my saddened senses, for my being, which is despised in this world-Lord Father, these are what belong to me and nothing else-and for your dear Son, Jesus Christ, and for the community of all creatures when they were as yet undepraved and as they shall come again into the most glorious state that they can and want to attain.

Ali, sweet Father, with all these things I praise you today for all your faithful protection that you granted to my poor body and my forsaken soul. With these same things, great God, I thank you, Lord, for all your generous gifts which you, Lord, have ever deigned to give me in body and soul. With this throng of all creatures, I desire today, Lord, your praise in all things and for all things that, Lord Father, have flowed spotless out of your sweet heart. But with all these things, my Dearest of all dear things, I beg you, Lord, to give honor to yourself by the true transformation and complete conversion of poor sinners who today lie in mortal sin. I beg you also, my true Love, for a holy increase in all virtues and in Christian constancy for all the blessed who live here free from mortal sin. I pray to you also, Dearest, for all the suffering souls who have gone to purgatory because of our sins, souls whom we should have kept safe by our good example. I beg you, Lord, for holy sanctification, for true protection, and for the fulfillment by the Holy Spirit for all those expressly who, for the sake of your love, have helped wretched me, Lord, endure my exile in body and soul.

I beg you, bountiful God, for the sake of your poor Son, Jesus, that you turn the pain of my spiritual poverty and the gall of my bitterness into honey on the palate of my soul. I pray to you, living God, on behalf of the eternal nobility of our Christian faith, that you, Lord, preserve it for us in your divine wisdom against all false testimony; and fortify, Lord, our spirit that it rest in your Holy Trinity. I pray to you, sweet Lord, for all my Christian torturers, that they may yet get to know you and love you in holiness. I pray to you, almighty God, for true support for false people in power to rule with good judgment and that the innocent in the community be mercifully spared. I beg you, eternal Consolation, that you come today to comfort all burdened souls who on this day in fear take leave of their bodies, that you, merciful-hearted God, may be their champion and mete out to them eternal life. I beg you, Lord, for the complete purification, spiritual constancy, and glorious preservation of divine truth in all things for all those especially who wear the garment of religious life and wield spiritual authority purely out of love for you.

I beg you, kind God, for true thankfulness at all times for all your gifts to help those who for love of you carry troublesome burdens. I beg you, holy God, for mercy when you consider my worthless life, and for constant union, Lord, of yourself with my soul and for the trusted viaticum of your holy body, that it may be at the end my last nourishment for soul and body. I also beg you, sublime, bliss-filled Trinity, at the last hour of that difficult separation of my poor soul from my sinful body, that you then, Lord, incline toward me so that all my enemies depart from me sad and I, Lord, according to your sweet pleasure and my long-felt desire, might unceasingly so gaze upon you that the eyes of my soul might sparkle in your Godhead and the sweet pleasure of your love might glide out of your breast and through my soul. Through our Lord Jesus Christ your Son."$ Amen.

Book VI

1. How a Prior or a Prioress or Other Religious Superiors Should Conduct Themselves Toward Those Under Them

Great fear is bound up with power. When one says, "You are now our superior or our prior or our prioress," God knows, my dear friend, you are in dire straits. You should then perform your venia with great humility, turn immediately to prayer, and let God console you. You should so transform your heart in God's holy love that you love in a special way each and every brother or sister entrusted to you in all his needs. In all their difficulties you should show your subordinates and brothers loving cheerfulness or kind concern and compassion. With friendly words you should bid them go forth and preach boldly and hear confessions competently, for this is why God has sent them into this world-that they should be redeemers and helpers for poor sinners in the same way Christ was the Redeemer of the whole world, coming down from the lofty palace of the Holy Trinity into this stenchoozing world.

Thus shall you speak to each of your brothers in the deep humility of your pure heart: "Alas, my dear fellow, I, though unworthy of anything good, am your servant in all the ways I can be and not your master. Unfortunately, however, I have authority over you and send you forth with the heartfelt love of God. The difficulty of your task moves me deeply, and yet I make the decisions. I rejoice in the sublime honor the heavenly Father has prepared for you.

"I hereby send you forth in the same name, just as Jesus went forth from his Father, when he went searching for the one lost sheep for such a long time that he died of love. May God's true love go with you on holy paths and in productive efforts. I shall send along with you the longings of my soul, the prayers of my heart, and the tears of my sinful eyes, that as a favor to me God might send you back here holy and full of love. Amen."

Thus shall you encourage all your brothers as they go forth. You should also raise their spirits when they return. You should go in advance to the guest quarters and with God's liberality make all arrangements for the basic comfort of God's disciples as far as is in your power. Indeed, dear fellow, you should even wash their feet yourself. You still remain their master or mistress. And be subject to them in humility. You should not spend a long time with guests. You should keep good order in the religious community. The guests should not stay up late; this is a holy matter. You should visit the infirmary every day and comfort the sick with the consoling words of God and refresh them generously with earthly things, for God is rich beyond all accounting. You should clean for the sick and in God cheerfully laugh with them. You should yourself carry away their personal waste, lovingly ask them in confidence what their private infirmity is, and truly stand by them. Then God's sweetness shall flow into you in marvelous ways.

You should also go into the kitchen and see to it that the needs of the brethren of the community are well taken care of, that your own stinginess and the laziness of the cook do not steal from our Lord sweet song in the choir. For a starving cleric does not sing well. Also, a hungry man cannot study with concentration. And so God often loses the best through the worst.

At chapter meetings you should be just but with a gentle spirit, basing your judgments completely on the amount of guilt. You should be very careful not to use your authority contrary to the will of the brethren or the community, for that is the source of much dissension.

You should always bless yourself when prideful thoughts come to you. Unfortunately, these do come into the heart under the semblance of good and say, "Well, after all, you are prior (or prioress) in all matters. You can certainly do what you think is best." No, dear fellow, in so doing you disturb God's holy peace. With a submissive spirit and endearing cheerfulness you should say: "Dear brother (or sister), how does this suit you?" and then take action according to their best-intentioned wishes.

Whenever the brothers (or sisters) in your community offer you honor, you should be inwardly afraid with a sharp watch on your heart, and outwardly you should show moderate embarrassment. You should receive all complaints with sympathy and you should offer all advice with sincerity.

If your brothers are planning great building projects, turn it into something holy and say: "Oh, dearly beloved brothers, let's build the Holy Trinity a delightful palace in our souls with the Holy Scripture as the lumber and with noble virtues as the stones." Profound humility is the cornerstone of this glorious palace in which God eternal shall caress his love-starved bride without end with all the pleasure in his power according to her consuming desire. It has been chiseled in the sweet sufficiency of earthly transitoriness, where insatiable arrogance and cutting empty honor shall never provide the urge that we build something the way worldly lords or ladies do. Rather, we want to build on earth as heavenly princes do. Then, on the last day, we shall sit by Jesus, who will still be poor, just like his holy apostles.² Dear brothers, we want to build our dwellings in heaven with divine joy, and we want to build our huts on earth with concern,' for we have no certainty that we will live until tomorrow.

You should have an eagle's eyes, observing and seeing those under you lovingly in God, not with malice. If you find someone secretly suffering temptation, by all means stand by him with great love. Then God cannot help but be secretly close to you.

I want to tell those blessed brothers who have some office some words of truth that I saw in the Holy Trinity when I was alone in prayer. When a person prays in Christian faith with a heart so humble that one cannot endure a single creature to be beneath one, and with a soul so detached that all things but God alone disappear when one is praying, then a person is a divine God with the heavenly Father. But if a person then has a profound realization of how frail he is on his own, even in sweet embrace he will remain fearful to the extent that nothing will concern him but God's honor alone.

When, however, because of a real need and to achieve a practical result a person toils with the same love with which he prayed, then he is a human God with Christ. But what one botches up and does to no practical purpose and out of no real need is all dead before God.

When a person purely for the love of God and not for earthly reward instructs the ignorant, converts sinners, consoles the despondent, and brings those in despair back to God, then he is God the spirit with the Holy Spirit.

Ah, that is a very blessed person who does everything humanly possible that is praiseworthy in God's eyes with that same love for God's praise and with the constant good intention of his whole heart. That person is one whole person with the Holy Trinity.

But the dust of sin that settles upon us constantly, even against our will, is quickly annihilated by the fire of love when the glance of the eyes of our soul touches the Godhead with the lonely sighing of sweet desire that no creature can resist. When she begins to rise, the dust of sin falls away from her and she becomes one God with God in such a way that whatever he wills she wills as well, and they can be united in complete union no other way.

Indeed, dear fellow, you should readily offer our dear Lord God a free hour, day or night, during which you can pray lovingly and undisturbed. For heaven's gift with which God greets and instructs his chosen dear ones is in its nature so noble and so refined and flows so sweetly that when God eternal, gravely wounded by love for her, wants to visit the love-hungry soul in the cozy bridal bed, he would renounce for more than thirty years everything that he found pleasant if he might kiss her again and again and embrace her with his bare arms. If you were to think about this, how could you act so crudely as not to give him an hour a day in return for those thirty years?

When I, the most wretched of persons, go to my prayer, I deck myself out according to my worthlessness. I dress myself in the foul puddle that I myself am. Then I put on the shoes of precious time that I wasted day after day. Then I gird myself with the suffering I have caused. Then I put on a cloak of wickedness of which I am full. Then I put on my head a crown of secret shameful acts that I have committed against God. After this I take in my hand the mirror of true knowledge. Then I look at myself in it and see who I really am. Alas, I see nothing but utter misery. I prefer to wear these clothes rather than to have my wish regarding all earthly possessions. And yet they cause me such distress in my wretched fury that I would rather be clothed with hell and crowned with all the devils if this could happen through no fault of mine. Alas, how very often do robbers-our own fickleness-come and strip these clothes from us when we are pleased with ourselves and in our guilt declare ourselves innocent?' Then we have been robbed by vain honor and struck down by pride. Then we are more naked than naked. Alas, how deeply must we then be ashamed before God, his friends, and all creatures!

If we want to overcome our shame with great honors, we must clothe ourselves with ourselves. So adorned, I seek Jesus, my sweet Lord, and I find him so quickly by no other means as by those things that are repugnant and burdensome. One should very eagerly step forward with intense desire, ashamed of one's guilt, and with flowing love and humble fear. Then the filth of sin disappears from the divine sight of our Lord. And then lovingly he begins to cast his radiance toward the soul and she begins to dissolve out of deeply felt love. The soul loses all her guilt and all her sorrow, and he begins to teach her his complete will. Then she begins to taste his sweetness and he begins so to greet her with his Godhead, that the power of the Holy Trinity penetrates fully her soul and her body; and she receives true wisdom. And then he begins so to caress her that she becomes weak. She so begins to drink it all in that he becomes lovesick. Then he begins to limit the intensity, because he knows better her limits than she herself does. And then she begins longing to show him great faithfulness. And then he begins to give her full knowledge. And then she begins to taste with delight his love on her flesh. And then he begins to strengthen with holy feeling in her soul all his gifts. If she then guards against the ignoble love of her flesh and the alluring sweetness of all earthly things, she will be able to love to perfection and gain much praise for God in all things.

Now, dear fellow, there are still two more things that you must guard against with holy zeal, for they have never borne fruit. The first is that a man or woman wants to accomplish much in pursuing good deeds and fine conduct in order to achieve a high church office. Such an attitude vexes my soul. When such people have then achieved power, their baseness becomes so many-faceted that no one who voted for them with great enthusiasm is happy with them. They then become misguided by honors and their false virtues turn into vices.

The second is when a person is chosen rightfully with no meddling on his part and he then changes so completely that he never feels the urge to leave this office. This is a sign of many failings. For even if he is irreproachable in it, he should still be fearful and humble.

A sincere woman and a good man who after my death would have liked to talk with me but cannot should read this little book.

2. The Rule of a Canon: How He Should Conduct Himself. This Came from God

We should greet people in the Holy Spirit with his divine fullness, and we should thank them for their merciful gifts. But even more, in union with all creatures, we should thank the heavenly Father for his holy favor that he unceasingly pours out of his Holy Trinity day after day into the hearts of sinners. That the eagle flies so high, it has no need to thank the owl for that.

I prayed for a noble cleric at his wish.' This is the holy answer from God which he spoke to me: "His wish is to sink to a humble life, the favor I give him is great, and his will is holy. Nevertheless, he should remain right where he is." God, the sublime pope of heaven, has sent him this rule, and it reads as follows: "He should pray always and without ceasing according to the rules for clerics. In addition, I shall grant him my divine sweetness. This he shall enjoy in the solitude of his heart. Whenever he is tempted, he should call out to me with great vigor and I shall come quickly to his aid. He should fulfill his duties completely but should keep expenses small. He should keep no one in his pay for the sake of power or as a return for favors. Rather, he should retain honest servants in proportion to his rightful needs. He should not occupy himself with the concerns of his relatives. But if one of them wants to follow him, he should help him. He should wear simple, comfortable clothes, as he presently does; but next to his skin he should wear coarse clothing to combat the various pleasures he has received in his skin. In addition, he should sleep on straw between two woolen blankets, and he should have two pillows for under his head. During the day he should cover his bed with a fine quilt, and his bed should remain exactly where it was before for all to see. In front of his bed he should lay a mat and a kneeler. Thus, with humble heart he should give good example against an evil life. He should also have two switches next to his bed to chastise himself with upon awakening.

"Once a day, while he lies fully prostrate, his prayer should be as follows: 'Lord, eternal Father, God of heaven, I, a worthless human being, thank you, Lord, that you have let your grace descend upon me. I ask you now, dearest Father, together with all those close to you, that your sweet heavenly flood that ever pours down out of the inexhaustible living spring of the whole Holy Trinity may cleanse my soul continually of all stains through our Lord.'"

At this point I asked: "Lord, how shall he preserve himself in earthly honor without sinning?"

Our Lord said: "He should keep himself in constant fear, just like a mouse that is caught in a trap and awaits its death. The bottom part of the trap is earthly honor; the upper part is my almighty power." This is the explanation our Lord gave: "Whoever desires that I taste good to him should tremble in fear at all times in all things at the taste of his own flesh, where the heart plays with hidden lust. Therefore, when he eats, he should be easily satisfied and selfless. When he sleeps, he should be disciplined and alone with me. When he is out in the world, he should be a mouse in his heart. When he goes to confession, he should be truthful and obedient and act in all matters as his confessor advises."

3. God Gives Authority. How Billy Goats Become Lambs

That this same noble cleric' was chosen deacon is God's will. For he himself said: "For this reason I have taken him from one chair and put him onto another, that he might be food for billy goats." Explanation: God calls the cathedral canons billy goats because their flesh stinks of lust in eternal truth before his Holy Trinity. The skin of a billy goat is noble, and this is true of their authority and possessions. But when this skin is removed at death they lose all their nobility. And our Lord was asked how these goats might become lambs. Our Lord spoke thus: "If they eat the fodder that Canon Dietrich puts in their trough, that is, holy penance and sincere advice in confession, they shall become the kind of lambs that one calls sheep rams: lambs with horns." The horn is spiritual power that they use in a holy manner to God's praise. One should be strong and trust God utterly, for he says: "I myself shall help this canon successfully atone for his guilt."

4. Discernment and Fear That Preserve the Senses from Earthly Things`

Oh, what a wretched person I am! I complain to God in heaven that I am worse than I was thirty years ago. For the creatures that then helped me bear my misery did not have to be so noble to help this poor body thrive. This is why I must constantly station two guards between my soul and all earthly things, so that she may find just that amount of pleasure in my flesh that my meager needs require. They also preserve my senses, so that these earthly things do not lead me astray into a greedy desire to possess much or to linger in pleasure.

The one guardian is discernment, which arranges all things in such a way that they are used entirely according to God's will. In this way a person always retains a heart alien to all earthly things, so alien that, if a person loses earthly things, his heart becomes so buoyant, his soul so unfettered, and his senses so carefree that he feels as comfortable in God as though his dearest friend had taken the heaviest of all burdens from him; for whichever person does not find earthly things to be a heavy burden cannot be called a truly spiritual person before God. This is why our Lord said: "In times of want one uses all things rightly. What is good about poverty is that it uses only what is necessary. That is why it is holy. Then overindulgence cannot bring darkness into the soul."

My other guardian is holy fear, which together with God's wisdom keeps my soul from smiling upon the earthly things that are given to her. Rather, she receives them as though they were a temptation, a hook baited to catch cupidity and vain honor, which cast many a praiseworthy person in religious life into such darkness that he loses the light of discernment, the fire of love, and the taste for God's sweetness, peace, and mercy without even noticing it.

And so our Lord said: "Indeed, they make fine arguments: that they want to love earthly things and gather much for themselves so that they might the better serve me. But they serve themselves more than me." The person who works only for his own comfort and advantage is his own self. However, everyone should be a Christ in himself, living for God and not for himself. For that most blessed person who lives completely in God, it is all the same to him what he has. For it is holy poverty into which God casts this man with his power in the same way he cast his most beloved Son down from heaven onto the road and into a feeding trough belonging to someone else. Just so does our Lord cast his chosen friends far from earthly consolation, so that they might hunger for heavenly consolation.

A truly holy person fears earthly happiness more than he shows concern for the basic necessities of life. Why? His home is in heaven and his prison is in this world. This is why our Lord said: "Those who know and love the nobility of my liberty cannot bear to love me only for my own sake. They must also love me in creatures. Thus do I remain what is most close to them in their souls."

5. After Love and Desire the Beauty of Creatures Gives Knowledge Along with Sadness

The first knowledge that God gave me, after touching me with love and after the flood of desire, was accompanied by sorrow. Whenever I glanced at anything that was beautiful or dear to me, I began sighing and then weeping; and then I began to reflect, to complain, and to speak thus to all things: "Alas! Be careful! No, this is not your Beloved who greeted your heart, lit up your senses, and captured so blissfully your soul. Don't let the rich delights of earthly things push you away from him."

Rather, in the nobility of creatures, in their beauty and usefulness, I shall love God and not myself."

6. At the End You Should Have Love, Longing, Fear, and Three Kinds of Sorrow

I asked our Lord how I should conduct myself in the time just before my death.

Our Lord said: "You should conduct yourself in the final hours just as you did in the beginning. You should have love and longing, sorrow and fear; for these four things were the beginning of your life, and so they should also be your end."

Then I said: "Dear Lord, what happens to those two things that are the foundation and crown of heavenly honor: Christian faith and true hope?"

Our Lord responded thus: "Your faith becomes a knowing and your hope is transformed into true certainty."

I saw these explanations in his words and know them in my heart, as well.

My sorrow arises from three things. Most of all, I am sorry for my sins. This is the result of love. But by constantly loving I have lost the pain of sorrow. I am sorry for the sins of all human beings, which makes me like a sick person who has a craving for something very fine that he can never or seldom have. And so my heart remains disconsolate and my soul in her desire chases after a huge wild animal. Our Lord said about this: "One cannot catch large animals unless one drives them into water. Thus a sinner will never be converted unless he is pursued by the swift desire of holy people into the deep tears of their hearts."

I am sorry for all the good works that I have failed to do out of love of my flesh without real necessity. Our Lord said about this: "One cannot build a dwelling unless one has a place to build. In like manner one cannot receive a reward in heaven without having performed good works." Our Lord lets this hold true because of love in his heart, so that he can say to each and every soul: "Receive, my very dearest, this rich honor you yourself have earned." That God might be able to address these words to the soul with sincerity to her glory and love, as though he were not the cause of her happiness, and that she might receive in body and soul full honor-this is why our Lord is so deeply concerned that in our struggles, in our want, and in times of suffering we carry on in sincere love: that he might in generosity depart from his justice as much as is fitting for his Godhead. This is what I discovered in the heap of God's favors.

7. Our Self-Will Can Resist the Barbed Hook. The Good Soul Comes Swiftly to God

In my community there is a religious person who causes me much distress because of her contrary disposition. This person is not willing to obey me in regard to anything.' With great intensity I complained to God and was very perplexed how this could be. And our Lord said: "Look what is causing the trouble."

Then I saw that a special devil was clinging to this person and was pulling her away from all good things. So I said: "Who gave you the power to cause God such great humiliation through this person?"

And the devil said: "Nothing other than this person's own selfish will gave me this power."

At these words I saw that the devil pursued all religious persons who give him the opportunity with such derisive contempt because they lead such phony lives by making excuses for themselves before God and all creatures.

Then I said: "Who is going to help this poor wretch to become free from you?"

The devil, under compulsion from God, said: "No one can help her but her own free will, for God has given her the power to change. If she does that, I will be forced to scurry off."

"I hereby ask you by the eternal Truth: what is your name?"

The devil replied: "I am called Barbed Hook, and this throng that you see back there are all mates of mine with the same task that I have. There are as many of them as we find people who are not willing to obey their well-intentioned superior in good things."

Thereupon my soul flew to God so swiftly that she literally arose with no effort on her part and snuggled herself into the Holy Trinity, just as a child snuggles into its mother's coat and lays itself right at her breast. My soul then spoke with the power and the voice of all creatures thus: "Ah, dear Lover, consider my distress with this person so that, Lord, you change her attitude with your divine sweetness."

"No," said our Lord, "she is not worthy of my sweetness. Instead I shall make her body sick, and the pain will so paralyze her that only with great difficulty will she continue on her sinful path. And I shall strike her dumb, that she not utter spiteful words. She shall also become so blind that she will be ashamed to see frivolity. And yet, whatever one does to her, one does to me."

Fourteen days later this actually happened. Alleluia.

8. Between God and Lucifer There Are Two Kinds of Purgatory. How the Devil Tortures Souls

Our human brother Jesus Christ ascended with all virtues into heaven to the heights of his Godhead. And no one can follow him in this unless he, too, has all virtues. Similarly the Holy Trinity has ascended in glory above all things to the blissful heights with all its virtuous friends, who are ever glorious, fair, and joyous in the same measure that they possess within themselves praiseworthy likenesses of his divine virtue. Indeed, all virtues that are practiced on earth with good intentions and not hypocritically, and are adorned with love and performed without sin, are the musical strings in heaven that resound without end out of the faithful soul and out of the submissive body into the Holy Trinity. The Father thanks the Son for having brought her there with virtues, and the Son honors the Father for having created her, and the Holy Spirit gently urges Father and Son that the Holy Trinity might flow out to her with such force and sing so sweetly that she view and love all things with God. Then the sinful devil Lucifer has sunk down under all things together with those who strive after and love only the vices.

Between God's heights and the devil's pit there are two kinds of purgatory. In these two purgatories there are many kinds of suffering and anguish. The first purgatory consists of profitable sufferings that afflict us in this world with various kinds of pain. The second purgatory-after this life-is so large that it begins at the mouth of hell and ends at heaven's gate. But the devils can torment souls only on earth, in the air, and in all the places where a person has sinned, and in the heights where he polluted the air with his sins. Thereby the devil convicts them, so that their shame and torment are all the greater because of all the sins that remain unatoned here. But when they have become so blessed that they have been freed from the hands of the devil, they still burn painfully within themselves because of small wrongdoings. Thereafter, through help and forbearance they pass beyond all distress. This is so close to heaven that they possess all joys but three: They do not see God. They have not yet received their honor. They have not yet been crowned. This is the purgatory on earth and the one in the air between hell and heaven. Because of her spiritual nature, however, the soul cannot suffer torments from physical things once she has left the body."

9. The Saints Honor Those Who Honor Them and They Console Them at Their Death

When one honors the saints by remembering them well, together with all the throng,¹² as one can do on the day that God honored them with a holy death, they are so grateful that they immediately come in all the glory that they received from their holy actions. I actually saw this on the feast of St. Mary Magdalene as one was glorifying God with songs of praise for the great honor that she received as a reward. She danced about in the choir to the holy song and looked each of the singers in the eyes. She came forward and said: "All those who honor my death, I shall be with them at the end and shall honor them in return. I shall stand ever at their side, giving as much help as they are capable of receiving."

Four majestic archangels led her in their midst and the number of lesser angels was beyond human reckoning. Then I asked her what the names of the four princes were. She said: "The first is called Power; the second is called Longing; the third is called Good Will; the fourth is called Constancy. With these four virtues I overcame all the sufferings of my heart. For this God gave me two things as a reward: noble servants and a crown. It is the same with other saints as well."

Our Lord says: "When one blows upon the tiniest spark, it contributes warmth and brightness in heaven's fire, where the saints are all aglow."

10. Prayer, Masses, God's Word, the Lives of Good People, Fasting, and Carenae¹³ Free Souls from Purgatory

I prayed for a soul whose body had been killed in the midst of a sinful life. Then our Lord said this: "Seven years of fasting and seven years of carenae would be like one raindrop on a huge fire. With less than thirty years of praying he cannot be helped, because he lost his life thirty years before his time through foolish pride. These he has to make good to me with suffering."

[The soul speaks:] "Alas, Lord, can I not beseech your goodness?"

[God speaks:] "Indeed, when two wrestle with each other, the weaker must lose. I shall willingly be the weaker, even though I am almighty. Three thousand masses are the price of his redemption, for he never attended a whole mass except out of human respect."¹⁵

"Lord, what was it that saved him?"

"Whenever he heard my words, he sighed. I rewarded him for that since toward the end he so lived that he sighed because of his sins."

"Lord, if his mother's brother-who from his youth till he turned gray has been considered a pious man and who is worn with toil and care-were to offer all this up for him, and for love of you were to depart and place himself in the position where he first became well known, would you perhaps let this soul go free?"

"Yes," said our Lord, "if I were so urgently importuned, I would have to grant everything that one wanted."

"Lord, if this religious man were to give his good works to this poor soul, what would happen to it then?"

Immediately, God let me see this blessed person;
This was not possible for me before
Because of the coarse nature of his punishment
Which my soul cannot bear.
He was fairer than the sun
And he soared in bright bliss
High above all earth's misery.

Full of cheer and contentment he said: "Tell my friends: even if the earth were made of gold and the bright sun shined upon it constantly both day and night with the sweet breezes of May and with delightful flowers ripening to fruit, I would not want to be there for one hour, so blissful is this life."

He had not yet entered heaven eternal.

11. How a Student Is Dead and a Dominican Was Seems

Our Lord spoke thus: "I say to you with my burning Godhead and with my living humanity that his nature is dead in a holy death, and so he can no longer commit serious sins on earth."

Then he was seen looking like a Dominican, standing on a column of red marble and preaching to the people thus: "Come, blessed of my Father," come to me, all ye blessed; and depart from me all ye cursed."

Then it was seen and understood that all preachers preach and teach us from these two sayings.

12. How You Should Conduct Yourself as to Fourteen Things

When you pray, you should be humble.
When you confess, you should be truthful.
When you do penance, you should be untiring.
When you eat, you should be frugal.
When you sleep, you should be disciplined.
When you are alone, you should be faithful.
When you are with people, you should be discreet.
When one teaches you good manners, you should be receptive.
When one castigates you for your wickedness, you should be patient.
When you do something good, you should think yourself bad.
When you do something bad, you should immediately seek forgiveness.
When you are vain, you should fear.
When you are sad, you should have great trust in God.
When you are doing manual work, you should go at a fast pace:
Then you can drive away evil thoughts.

13. How Religious out of Blindness Fend Off Inwardness from Themselves. The Sixfold Power of God's Gift

"Ah, dear Jesus, God of heaven, I have to ask you about something, Lord. I just cannot stand it any longer because of the great blindness that I recognize at the bottom of it." It is this: that religious people fend off divine inwardness in the following way. When God sees fit to let his divine heart shine forth in love toward the very blessed soul so intensely that a small spark alights on the cold soul and she receives so much that the heart of this person begins to glow, his soul to melt, and his eyes to flow, then our Lord would like to make an earthly person so heavenly that one actually wants to follow, love, and see God in him. And the person's senses say: "No, I can be of much use in external matters."" And it is especially cloistered people who say this when they are being especially clever.

Our Lord responds to this in the following way:

“My Godhead came to earth;
My humanity did the work.

My Godhead went on the cross;
My humanity suffered death.
My Godhead arose from death
And led humanity to heaven.
All those who drive me away from them
Shall be driven away from me.
What is a human being capable of doing on his own?
[Nothing but sin.]¹⁹
Never did my humanity ever do something
That my Godhead did not plan in advance.”

“People say, Lord, that it is the mark of wisdom
To spare the body.²⁰
For your divine breath wafts down
From your Holy Trinity so delightfully
And penetrates the soul so powerfully
That the body loses all its strength:
This makes a person unproductive.”

Our Lord said this:
“One should not offer gratis the king’s food
Until one has consumed the ordinary bare sustenance.
My special favor endows a person with special dignity,
In body and soul.
It provides instruction for the ignorant
And consolation for the wise.
It also gives eternal praise and boundless honor
To the fathomless spring from which it has flowed
When it swirls up again, having borne full fruit,
To where it flowed forth from me.”

Indeed, this favor that God is wont to grant a person powerfully and unexpectedly is so noble in itself and brings with it such closeness to God that it is no small sin that a person commits who rejects him for the sake of some earthly thing. Alas, ignoble soul, how can you manage to reject God before enjoying him fully, as is his will? For his most sublime pleasure lies hidden in you.

Do you want to know how you should make use of God's holy favor and enjoy it according to God's will? Well, it shall teach you this itself if you welcome it. You should receive it with external virtues and internal desire. In humble fear you should keep hold of it, submissive in all tribulations. Give it time and room in you; that is all that it asks of you. It shall melt you so deeply into God that you know what his will is concerning how long you should pursue his intense caressing of you, and when and how you should work for sinners and for those in purgatory, and should attend the needs of each and every person, alive or dead.

When you have accomplished this inwardly to God's pleasure insofar as lies in your soul's power-she will grow weary in herself as long as she is in the grips of her mortal body-then the soul says after this pleasurable experience:

“Lord, now flee from me inwardly,
And stand by me outwardly,
So that all my actions shine forth
In proportion to your favor,
And that I suffer willingly
And hardly complain about my cares.”

14. Those Who Complain in Suffering Lack Six Things; How One Should Bear Sickness and Contempt

Whoever in pain complains of his burdens
Is either blind in knowledge
Or spineless in forbearance.
His love has grown cold
And he is jaded in virtue,
Or his mind is dull
And blunt as to good words.

For this reason our Lord said: "This person does not want to be sick and does not want to be scorned. What, then, shall I use as the foundation of his glory?"

"Lord, when a person is sick and scorned, how can he then increase your glory?"

"When he is sick, he should honor, serve, and love me alone with cheerful forbearance. When he is scorned, he should love me and wait patiently. When preachers and confessors are forced from their office and cannot exercise it but still have the holy wish to do so, that is not an obstacle to their happiness. It is an enhancement of their glory."

15. The Sufferings of Enoch and Elijah, the Last Preachers, and the Wickedness of the Antichrist'

O mighty divine love, you have inflicted such sweet anguish on me that my soul languishes in wonder. When I consider that my body shall so fade away at death that I shall no longer suffer or praise my beloved Jesus, then I feel such pain that I desire, if that were possible, to live till the last day. Faithful love that is from God and does not have its source in me forces me to long for this. This is why our Lord said: "If you die, let your days fill you with sorrow, however holy you may be."

"Truly, Lord, I beg you that my longing not die when I can no longer serve you with my body."

Our Lord said: "Your longing shall live. It cannot die because it is eternal. If it keeps striving for my sake till the last day, then soul and body shall be reunited. When I put them together again, she shall praise me without end. Also, she has served me since the very beginning, for you wanted to exist from the time of Adam until now for love of me, just as you wanted to experience all human suffering and serve in all human labor for love of me. Moreover, I declare that your being shall remain until the end of humanity."

"Ah, my Dearest, who shall be the last human to whom my being might be joined? The life of religious people at the end of the world shall be precious."

Our Lord responded thus: "Enoch shall be the last human being to cultivate the spiritual life."

Thereupon God again showed me the end of this world, when the last brothers shall be martyred. Their hair, that they shall never cut, has a specific purpose in God's will: The Antichrist shall command that they be hung up by it onto trees. There they shall hang and nobly die, for their heart burns within them with the sweet fire of heaven as intensely as the body languishes in distress. And so, in the midst of the solace of the Holy Spirit and the pain of the miserable flesh, their soul shall depart from their body with no terror of these sufferings.

Elijah and Enoch shall travel from India to the sea, and a great throng shall follow each of them-all of them Christians fleeing to them from the Antichrist. They shall all be clubbed to death like rabid dogs that one chases down on the street, that have been poisoned and can live no longer. These are then followed by others who are secretly Christians. For they know well from God that they can escape heathenism no other way.

Elijah will be the first to be martyred. He shall be bound to a lofty cross, his hands nailed through.

They do this out of fierce hatred,
Because he constantly spoke of the holy cross
And what happened to Christ on it.
They do not let him die,
In the hope that in suffering so long
He might forsake Christian teaching
And thus turn to the Antichrist.
And so he hangs there, this holy intimate friend of God,

And no cry of pain escapes him.
Three days and three nights
He comforts Holy Christianity
Until his soul departs.
I saw the heavenly Father at his end,
And he received Elijah's soul
With his human hands and said:
"Come, my dear one, it is time for you."
And in a flash from heaven God led him away.

That wretched man, the Antichrist, does not allow God's intimate friend to be buried, for he wants all Christians to abjure their faith. In that he is deceived, for all who gaze upon the body are moved to Christian faith, and they desire to worship it. So filled with sweetness are they by the presence of the holy body that they forget all the agony of death and all earthly goods.

Enoch is still alive, for the Antichrist desires to hear all the wisdom that Enoch knows from God so that he can twist it publicly with his false teaching and perhaps draw Enoch to himself. The whole world would then be his in great honor.

Meanwhile so many of the wicked are drawn away from the Antichrist that he attacks Enoch with fierce words. Not till then does Enoch tell the Antichrist the truth:

“You are a scourge to the whole world
Sent by God because of the evilness of the wicked
And for the holiness of the good.
You are well versed in the writings of the Old Law
And the New Law as well.
Now see how you shall fare after all your efforts.
You have made your choice with full intent.
According to scripture you shall be lost,
As you can well read for yourself.
It wasn’t you who created earth and heaven.

You do not give the angels eternal life.
You did not make man,
Neither soul nor body.
You have never given any creatures their natural life.
How, then, could you ever be God?
You have wrought all your works in lies and evil scheming.
The eternal Truth is Jesus Christ,
Who is one eternal God with his Father.”

Sullenly the Antichrist says:

“How dare you speak the name of my enemy in my presence,
To whom you ascribe more of my honors than to me?
But I shall yet get even with you
And shall free the whole world from you.
Take him at once into my power
And pour boiling pitch into his mouth
And put a tight noose around his neck.
That will make my enemy shut up at once.
If I could hear his words,
I would gladly let him suffer more.
So hang him dead, high above all murderers,
So that all who look upon him
Desert the Christian faith.

He has insulted me in my honor.
No one needs his instruction.
I have been expected since long ago.
Everything shall be done according to my plan.”

Enoch recites his holy prayer in his pure heart thus:

“Eternal Father, Son, and Holy Spirit,
You eternal God undivided,
I thank you, Lord,
That you chose me long ago,
And I praise you, Lord,
In this anguish.
I pray to you, Lord,
For your sheep and mine,
That shall now be without a shepherd.
Keep them, Lord, each and every one,

And comfort them in secret.
Receive now, Lord, my soul.
I have no earthly love for my body.”

The response that God will give to his thanksgiving and his entreaty has been written here. I saw it and read it as written in the Holy Trinity:

“Dear son, come swiftly now to me.
I am truly in you.
Your dear ones for whom you have prayed to me
Shall baptize their children themselves.
I shall free them from the Antichrist at once.
In their hearts they shall remain Christians.
And I shall preserve them from all wavering.
Come, dear intimate friend, I await you,
And my heart skips forth to meet you.”

16. How the Soul of Our Lord Dwells in the Trinity and What Its Task Is; How It Speaks for the Sinner and Concerning the Task of Our Lady

When I wake up at night,

I wisely try my powers,
To see whether I, poor wretch, can pray at all
For this faithless Christianity
That inflicts such suffering on my Beloved.
Sometimes he draws me along a different route,
Pathless and bridgeless,
Where I must follow him barefoot
And stripped of all earthly things.
Who can so delicately conquer humanity?
Who can so swiftly transport the soul?
Who can so nobly illumine the mind
But God, who created it?
He works wonders with us.

Thus did I of a night
Call to mind the Holy Trinity
In the spontaneous sweet flowing of my soul.
There in the heights of the whole Holy Trinity
I saw without asking the soul of our Lord Jesus.
His soul dwells forever, unsurpassed in dignity,
In the Holy Trinity.
Therein it is enclosed and mysteriously entwined,
And it shines forth fair and glorious on all creatures,
Through the Holy Three Persons.

Then, with proper restraint, as is the custom at court, I asked to speak to the soul of our Lord for his glory, because it seemed to me that it worked special miracles. I hovered so close to it that I greeted it thus: "May you be blessed, dear One. What marvels do you perform in this eternal mirror,²² in which all the blessed gazed upon themselves in wonder? You have a delightful labor in blissful restlessness."

The soul of our Lord replied to the pitiful creature: "Welcome, my likeness,²³ for I, too, am a soul as you are; and I carried the burden of all souls with my guiltless body. This is my task: I constantly move the limitless Godhead, thereby recalling to the heavenly Father the infinite love he has for the human soul. I greet my divine humanity as well and thank it for my blessedness; and I call to mind its bond-for he²⁴ was himself an earthbound human-that he remember where he came from, how great and how noble is man's kinship to him,²⁵ and that he should never let man perish. For no one ever begot or gave birth to himself. Because of this you overcame all your sufferings without sin. Thus do I urge God's humanity to special mercy and that he remember how weak man is, and that he was not created free of his enemies, and that man must ever and again fight as one well-armed but whose eyes are bound. It is dark humanity that binds them. Remember, noble Son of God, how wretchedly sad I was on earth within you, and continue to help like a father all those who carry my likeness within them; for I am your soul. I must also wrest from the Holy Spirit his gift, for he shall bring to earth all blessedness to humankind from heaven."

"Heavenly Father, did you thrust the bolt of your justice so firmly across the gate of heaven that poor sinners can never enter? I shall take my complaint to Jesus, your dear Son, who holds the key to your kingdom²⁶ in his human hand with your almighty power."

This very same key was fashioned in the same land by Jewish hand. When Jesus turns the key, the outcast sinner shall come into your favor.

This is the word of the heavenly Father: "My soul cannot endure that I banish the sinner from me. And so I pursue many of them on and on till I have them in my grasp, and I save them a place so narrow that no one, no matter how clever, can follow me there."

And then the soul of our Lord speaks again:

"This is my glory,
And thus am I adorned.
The Godhead is my crown;
His humanity is my reward.
The Holy Spirit has embraced me
And so wondrously permeated me
That no creature can equal me or reach me.
Thus do I carry constantly in this Holy Trinity
All the sinners of earth, on and on,
That God not let them fall
Into the eternal abyss.

But this virgin in whose body I found shelter,
When I left the Holy Godhead for the humanity of her Son,
This virgin is a protectress of all chastity
And an advocate of all those tempted
Who show sorrow and reverence
Before the Holy Trinity.
Judgment is yet in her hands.”

17. God Considers the Sinner Good, What a Good Right Will Is, Concerning a Good Burden²⁷

This is incomprehensible: that God considers the sinner as a converted person. And that is right will in serving God, that one swiftly hurry to me and not look back; and I carry all burdens that are accepted for love of me.

18. You Should Scrutinize Your Heart at All Times

Look into your heart at all times
With the truth of the Holy Spirit.
Then you will find all lying purely detestable.
For lying drives out God’s love,
And it strengthens in one’s heart
Secret cunning, hate, and rage.

19. Good Intentions That One Cannot Turn into Deeds

I have often been much saddened
That I could never turn good intentions into good works.
Wavering and weakness rob me of them,
And that no one dares offer me sound advice.
And, alas, I dare not venture beyond my nature.
This has been the case since the time
God let me fall of my own free choice
From the bliss of the heights,
Where I was so lost in wonder
That I could not find the boundaries of things,
Where powerful love had drawn me in

With the flames of its fire.
But now it has pressed me down
Into a bottomless swamp
Where I find no footing.
And yet all that I suffer
I do not call pain,
For I would rather be yet further removed—
To the lowest place—
Cast off like a raging dog
And no one’s friend,
Unknown, in banishment,
With poor people in a foreign land.

And yet I shall not live except under obedience,
For holy, humble obedience is the seal of all virtues.
Good intention that a good person has
And cannot turn into a good deed
Is like exquisite, fair flowers,
Giving forth fragrance but no fruit.
Thus did God console me:

That all good will shall
Out of the abundance of a good life
Become blossoms of eternal bliss
From which God shall make wreaths
For his never-ending wedding feast
Which his chosen ones shall wear there
Who here go on so faithfully
With a wealth of good will
Which they are not able to turn into good works.

O generous God, hold out your fatherly hand to me,
And lead me into the land of love;
For I have, alas, lost much time,
And I would like to make up for it with you, Lord.
For comfort of the body and contentment of the senses
Must be received in humble fear
If one is to remain in whole truth.

20. This Book Came About out of a Threefold Favor; Love Flows, It Is Rich and Full of Desire, It Becomes Sick; Who Possesses Heaven; God Bestows Suffering and Consolation as Well

God bestowed upon me the favor that is written down in this book in a threefold manner. First and foremost, with great tenderness; then, with sublime intimacy; and now, with intense suffering. I much prefer to remain in this state than in the other two. This is why: although God's tenderness and intimacy are in themselves eternal and noble, they are unfortunately so foreign in this world that all who truly grasp them are not at all able to describe them. And so I have the greatest fears when enjoying pleasure, because Christ suffered much intense pain in this world. But the nature of love is such that it flows in sweetness; then it becomes rich in knowledge; thirdly, it becomes full of longing in rejection.

Oh, you are terribly inconstant. And, alas, sometimes true love of God becomes so weak from the base sweetness of empty honor, from swollen pride and from the loathsome frenzy of anger and from the unchecked desires for the things of this world that it becomes paralyzed in all its members. This is the way it works from the very beginning; this is its nature.

Further, no one possesses the whole of heaven in his heart but he alone who has removed himself from all consolation and all favors in this world. For pleasure has cut us off from God. And so we must return to him through suffering. And yet God cannot restrain himself-and we cannot do without it-from giving us his abundance and his favor for everything we do, refrain from doing, and suffer.

21. How Bad Priests Shall Be Humiliated; [How Preachers Alone Should Preach and Be Bishops;]28 Concerning the Last Brothers

Woe, Crown²⁹ of Holy Christianity, how greatly have you been sullied. The jewels have dropped from you, for you are undermining and violating the holy Christian faith. Your gold lies tarnished in the foul pool of carnality, for you have become shabby and do not have the least bit of true love. Your purity has been consumed in the lustful fire of gluttony. Your humility lies buried in the swamp of your flesh. Your truthfulness has been reduced to nothing amid the lying of this world. Your blossoms of all virtues have fallen away from you.

Woe, Crown" of the holy priesthood, how utterly have you disappeared. You have nothing left but your trappings; that is, ecclesiastical authority with which you war against God and his chosen intimates. For this God shall humiliate you before you know it, and our Lord speaks thus: "I shall touch the pope in Rome in his heart with great misery, and in this misery I shall tell him reproachfully that my shepherds of Jerusalem have become murderers and wolves. Before my very eyes they murder the white lambs, and the old sheep are all sick in the head because they cannot eat from the healthy pasture that grows in the high mountains, which is divine love and holy teaching.

"He who does not know the path to hell, let him look at the corrupt clergy, how their lives go straight to hell with women, children, and other public sins. This is why it is necessary that the last brothers come.

For when the cloak is old,
So is it also cold.

And so I must give my bride, Holy Christianity, a new cloak." These shall be the last brothers that were mentioned earlier."

"Son Pope, this is what you should bring about; then you shall be able to live a long life. The reason your predecessors did not live long is that they did not bring about the hidden intentions of my will. "32

Thus did I see the pope at prayer and heard God give him this message.

22. Seven Things, Five of Which One Finds in Heaven and Two on Earth"

23. How God Speaks with the Soul in Three Places

At the first place the devil often speaks to the soul. At the other two places he cannot do so. The first place is a person's senses. This place is equally accessible to God, the devil, and all creatures. They can speak here as they wish.

The second place where God speaks with the soul is in the soul. No one can enter this place but God alone. But when God speaks in the soul, it happens without any kind of awareness by the senses, in a great, mighty, swift union of God with the soul. Thus the senses cannot hear this delightful conversation. They become so humble that they cannot bear any creature beneath them. Should a person humble himself beneath the devil? Certainly, with this in mind: it should seem to him who has caused God such great insult with his life that he has often painted the devil's likeness onto his soul through his daily sins and sometimes inflicted large wounds on his soul with mortal sins. The soul that is in the embrace of the Holy Spirit cannot contain herself. She must ever sink away from all earthly comfort and from the pleasure of this comfort. But the soul that is in the embrace of its own selfish will inclines with much pleasure to earthly things.

The third place where God speaks to the soul is in heaven, when God raises up the soul in the pleasure of his will and suspends her there where she may take pleasure in the wonder of him.

24. How Christ Reveals His Wounds in Days of Suffering. Four Things Knock on Heaven's Gate

In my days of great suffering, God revealed himself to my soul, showed me the wounds of his heart, and said: "See how they have hurt me."

And my soul said: "Alas, Lord, why did you suffer such distress? From that time when so much of your pure blood was shed from your pure heart the whole world should rightfully have been redeemed by it.""

"No," he said, "that did not satisfy my Father. For all the poverty, all the toil, and all the suffering and humiliation are just a knocking at the gate of heaven up to the time when my heart's blood poured onto this earth. Only then was heaven opened."

The soul said: "Lord, when this happened, you were dead. I am confused. How can someone dead still bleed?"

Our Lord said: "My body was then in a human manner dead when my heart's blood flowed with a beam of the Godhead through my side. The blood issued forth by grace, just as did the milk that I drank from my virginal mother. My divinity was present in all members of my body while I was dead, just as it was before and afterward. After its long sadness, my soul rested the while in my Godhead. And a spiritual image of my humanity has always existed without a beginning suspended in my eternal Godhead."

25. Concerning Burned Love

"Ah, dear Lord, have mercy on one who has been consumed here in the fire of your love and has been absorbed in your humility and has been annihilated in all things."

God speaks:

"My Godhead burned you;
My humanity recognized you;
My Holy Spirit sanctified you in your poverty.
Those who love much like to remain silent.
Those who do not love have always been schemers against love."³⁵

26. Thinking About Death and Living Long Are Good

I am very surprising, and I am surprised in my human way of thinking that my soul is so surprising. Whenever I think of death, my soul looks forward to her leaving with such intensity that my body floats in great superhuman delight and my senses recognize ineffable wonders in the departure of the soul. Thus I would most of all like to die at the time God has foreseen. And yet, on the other hand, I say I want most of all to live until the last day. Then again my desire reaches back to the time of the martyrs, that I might shed my sinful blood in true Christian faith for the sake of Jesus whom I love. A special gift forces me to dare to state this: that I love God. For whenever vice and suffering come my way, my soul begins to burn in the fire of true love of God with such sweetness that my body floats suspended in divine pleasure. But a sadness remains in my senses, and I pray to God for all who slander me or revile me, that God preserve them from sin.

27. How You Should Thank and Ask

Lord heavenly Father, I thank you that you created me.
Lord Jesus Christ, I thank you that you redeemed me.
Lord Holy Spirit, I thank you that you have purified me.
Lord Holy Trinity, whole and undivided, I ask you to remember all faithfulness
And send me a merciful death
That will free me from all distress.
Into your hands I commend my spirit.³⁶

28. When You Are to Die, Take Leave of Ten Things

When I come to die, I shall take leave of all those things from which I am departing.

I shall take leave of Holy Christianity and I shall thank God that I bear the name of Christian and that I came to true Christian faith. And if I were to remain here longer, I would strive to be a help to Holy Christianity that is afflicted with many sins.

I shall take leave of all the poor souls who are now in purgatory. If I were to remain here longer, I would eagerly help you atone for your guilt, and I thank God that you have found grace.

I shall take leave of all those who are in hell, and I thank God that he has exercised his justice in regard to them. If I were to remain here longer, I would never wish them anything good.

I shall take leave of all those sinners who are in mortal sin. I thank God that I am not one of them. And if I were to remain here longer, I would eagerly carry their burden before God.

I shall take leave of all those penitents who are engaged in doing their penance. I thank God that I am one of them. If I were to remain here longer, I would have to hold them dear.

I shall take leave of all my enemies. I thank God that they did not get the better of me. If I were to remain here longer, I would lay myself under their feet.

I shall take leave of all earthly things. I lament to God that I never made use of them according to his holy determination.

I shall take leave of all my dear friends. I thank God and them that they were my help in need. If I were to remain here longer, I would have to feel shame for the failings that they noticed in me.

I shall take leave of all my baseness. I lament to God that I so ruined his holy gift to my soul that there was never a shortcoming so trivial that it was not noticed by heaven in my soul. No matter how penance was done for it, there was always some damage involved. Lord Jesus, I make my complaint to you, but the shame is all mine.

I shall take leave of my wretched body. I thank God that on many occasions he preserved me from many a sin. If I were to remain here longer, its baseness is of so many kinds that I would never get to like it.

29. Ten Parts of Divine Fire out of God's Nobility

An unworthy person pondered in her simplicity God's nobility. And God let her recognize in her senses and see with the eyes of her soul a fire that burned unceasingly in the heights above all things. The fire had been burning without a beginning and shall keep on burning without end. This fire is God eternal, who holds within himself eternal life and from whom all things have come forth. The sparks of the fire that have shot forth are the holy angels. The bright flickerings of the fire are all the saints of God. For their life has given Christianity many a fine sparkle. The ever-glowing coals of the fire are all the blessed here on earth who are on fire with heavenly love and shine with good example. All those who have grown cold in sin can warm themselves on the coals. The embers of the fire have been scattered and extinguished. These are the bodies of the blessed waiting in the earth for their heavenly reward. The rule of the fire is yet to come. That is Jesus Christ, to whom his heavenly Father has entrusted the first redemption and the last judgment. On the last day, out of the embers, he shall fashion for the heavenly Father the most exquisite chalices from which at his eternal wedding feast he himself shall drink all the holiness that, together with his dear Son, he has poured into our soul and into our human understanding.

Ah, I shall drink of you
And you shall drink of me
All the goodness that God has preserved in us.
Happy is he who stands firm
And does not let spill
What God has poured into him.

The smoke of the fire is all earthly things that one often makes use of with improper pleasure. How beautifully they shine in our eyes. How wantonly they play in our hearts. And yet they bear hidden within them a great amount of bitterness, for they disappear like smoke and blind the best. They make even the holiest persons bleary-eyed.

The comfort of the fire is the delightful pleasure that our soul receives inwardly from God through the warmth of the divine fire, so sacred that we, on fire, reflect back toward the heavenly fire, and we persevere in virtue so that we are not extinguished.

The bitterness of the fire is the word that God shall speak on the last day: "Go from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire!"

The radiance of the fire is the gleaming sight of the divine countenance of the Holy Trinity that shall flood our body and soul with light, so that we shall see and know there the marvelous bliss that here we cannot even name.

These things have come out of this fire and flow back into it, each according to God's disposition, in eternal praise.

Whoever wishes to speak more about this,
Let him prostrate himself in this fire
And see and taste how the Godhead flows,
How humanity pours,

How the Holy Spirit wrestles
And vanquishes many a heart,
Forcing it to love God in many different ways.

30. Pure Love Has Four Things

Pure love of God has four things about it: that one be so utterly of one mind with God that whatever might happen to us, except for sin, we thank God devoutly for it.

Secondly, that we use to good effect the gifts we have from God in body and soul.

Thirdly, that we live purely and morally, free of sin.

Fourthly, that we have all virtues in us. Alas, if only I had them and really put them to good use with regard to everything, I would exchange that for all the marvels of contemplation that I ever heard anyone mention. What good are lofty words without works of mercy? What good is love of God when joined to rage against good human beings?

You say: "If God were to give it to me, I would be happy to do it." 38

Now listen here: Virtues are half gifts from God and half our own doing. Whenever God gives us insight, we should put virtues to good use.

31. How God Made the Soul. Concerning Pleasure and Pain. How God Is Like a Sphere

I said in one passage in this book that the Godhead is my Father by nature." You do not understand this, and say: "Everything that God has done with us is completely a matter of grace and not of nature."

You are right, but I am right, too. Consider this analogy. No matter how good a person's eyes are, he can't see farther than a league. No matter how acute a person's mind is, he cannot grasp nonphysical things except with faith, and he gropes around like a blind man in the darkness. The loving soul that loves everything that God loves and hates everything that God hates has one eye that God has illumined. With it she peers into the eternal Godhead and sees how the Godhead has labored in the soul with her nature. He formed her according to himself. He planted her in himself. With her, most of all among all creatures, he united himself. He enclosed her within himself and poured so much of his divine nature into her that she can say nothing else but that with all this oneness he is more than her Father.

The body receives its value from its relationship as brother of the Son of the heavenly Father and from the reward of his toils. The Son of God, Jesus Christ, performed his work with heartfelt love, by suffering poverty, pain, toil, humiliation-even unto his holy death. The Holy Spirit also performed his works, as you say, with his grace and has produced all the gifts that we ever received. These are three different kinds of works, and yet one undivided God performed them in us.

Two things are continually at work on earth and in purgatory through the power of God. One continues to work only in heaven. The second continues to work only in hell. This first is bliss without suffering in heaven. The second is suffering without bliss in hell."

Where was God before he created anything? He was in himself and all things were as present and as manifest to him as they are today. What form did our Lord God have then? Exactly like that of a sphere, and all things were enclosed within God with no lock and no door. The lowest part of the sphere is a bottomless foundation beneath all abysses. The highest part of the sphere is a top above which there is nothing. The circumference of the sphere is an unmeasurable circle." At this point God had not yet become Creator. But when he created all things, did the sphere open? No, it has remained whole and it shall remain whole forever. When God became creator, all creatures became manifest in themselves: human beings in order to love God, to enjoy and know him, and to remain obedient; birds and animals to live according to their nature; inanimate creatures to remain firmly placed in their being. Now listen to this: Whatever we know is absolutely nothing unless we love God properly in all things, just as he himself created all things in properly measured love and offered and taught us love, as well.

32. How We Become Like God, St. Mary, the Angels, and the Saints

To the extent that we love mercy and practice constancy we are like the heavenly Father, who without ceasing performs these things in us.

To the extent that we suffer poverty, humiliation, rejection, and pain here we are like the true Son of God, who endured in complete forbearance all his adversity and suffering.

To the extent that we here flow outward with all the abundance of our heart to give our possessions to the poor and to spend our lives in the service of the sick we are like the Holy Spirit, who is an abundant outpouring of the Father and the Son.

To the extent that we are truthful, temperate, and modest in holy simplicity we are like the Holy Trinity, who is true God and has performed all his works, and still does, in the order proper to them.

To the extent that we are chaste in complete purity, humble in complete submissiveness, ready to serve in all holiness, innocent of all ill will we are like our dear Lady St. Mary, who was ennobled through these virtues, so that she, a virgin, became a mother and, though a mother, remained a virgin, and is alone empress over all creatures.

To the extent that we are kind, friendly, and peace-loving we are like the angels, who never do anything wicked.

To the extent that we lead a holy life in exile and are unconsolated in hardship we are like St. John the Baptist, who has been elevated above many saints.

To the extent that we desire that God be praised, recognize what we have been given, and properly carry out God's will we are like the prophets and the holy fathers, who through great virtue overcame themselves in God.

To the extent that we learn wisdom and through it change other people and stand true to God in all trials we resemble the holy apostles, who went out of themselves even to death.

To the extent that we are patient in all distress and in the measure that we hold fast to our Christian faith, even in the face of death, we resemble the holy martyrs, who have marked out for us through the shedding of their blood the true path to heaven.

To the extent that we resolutely bear the difficulties of Holy Christianity, both those of the living and those of the dead, we are like the holy confessors, who remained watchful in great toil and heard confessions with sympathy.

To the extent that we remain unconquered in battle⁴² and preserve our maidenly honor we are like the holy virgins, who have not lost true victory.

To the extent that we have deep sorrow and to the extent that we perform many kinds of holy penance we are like those holy widows, who, after sinning, attained such great honor.

To the extent that we have all the virtues about us we are like God and all his saints, who have followed God with complete devotion.

33. Concerning a Strict Chapter⁴³ to Which a Pilgrim Came Who Turned Out to Be a Great Lord

For a long time a certain person used to hold a strict chapter in his heart, considering how he had harmed himself, and the humiliation arising for God because of him. And then he cast out from his heart all the sinful desires of his flesh and put in their place a willingness to suffer all torments for love of God. He cast out all the pleasures he had with friends and relatives and put in their place all the humiliation that those hostile to him wished to inflict on him. He cast out as well all love of wealth and honor that give the sinful world such joy and put in their place all the poverty that one can possibly endure with good counsel.

To this chapter our Lord Jesus Christ came, looking like a poor pilgrim. The person's spirit was so enlightened that he recognized that it was our Lord, and he said: "Hello, dear Pilgrim, where are you coming from?"

He answered: "I am coming from Jerusalem. I was seriously wounded there. I suffered deep humiliation, poverty, and pain. I brought it all to you."

"I thank you for that, very dear Lord; I have certainly experienced that many a day."

Then our Lord took a simple crown, put it on the person's head and said: "This is the crown of poverty, humiliation, and suffering. This crown shall yet be adorned with my own image." Then the pilgrim went away.

The person became sad, and said: "Alas, alas for my dear Pilgrim. I really wanted to talk more with him." Then she⁴⁴ looked up in the heights and caught sight of him.

He resembled a powerful lord and was surrounded by heavenly delights, and said: "I bless you and greet you. My peace be with you always! Amen."

34. Someone Who Despises the World Should Be Honored with Nine Things

A voice was heard and these words were spoken:

“Look! Here she comes who despised the world
And who put lies to flight
And who loved truth
And who blessed me.
She shall be received with all honor.

She shall be grounded in truth.
She shall be blessed forever.
She shall be clothed with all beauty.
She shall be crowned with all dignity.
She shall be placed on the chair of eternal rest.
She shall be welcomed by every tongue.
She shall be served with all benefits.
She shall enjoy all gifts.”

35. How the Soul of One Blessed Speaks to Her Body on the Last Day

Rise up, my dearly beloved,⁴⁵ and be healed of
All your sufferings,
All your days of pain,
All your humiliation,
All your sadness,
All your loneliness,
All your wounds,
And all your toils.

The morning star has arisen: that is the birth and life of St. Mary.
The sun has sent forth its radiance: that is when God became man, labored, and ascended into heaven.
The moon shall ever remain unchanged: that is that we ever after shall remain unchanging in eternal life.
In the past my whole well-being depended on you;
Now all your consolation depends on me.
If I had not come back to you,
You would never be taken from these ashes.
Eternal day has arisen for us.
Now we shall receive our reward.

36. That John the Baptist Sang Mass for the Poor Girl Was Spiritual Knowledge in the Soul

One cannot grasp divine gifts with merely human understanding. And so they sin who do not keep their spirit open to invisible truth. What one is able to see with the eyes of the flesh, hear with the ears of the flesh, and say with one's fleshly mouth is as utterly different from the open truth of the loving soul as light from wax is from the bright sun.

That John the Baptist sang mass for the poor girl was not of the flesh; it was so spiritual that only the soul saw it, understood it, and enjoyed it. The body had nothing from it except what it could grasp in its human senses through the nobility of the soul. And this is why the words had to be expressed in human terms.

My Pharisee remarked in response to this description that John the Baptist was a layman. The Most Holy Sacrament in the mass is God's body.' John the Baptist touched this same Son of God in humble trembling fear while leading a holy life of such dignity that he heard the voice of the heavenly Father and caught his words and saw the Holy Spirit and recognized the Son in them both.⁴⁷ John the Baptist also preached the holy Christian faith openly to all the people and pointed out for the people with his finger the true Son of God who was there present: "Behold the Lamb of God."" Neither pope nor bishop nor priest can ever speak so perfectly the word of God as did John the Baptist, except through our Christian faith which is above human understanding. Was this man really a layman? Prove me wrong, you who are blind! Your lies and your hate shall never be forgiven you without punishment!

37. You Should Praise God, Lament, and Ask for Twelve Things

Blessed are you, dear Lord Jesus Christ, God, Son of the living God! Through the tenets of my faith I know truly that you are here present, true God and true man. In this same name I adore you, Lord, today as my God and my Lord, as my Creator and my Redeemer, as my most dearly Beloved of all men and the most worthy of all lords, now and forever. Lord, heavenly Father, lament to your Holy Trinity that I have sinned before your eyes without fear and without shame. Alas, help me today, generous God, with all your favor, for my heart has been darkened by the habit of sinning. Cleanse my heart today, Lord, of all earthly love; and pour down, Lord, your heavenly flood into my and soul, that I might weep over indignities to you and over how deplorable my sins are.

Lord, I thank you for all the favors that you, dear Lord, have shown us, are showing us and shall show us eternally. I ask you, Lord, heavenly Father, in the name of Jesus Christ, that you purify me with your grace of all my sins and protect me from all sin, and that you make me holy for eternal life with all virtues.

I ask you, Lord Jesus Christ, by your holy death and by the pitiful suffering your holy body suffered on the holy cross, that you, Lord, with the eyes of your divine mercy, of your human faithfulness and the favor of the Holy Spirit, deign to look upon all my distress and, at the end, my death. Give me then, Lord, your very own body, that I might receive you, Lord, with true Christian faith, with genuine love, so that your holy body might be and remain the last food of my body and the eternal bread of my poor soul.

I ask you further, dearest Lord, that you might want to comfort my poor soul with your own self and might release me from all enemies. I ask you, dearest Lord Jesus Christ, that you then receive my poor soul into your fatherly hands and take me then in great joy out of this wretched banishment into the land of your blessed Father, where, Lord, I might bless you and praise you with all the saints who are now there present and shall yet come. Grant this to me, dear Lord Jesus Christ, and to all those with me who are kind and faithful to me out of love for you. And come to the aid of those with me, too, who are unkind and unfaithful to me against your wishes, together with all those who, with me, are believing Christians.

I ask you, Lord, for the sake of your own honor that you give us Christians always on the chair in Rome a leader filled with all Christian virtues through which Holy Christianity may expand in love and be freed from all sins and be made holy with all virtues, so that you, dear Lord, might see fit today to free with your almighty hand Jerusalem and all the towns and lands that are oppressed by unjust power, for the sake of your three glorious names."

Together with all the saints I ask you, dearest Jesus Christ, for Christian peace, for a sufficient harvest and for good weather for this land and for all Christian lands. I ask you, dear Lord, that you keep your friends in your service and that you convert your enemies and undermine their wickedness. I ask you, Emperor of all honors and Crown of all princes, Lord Jesus Christ, on behalf of the princes in this land and those of all Christian lands, that you deign today to unite them in your Holy Spirit, so that they never again instigate a sinful war against your will and against their own well-being.

I pray to you, dear Jesus Christ, for all Christians who are today in distress, suffering drought, are sick, in prison, in sadness, in severe poverty. I ask you in your generous kindness that you might so comfort them today that they may never lose your eternal comfort and your blessed favor.

I pray to you, holy Father of heaven, for all Christian souls that depart from their bodies today, that you, merciful God, might be their Preserver and impart to them eternal life. Ah, dear Lord, have mercy on the souls of my father and mother, and on all the souls in purgatory. Free them, Lord, at this hour through your three glorious names. May they rest in peace. Amen.⁵⁰

I pray to you, dear Lord, for all my companions," that you may give all of us the virtues that purify and sanctify our life for your praise and for the benefit of Holy Christianity. Receive today, Lord, this prayer and my lament, and hear and answer me according to your grace. Amen.

38. No one Can Destroy God's Heaven. Hell Drives God Out

"Alas, dear Lord, almighty God, how long shall I stand here on the earth of my flesh like a stick or a target that people run, hurl, and shoot at, having long ago sullied my honor with cunning and malice?"

Now listen to this reply:

"No one is so swift of foot,
No one is so strong at hurling,
No one is so cunning in shooting,
No one is so malicious in his rage
That he can destroy my heaven
Or smash to pieces or damage the place where I dwell.
What is more: Those who today offer me shelter
And tomorrow throw me out,
They are like hell.
Whose foundation I am,
I shall be his pinnacle as well."

"Alas, Lord, who shall help me that I always travel on the path that, if I slip, I not fall?"

Fear of God shall keep me upright; God's will shall guide me.

39. The Reflection of God's Radiance by Our Lady and Her Power

Oh, oh, oh, three Persons have one name undivided in one God. Gracefully they flow full force toward Mary's countenance, inseparable in one light beam, richly bestowing the bright light of heavenly honors. With an indescribable greeting⁵² it touches her heart, which shines and glows in such a way that the sublime reflection of the Holy Trinity lingers on her countenance.

It flows farther still
And fills all the humble vessels of love,
Giving them splendor and honor
Far beyond the others.

In this bright reflection our Lady can well make demands. And yet, if she wants to request something, she does so with humility; for God in his love became man in her humility. Does our Lady need humility in heaven? Only to the extent that she honors God more than herself, submissively together with all the blessed who follow her example.

Our Lady's radiance is illumined by all the pure gifts that she received from God. She is adorned as well with all the virtues perfectly. She is crowned with all dignity. Thus does she flow back into God full of all charm.

How our Lady feels bliss in the Holy Trinity and how God unites himself to her beyond how he does with all pure persons cannot be expressed in words. But to the degree they were united here on earth, our Lady feels bliss in heaven, and, in like measure, our Lord pours into her, beyond what he does with all the other saints. Our Lady has power over all the devils to keep them away from people. And that is why we like to proclaim our Ave Maria in her splendorous presence: so that she might remember us here.

40. Temptation, the World, and a Good End Test Us

No one knows how firmly he stands until he has been flung into the temptations of the body.

No one knows how strong he is until he is assailed by the wickedness of the world.

No one knows how good he is until he has achieved a good end.

41. How God's Splendor Is Reflected in a Human Being and in the Angels

You⁵³ want me to continue to write, but I cannot. Bliss, glory, brightness, intimate love, truth: these so overwhelm me that I have become dumb, unable to say more of what I know.

And yet: A mirror was seen in heaven before the breast of each soul [and body] .⁵⁴ In it shines the mirror of the Holy Trinity, giving truth and knowledge of all the virtues the body ever practiced and of all the gifts the soul had ever received on earth. From here the glorious reflection of each and every person shines forth back again into the sublime majesty from which it flowed forth. The radiance of the angels is fiery, bright with love, for they take great delight in our blessedness. They serve us effortlessly and their reward increases while the earth exists. True love of God has the same power in the angels that it does in men. That our serving requires great effort is due to our being sinful.

42. Sister Mechthild Wrote the Following in a Note to Her Brother B., of the Order of Preachers, Saying⁵⁵

"The greatest joy in heaven is the will of God. When unwillingness becomes willingness, God's joy enters into the heart of a sad person. This is the confession of a spiritual person-that one has carelessly scorned a gift that comes from God. We should accept gifts of pain with joy. We should accept gifts of comfort with fear. Thus we can put all things that come our way to good use.

Dear friend, be in harmony with God, and be happy with his will.

[43. This Writing Flowed out of God's

The writing in this book flowed out of the living Godhead into Sister Mechthild's heart and has been as faithfully set down here as it was given by God, out of her heart and written by her hand. Thanks be to God.]⁵⁷

Book VII

1. The Crown and the Dignity of Our Lord Jesus Christ, Which He Shall Receive After the Last Day

Our Lord, the heavenly Father, in his divine wisdom has stored away many ineffable gifts with which he intends to adorn his chosen children after the last day. Especially for his only begotten Son, Jesus, our Redeemer, has the heavenly Father prepared and fashioned a crown with such rich and exquisite workmanship that all the craftsmen who ever existed, are now, and ever shall be could not fully capture the splendor and rich delights of this crown. The spiritual eyes of the loving soul beheld this crown in limitless eternity and its nature was made known to her. What is this thing called eternity? It is the uncreated wisdom of the infinite Godhead that has neither beginning nor end.

The crown has three arches. The first arch is that of the patriarchs, the second that of the prophets, the third that of Holy Christianity. The crown is formed by the images and decorated with the presence of all the blessed who are destined to possess God's kingdom on the last day. They shall have honor that is portioned out to them according to their works.

The first arch of the crown is fashioned and illumined with the precious stones of the holy interior life and good works the patriarchs ever performed. The arch is also formed by human likeness, body and soul. The first likeness on the arch of the crown is that of St. Stephen, and all the martyrs who ever shed their blood in Christian faith are depicted together with him. Next to this, St. Peter and all God's apostles with him are also depicted; then come all the blessed who followed the teachings of the apostles. Those married people shall also be depicted on this arch, together with their children, who have followed God through good works.

The second arch of the crown is covered with the likenesses of the popes together with all the spiritual fathers to whom God entrusted his sheep. This arch is fashioned with all spiritual authority and decorated with the flowers of Christian teaching.

The third arch of the crown is formed most beautifully of all, with the noble human form of our Lord Jesus Christ, and with him his glorious mother Mary with all her virgins who shall follow the Lamb.' St. John the Baptist is represented there very close to the Lamb, and all those who became Christians under his hands are splendidly represented with him. This arch of the crown is adorned with the natures of all creatures in accordance with the love and affection that the creator had for them when he created all things according to his will.

The crown is garlanded with many knightly shields of mighty Christian faith. The empire shall also be represented on the crown, fashioned and decorated down to the very last peasant, their honor always depending on how well they served God.

At the time of the Antichrist the crown shall be crenelated with many a glorious image, such as that of Elias and Enoch, and many holy martyrs shall be there before them wearing the flowers of the holiness of their life and enhanced by their precious blood.

The crown shall also be dyed in the blood of the Lamb, and shall shine forth and be gilded with the powerful love that broke the sweet heart of Jesus in two. Our heavenly Father created this crown; Jesus Christ earned it; the Holy Spirit fashioned it and hammered it out in fiery love, making it so pliable with the refined skills of the Holy Trinity that it fits our Redeemer Jesus Christ so well and looks so glorious on him that the heavenly Father receives more joy still from his only begotten Son. This has to be, even though the eternal Godhead without a beginning always contained all bliss and joy within itself, does now, and ever shall. And yet it causes him special eternal joy, that he shall gaze with such happiness upon his eternal Son, together with all his followers.

When Jesus Christ has held his last judgment and has served and celebrated his last supper, he shall receive this crown from his Father in great honor and with him all those who in body and soul with great effort have come to the eternal feast. Each soul and body shall see its honor on the crown.

The crown was produced on earth at a great cost-not with gold, nor with silver, nor with jewels; rather, with human toil, with human tears, sweat, and blood, with all the virtues and, finally, with painful death. Angels will not be seen on the crown because they are not human beings. But they shall praise God for the crown with delightful song.

The first choir sings: "We praise you, Lord, because of your glorious law from which have come forth all here present whose likenesses appear on your crown."

The second choir: "We praise you, Lord, with the faith of Abraham and with the fervent longing and prophecies of all the prophets."

The third choir: "We praise you, Lord, with all the wisdom and piety of all your apostles."

The fourth choir: "We praise you, Lord, with the blood and the constancy of all your martyrs."

The fifth choir: "We praise you, Lord, for the holy prayer and Christian teaching of all the baptists and confessors."

The sixth choir: "We praise you, Lord, with the steadfastness of the penitence of your widows."

The seventh choir: "We praise you, Lord, with the chastity of all virgins."

The eighth choir: "We praise you, Lord, with the fruit of your mother and virgin."

The ninth choir: "We praise you, Lord, for your holy death and your glorious life after your death, and for your great outpouring of every gift and every goodness with which, Lord, you have raised us up and admirably ranked us. We praise you, Lord, with your fiery love in which you have made us one."

Above the crown flies the loveliest banner ever seen in this empire. This shall be the holy cross on which Christ suffered his death. The cross has four ends. The bottom end is decorated with bliss brighter than the sun. On the right side beneath the cross the pillar is suspended upright, stained with the blood of the Lamb, festooned and decorated with the nails with which our Lord was wounded. At the top of the tree of the cross hangs suspended the fairest imperial thorn-crown of the realm.

The thorns have blossoms
Lily white, rosy pink,
Delightful, bright as heaven.

That is the banner of the crown with which Jesus won the victory and returned alive to his Father.

Right after the last day, at the eternal celebration, when God has made all things new, this crown will be revealed and will sit lightly upon the humanity of our Lord to the glory and praise of the Holy Trinity and the joy of all the blessed evermore.

The humanity of our Lord is an intelligible image of his eternal Godhead,² so that we can grasp the Godhead with the humanity and, like the Holy Trinity, enjoy, hug, kiss, and embrace God in an incomprehensible manner, whom neither heaven nor hell nor purgatory can ever grasp or resist. The eternal Godhead shines forth, lighting up all the blessed who are in its presence and making them ready for love, so that they freely rejoice and live ever free of interior suffering. The humanity of our Lord greets, rejoices, and loves his flesh and his blood without ceasing. Though there is no longer flesh and blood there, still the brotherly kinship is so great that he has to love his human nature in a special way.

The Holy Spirit, too, shares its heavenly outpouring of love, enriching the blessed and so utterly satisfying them that they sing with joy, charmingly laugh and leap with measured step, flow and float along. They soar and climb from choir to choir to the heights of the realm where they gaze into the mirror of eternity' and understand the will and all the works of the Holy Trinity and how they themselves have been formed in body and soul, as they shall remain forever. The soul is formed in the body with human qualities but has a divine shimmer about it and shines through the body as radiant gold shines through pure crystal.

Thus do they⁴ become utterly free and happy,
Agile, strong, and filled with love,
Radiant and as godlike as one can be.
They travel about wherever they want
As swiftly over a thousand leagues

As one here forms a thought.
Just think what such movement is like!
And yet never can they touch or grasp an end of this kingdom.
The expanse of space and streets of gold are overly large,
And yet are the right size and not really golden.
They are infinitely better than gold and precious stones.
These things are completely of the earth and shall be annihilated.

And now comes the end of the crown: The Holy Spirit will be fashioning the crown until the last day. Then the Father and the Son shall reward him for his work. As recompense he shall give him all the souls and bodies that are assembled in the kingdom of God. There within them the Holy Spirit shall rest eternally, and he shall constantly hail them and fill them with joy. Everything that was ever done or will ever be done for the love of God, everything that was ever endured or forsaken for God's sake shall all blossom forth on the crown. Ah, what a crown! Ah, who can help me become a tiny flower on the crown like the newly baptized infants who are the tiniest flowers on the crown?

If this description is too long, it is because I take such rich delight in the crown. Actually, I have set down many a long description with few words. I say this to myself: "How much longer, helpless puppy, will you go on yapping? You have to quiet down because I have to keep silent about what is finest."

2. How a Person Prayed for All the Souls on All Souls 'Day

On All Souls' Day I prayed together with Holy Christianity for all the souls that are doing penance in purgatory. Then I saw a purgatory that was like a stove. On the outside it was black; inside it was full of fiery flames. Looking inside I saw how they stood in the flames and burned like a bundle of straw. Then someone was standing next to me who looked like a large angel. I asked him how it was that the souls squeezed themselves outside when the prayers of good people reached them. Some squeezed themselves outside and some were unable to do so. Then he whom I asked answered me: "When they were on earth, they did not want to come to the aid of those who were begging them for help in their distress."

Then my soul was moved to pity because of their power and dignity, and cried to heaven: "Lord God, could I go inside to them and suffer with them so that they might come to you sooner?" Then our Lord revealed that he was the angel standing next to me, and he said: "If you are willing to go in, I shall go in with you." Then our Lord clasped the spirit of this person to himself and brought her inside. When the soul came inside with our Lord, she felt no pain. Then she asked how many of them there were. Our Lord said: "You can't finish counting them, and these are the ones for whom you prayed while they were on earth."

Then I found a person for whom I used to pray thirty years ago. And I was saddened because I had nothing to give him and, because of my wretchedness, I did not dare ask for great things from such a great Lord. Then I said the following words: "O dear Lord, would you release them?" Then all at once they rose up in great numbers wonderfully whiter than snow, and they floated off toward paradise in pure sweet bliss. There they rested in joy. When they rose out of the fire, they all sang the following psalm: "Praise the Lord, ye children. After that they sang: "We praise you, Lord, for the greatness of your goodness, for the generousness of your gift and for the faithfulness of your help."

Our Lord was still standing next to the place of fire and held the spirit of the person in his embrace. The soul of the person said: "O Lord, you well know what I desire." This was that she might be at the feet of our Lord in order to thank him.

Our Lord then let her down,
And she thanked him again
That she was able to witness the great honor
That the poor souls had received from God.
Then she found on his feet
The rose-colored wounds
Of our true redemption.

Then she prayed: "Lord, give me your blessing."
And our Lord said: "I bless you with my wounds."

May this happen to me and to all God's friends and mine. This, alas, did not come about through my efforts, for I consider the entreaties of Holy Christianity to be worth much more than mine.

3. How Beneficial It Is for a Person to Examine His Heart Constantly with Humble Fear

I know of no one so good that it is unnecessary for him to examine his heart constantly, to recognize what dwells within it, and also to criticize with great frequency all his deeds. One should do this with humble fear. God's voice taught me this, for I have never performed any deed so well that I could not have done it better. This is what I criticize myself for.

This is how we should chide our frailty: "Well now, you most wretched of all creatures, how long do you intend to harbor useless habits in your five senses? Our childhood was foolish, our youth became troubled. How we then conquered is clear to God. Alas, in my old age there is, unfortunately, much that I must criticize, for it is unproductive in resplendent deeds and cold as to graces. It is powerless as well, since it does not have youth with which to sustain fiery love of God. It also has no tolerance for pain, so that a small twinge that youth would ignore is quite painful. But proper old age is joyfully patient and trusts in God alone.

Seven years ago a discouraged old person complained to God about this sorry state of things. God gave this reply:

"Your childhood was a playmate of my Holy Spirit.
Your youth was a bride of my humanity.
Your old age is now a housewife of my Godhead."

Alas, dear Lord, what good is it that a dog barks if the owner of the house keeps on sleeping? The thief breaks into his house anyway.

And yet the prayer of a pure heart sometimes awakens the dead sinner. Woe, sinner! How bitterly can one weep for you, for you are your own murderer and you are harmful to all goodness and yet a benefit to it. A good person receives great profit when he sees someone weaken or fall into sin. He then looks very carefully around him so that he might not get into that trouble at all. Thus does a good person better himself through evil things. Freely performed good deeds then follow. But a wicked person gets worse when he sees bad examples. He becomes so evil that he looks with contempt upon good deeds and good people. And he is most comfortable with his own perverse wisdom.

My dear Schoolmaster, who taught me this book, silly stupid person though I be, also taught me the following saying: You should not trust someone who is not sincere in what he does. I know an enemy who is a destroyer of divine truth in the human heart. If one gives him room, he writes, with the approval of the person, false wisdom into the person's heart and says: "I am quick to anger and weak by nature." This is not an honorable excuse before God. With the help of grace you should become meek and strong.

"I have no grace." Then in your lack of grace you should call out to the God of grace with humble tears and with constant prayers in holy desire. Then the worm of anger will die. You must do violence to yourself. Then there will be no need for any hurtful force from God or anyone else to come upon you. Then the worm of anger shall be annihilated. If, with God, we want to overcome and drive out our anger and all our imperfections, we simply have to ignore our sinful temptations in secret and outwardly put on a holy, cheerful demeanor.

Alas, wretched brood, as long as we storm around in anger, even if there is anything good about us, we still have to come back to our heart.' Then we must rightly be ashamed. The anger consumed our strength and dried out our flesh, and so we wasted our valuable time when we should have been serving God. Alas, this is an eternal loss! Again, alas! I regret the sinful tears that were shed in haughty anger. The soul becomes so darkened thereby that a person is incapable the whole time of rightly enjoying any good things. But tears of sorrow are so holy. If a great sinner could shed one tear of sorrow for all his sins, he would never go to everlasting hell-if he remained in this disposition.

No matter how small the sins are that a good person commits regularly, which he just won't give up the while he lives-if he dies thus without confession and penance, no matter how holy he is, he will end up in bitter purgatory. For as merciful as God is, he is also at the same time just and angered by all sins. I tell myself that love must dwell in us. Never should we be self-righteous. Then humility will dwell within.

4. Our Lord's Switch

Not long after I arrived at the convent,' I was so terribly afflicted with sickness that my Lady felt pity. So I said to our Lord: "Dear Lord, what is your purpose with this suffering?" And our Lord said this:

"All your paths have been measured out;
All your footsteps have been counted.
Your life has been sanctified.
Your end shall be happy,
And my kingdom is very close to you."

"Lord, why is my life sanctified, since I can do so little that is good?"

Then our Lord said: "Your life has become sanctified because my switch never leaves your back."

We praise you, God,' that God is so good.

5. Why the Convent Was Once Undergoing Trials

One should do good to those who one knows are in need of it. For I do not want to have from the convent the good that one withholds from them. This is the explanation: Each one according to his office should in mercy do good to those he knows to be in need.

6. The Chapter Room¹ and How a Person Should Examine His Infractions and Weep for Them; Two Golden Pennies and Good Will and Desire

Whoever has this knowledge, let him lament and weep with me. For the chosen children of God frequently take God's body, receiving it in a holy manner. But I have to go to my chapter room accompanied by my burning conscience.

Then my unworthiness comes and chides me.
Then my indolence comes and accuses me.
Then the frivolousness of my personality comes and points out my capriciousness to me.
Then the wretchedness of my useless life comes and saddens me.
Then fear of God comes and scourges me.

Then I crawl forward like a tiny worm on the ground and hide myself under the grass of my many various omissions all my days. There I sit and cry to heaven: "O merciful God, grant me that I might today share in the grace that your chosen ones have now received."

Thereupon our Lord replied: "Take two golden pennies that weigh the same and go shopping with them. If they are of equal value, they are equally good."

"Alas, dear Lord, how can my wretchedness be equal to your goodness? For I am not the person who could well offer you honor. I have nothing that is suitable for you, and for consolation my soul clings to worthless nothings in the world. And so I am rejected and, alas, corrupt. I am not at all what I have long desired to be."

Our Lord said: "With good will and with holy desire you can make good whatever you want."

7. How a Person May Always Be United with God

For a person to be constantly united with God is heavenly bliss beyond all earthly pleasure. How is this supposed to happen to us? Our longing should constantly accompany all our actions, and we should constantly examine all our actions in Christian faith and from God's point of view, and never be useless. Thus we praise God with all our works for all the works he ever performed on earth for love of us. Then we are united with him in his works on earth with celestial love. After this we shall be spiritually illumined. Then we praise our Lord God with all the gifts that he ever gave us: our body and possessions, friends and relatives, and all the earthly joy that we could desire. In so doing we thank God for all his generous gifts that he ever gave us on earth for body and soul. Then we are united with God in the love of receiving and in humble gratitude. We should thereby press all God's gifts to our heart. Then our heart becomes full of love, our senses are opened, and our soul so resplendent that we look into divine knowledge like someone who sees his own countenance in a bright mirror. Thus can we know God's will in all our actions, so that we glorify God's will and love it whether it brings suffering or comfort; and we are happy about what happens to us, except for sin. This we should weep over and hate, for it is always cursed. Thereby we on earth become united with the saints in heaven because they are the happiest of all about the will of God in heaven.

I do not know how the enemy found out when God gave me this knowledge at night and I was united in it with great joy. He came to me and spoke to me in confidence because he wanted to trick me. I heard his voice with my fleshly ears, and I saw his form with spiritual eyes-black, filthy, and like a frightening human. But I was not afraid of him. This is why: Whenever God's grace is present in the soul and occupies the senses, the body cannot be afraid in his presence. But when the body is still occupied with useless activity-if he comes then, the body suffers such pain in his presence that I have never suffered that amount of pain in my life.

Then he said to me: "I dreamed at night that I was rich and had a lot of possessions."

He wanted me to think that this holy union of God with the soul was just a dream. The housewife of the body, the soul, said inwardly: "You are not truthful."

And he said: "Yes, and I shall exist as long as God lives."

And the soul said: "You certainly are smart. Tell me, what should I do?"

The devil went too far: "You should be happy and should make a show of this great event in your demeanor."

The soul: "Unfortunately, I am not so small that I can grasp through the eye of the needle all my enemies to the heavenly gates of my everlasting land."

The devil: "You are shielded all too well."

The soul: "In your words I recognize your falseness, doubt, empty glory, and arrogance. Even if a steel wall up to the clouds were around me, my heart would still never be free and safe from my enemies."

Then he stood there and trembled before me. Oh, how full of falseness that seemed to me to be! Then he tore out his hair and sprang away angrily.

8. How a Person Seeks God

When God chooses to withdraw from someone, that person seeks our Lord God and says:

"Lord, my suffering is deeper than the abyss.
My heart's anguish extends outward wider than the world.
My fear is larger than the mountains.
My longing is higher than the stars.
Nowhere in these things can I find you."

In this distress the soul noticed her Lover near her, resembling a fair young lad, so fair that it cannot be described. And yet she would have hidden herself. Then she falls at his feet and greets his wounds. So sweet are they that she can no longer feel any of her pain or anything of her age. And she thought: "Alas, how much you would like to look upon his countenance, but then you would have to abandon his wounds. And how much you would like to hear his words and wishes." Then she arises clothed and adorned in spotless propriety.

Then he says: "Welcome, my dearest love." In the sound of the words she knew that every soul that serves God in his favor is his dearest love.

Then he said: "I must temper you as to pleasure, both yours and mine." The pleasure is beyond describing.

He said: "Receive this crown of virgins." Then the crown went from him and came onto her head. It shone as though it were of pure gold. The crown was double and was also the crown of love.

Then our Lord said: "This crown shall be displayed before the whole army of heaven."

Then she asked: "Lord, are you going to receive my soul tomorrow after I have received your holy body?"

"No," he said, "you are to become richer still in suffering."

"Lord, what should I be doing here in this convent?"

"You should illumine and teach them and should remain with them in great honor."

Then she thought: "Ah, now you are here alone with our Lord."

As she thought this, she saw two angels standing next to her. They were as worthy of respect as secular princes are in comparison to poor people. Then she said: "How can I now hide?"

They said: "We shall bring you from suffering to suffering, from virtue to virtue, from knowledge to knowledge, from love to love."

That a sinful mouth should and must say all this is difficult for me; and yet, before God and because of obedience, I dare not omit it. May I keep a human sense of shame and fear of God all my days!

9. How the Loving Soul Praises Our Lord with All Creatures

The loving soul never has enough of praising. That is why she gathers within herself in her longing everything that God ever created and then calls out to heaven: "Lord, if it were possible that all these people were as perfect and as holy as your blessed mother, Mary, that still would not be enough for wretched me for praising you fully with your only begotten Son. Lord, can one ever praise you enough? No, and that makes me happy."

To this our Lord replied: "Those virgins who have long served me shall praise me."

10. This Happened at a Time When There Was Great Turmoil

I prayed to our Lord for distress caused by war and for the many sins of the world. And our Lord answered and said: "The stink of sins nauseates me from the abyss of earth to the heavens. If it were possible, they would drive me out. Sins once did drive me out; then I came in humility and served the world until my death. Now nothing like that can ever happen again. Now because of sin I must sometimes bring my justice into play."

"Dear Lord, what then should we poor wretches do?"

Our Lord said: "You should humble yourselves under the restless hand of God almighty and fear him in all your actions. I shall yet free my people from all distress; they are my friends. Prayer in common appeases my heart. I shall show how I am disposed. I hear with pleasure the prayers of religious people who mean it from the heart": Our help is in the name of the Lord. Praise the Lord all ye nations. And the Son is glorified. The kingdom of the world. My heart leapt up. Whom I saw. Glory be to the Father and the Son."

"Lord heavenly Father, accept your service and your praise from your downcast children and free your people from this present distress and release us all from all our bonds except from the bonds of love. May they never be taken from us!"

11. How Our Lord Was Seen Looking Like a Worker

Our Lord showed me an allegory that he realized in me and still does. I saw a poor man get up from the ground. He was clothed in poor linen cloth like a worker. In his hands he had a carrying frame. On it lay a burden similar to the earth. I said: "My good man, what are you carrying?"

"I am carrying," he said, "your sufferings. Turn your will toward suffering; lift, and carry."

And the person said: "Lord, I am so poor that I do not have anything."

Our Lord said: "This is what I taught my disciples when I said: 'Blessed are the poor in spirit.'¹² This is the case when a person can do nothing but would like to—that is spiritual poverty."

The person: "Lord, if it is you, turn your face toward me so that I can recognize you."

And our Lord said: "Recognize me within."

The soul: "Lord, if I were to see you in the midst of thousands, I would easily recognize you." My heart turned me within into a guard and I did not dare dispute with him that it was he. So I said: "Dear Lord, this burden is too heavy."

And our Lord said: "I shall put it so close to me that you can carry it quite well. Follow me and see how I stood on the cross in the sight of my heavenly Father, and remain like that."

She said: "Lord, give me your blessing for it."

"I bless you without ceasing. There will be good help for your sufferings."

"Lord, help in this all those who willingly suffer torment for love of you."

12. How a Person Should Resist Vain Honor and Temptation

Whenever a person thinks well of himself, vain honor immediately leaps forth out of a corner of the human heart along with sinful desire and tries to sprawl out into the five senses. Then one should take oneself in hand and instantly beat one's breast in humble fear and bless oneself with the sign of the holy cross. Then it will immediately disappear, as if it had never existed. I in my wretchedness have often had this experience. One should do this same thing the minute evil thoughts come shooting in. They, too, disappear because of the power of the holy cross—if one is really sorry for them.

13. How Our Lord Was Seen Looking Like a Pilgrim

I, a poor unworthy person, shall disregard myself and tell what I have seen and heard in God. One night I saw our Lord standing there in the likeness of a pilgrim. He acted as if he had been trudging through all of Christendom. I fell at his feet and said: "My dear pilgrim, where are you coming from?"

He said: "I'm coming from Jerusalem." By that he meant Christianity. "And I have been driven from my shelter. The heathens do not acknowledge me, Jews do not want me, Christians attack me."

Then I prayed for Christianity. And our Lord made clear in fine detail his innocence regarding the great shame that he suffers from Christianity and explained how much good he has done for Christianity from the beginning and how he has labored for Christians and day after day still searches for ways to pour his grace into them.

Then our Lord again complained and said: "People drive me from the shelter of their heart with their selfishness, and when I find no room in them, I let them be in their selfishness. And when they die I judge them as I then find them to be."

Then I prayed for the convent: "Dear Lord, do not let them perish."

["I shall let no one perish.]" "I shall put a light in their cemetery. In it they shall know themselves."

14. God's Choosing and Blessing

Another night, while I was at prayer and filled with longing and oblivious of myself, I became aware of our Lord. He was standing in the cemetery and had the whole community before him lined up according to when they had entered the convent. And our Lord said to them: "I have chosen you. If you choose me, I shall give you something."

Then I said: "Lord, what shall you give them?"

And he said: "I shall make of them on earth shining mirrors, so that all who see them shall recognize their life in them. And in heaven I shall make them radiant mirrors, so that all who look upon them will know that I have chosen them." Then our Lord stretched forth his hand and gave them his blessing saying: "I bless you with myself. Choose me in all your thoughts."

The ones who choose our Lord in all their thoughts are those blessed who praise our Lord fittingly.

Then I said: "They are going to ask me in what form and fashion I saw you."

And he said: "There are some among them who know me."

15. How a Person Who Loves Truth Should Pray

The person who loves truth likes to pray thus: "Ah, dear Lord, grant me and help me that I always seek you in a holy manner with all my five senses in all things, for I have chosen you in preference to all lords and all sovereigns as Bridegroom of my soul. Grant me also, Lord, that I might find you with all my longing, burning or spent though it be. I desire also that I may enjoy you with the flowing love of all your gifts. Give me, Lord, abundantly of your outflowing, that it fill my heart and mind so that pain, scorn, and bitterness may ever feel pleasant to me. Grant me that it may ever turn out that way for me through your favor, generous God; now grant me this. Help me also, Lord, to keep you by giving up completely my own will according to your desire. Then I would never, ever lose that love that never ceases to burn. Amen."

16. How a Person Spoke and Prayed

For a long time a person desired more than all gifts and suffering that God release her soul with a holy end. And our Lord said: "Wait for me."

The person said: "Dear Lord, I cannot control my longing; I would so dearly like to be with you."

Our Lord said: "I longed for you before the beginning of the world. I long for you and you long for me. Where two burning desires meet, there love is perfect."

17. How Knowledge Speaks to the Conscience

Knowledge said to the conscience: "No matter how much people despise you and inflict suffering upon you, nevertheless stand pure in God."

Conscience: "Lady Knowledge, you have put it very well. To feel comfortable in all kinds of trouble a person must have a humble heart."

Knowledge: "Lady Conscience, you have such a fine mirror in which you frequently examine yourself very meticulously. This¹⁴ must indeed be the living Son of God with all his works. It cannot be that you are so wise by some other means."

Conscience: "Lady Knowledge, when I examine myself in it, I experience both pleasure and pain. Pleasure, because God comes to me as a flowing goodness; pain, because I am so feeble in good works."

Knowledge: "Lady Conscience, in all things you prefer God's will and God's glory to your own benefit for body or soul. You are hell for the devil and heaven for God. To what can one compare you?"

Conscience: "Lady Knowledge, everything I have from God was given me on loan, so that with it I might gain praise and glory for him and for my own benefit as well. For if I am to pay him back, I shall certainly need his grace."

Knowledge: "Lady Conscience, you are very much fettered by the sins of the world, and the imperfections of religious people cause you much heartache. They have freedom of choice to go to heaven or to hell or to a long stay in purgatory. That is a heavy burden for you."

Conscience: "Lady Knowledge, I do not complain because I am met with dislike or because I have days of suffering. Rather, I feel sorrow for the sins of the world just as I do for my own. Suffering cleanses the body of sin and sanctifies the soul in God. This is why we joyfully stand ready for its command."

Knowledge: "Lady Conscience, the well-intentioned high and mighty in the world offer up to God their possessions and their alms. Religious people offer their flesh and blood in his service, offering up to God, above all things, their own will in obedience. That weighs more, that has greater value."

Conscience: "Lady Knowledge, that is not enough. If we want to enjoy God in the heights, we must have the crown of humility and pure chastity, from birth or chosen later, and the pinnacle of love before all else."

This same delightful garment is worn by the Holy Trinity: the Father-the pinnacle of love; the Son-pure, humble chastity that he imparted to all his chosen ones; the Holy Spirit-on fire with love for us in all our good actions in true humility.

Knowledge: "Lady Conscience, steadfastness in good things: that is a love that toils. One cannot do without it if one wants to possess with God the highest honor, both here and in his eternal realm. Happy the person who here strives for it."

18. Suggestions for the Seven Hours¹⁵ for Honoring the Passion of Our Lord

At matins:"

O great dew of the noble Godhead,
O tender blossom of the sweet maiden,
O beneficial fruit of the beautiful flowers,
O holy sacrifice of the heavenly Father,
O faithful pledge of redemption for the whole world, Lord Jesus Christ!
Receive your holy morning service as praise and honor
For your birth in exile, your lonely distress,
Your extreme suffering, your holy death,
Your glorious resurrection, your splendid ascension,
Your almighty glory as praise and honor.

Remember, dear Lord, that I must carry out your holy will to a good end in all I do and leave undone in my whole life to honor your Holy Trinity and for all those who are with me and in your name are your friends and mine.

At prime:

O wretched shame, O dreadful pain that killed your glorious body and sweet heart. Help me, dear Lord, that I can and shall make the best of being despised and of all my interior suffering in your love, as it may please you in your eternal glory.

At terce:

O heavy burden, O wretched weight that you carried for us, Lord, under your cross! Carry us, Lord, through all our distress into eternal life.

At sext:

O bloody agony, O wounds so deep,
O pain so great.
Let me, Lord, not perish
In all my painful anguish. Amen.

At none:

O most blessed anguish, O most holy death,
O most delightful mirror of the heavenly Father,
Jesus Christ, fastened high on the cross by hand and foot!

I commend to you, Lord, my soul at my final end, that I may unceasingly and forever more be united with you just as your heavenly Father was and is. Grant this to me and to all who love you faithfully.

At vespers:

O bound flowing of love,
O faithful outpouring of the heart,
O glorious body that was killed there for my sake,
Dearest Lord Jesus Christ!

I beseech you that my five senses may and shall constantly rejoice in the bloody lance and in the wound of your heart, and that my lonely soul shall eternally rejoice therein, along with those for whom I shall and want to pray according to Christian practice. Amen.

At compline:

O holy depths of all humility,
O generous breadth of all gifts,
O glorious heights of all love,
In which you, Jesus Christ, pray to your heavenly Father!

Fulfill now, Lord, your prayers in us and sanctify us in truth, and give us the depths of all humility in which we may bow low beneath all creatures, since creatures resist someone who does not do as we do. Grant us, Lord, the breadth of all generosity, and that we, for love of you, fulfill willingly the rule of our order; and give us, Lord, the heights of your love that it may preserve us pure in you and uncorrupted by all earthly things. Amen.

19. The Greeting of Our Lady

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the everlasting joy of the Holy Trinity.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the beginning of all our happiness.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the companion of the holy angels here and in God's kingdom.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the flower of the patriarchs.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the hope of the prophets.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the white lily of humble virgins.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, remember how the greeting came to you from Gabriel's mouth and welcome my soul in my final hour, and bring me with joy unspoiled out of this land of exile into the richly joyous land of your dear Child where I may find rest.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the wisdom that taught the apostles.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the rose of the martyrs.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the protection of the confessors.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the helper of all widows.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the glory of all the saints of your dear Child. Pray for me, that I might be sanctified with them with all my works as far as it is possible for a lowly person like me, Mary, dear Empress.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the refuge of sinners.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the mighty helper of those in despair.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the consoler of all Holy Christianity.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the terror of all evil spirits, for they took flight from you. Drive them from me, dear Lady, that they never, ever find joy because of me, and may I ever be constant in your service.

20. How One Should Pray the Ave Maria to Our Lady

Hail, celestial Empress, Mother of God and the dear love of my heart. Receive, lady, your Ave Maria today as praise and honor for the blissful sight of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, which is wonderfully unconcealed and opened to the virginal maternal countenance, filled with all happiness. Ali, lady, remember all my longings and all my prayers, all my torments and all my distress and all my interior suffering, my honor, my soul, and my final end, when I leave this deplorable exile. I commend all of this ever and again to your motherly faithfulness and your maidenly honor and your womanly goodness and, in addition, I commend all those with me who are my friends and yours in the name of God almighty, my dearest Lady, Mary, noble Empress!

21. How One Should Examine One's Heart Before Going to God's Tablet'

You" want to have instruction from me, but I myself am uneducated. What you are searching for you can find a thousand times better in your books.

Whenever I, in my unworthiness, am about to go up and receive the body of our Lord, I examine the countenance of my soul in the mirror of my sins. There I see myself as I lived, as I am now living, and as I shall live in the future. In this mirror of my sins I see nothing but alas and woe. Then I cast my face to the ground and weep plaintively, if I can, because eternal incomprehensible God is so kind that he wants to bow down to the filthy puddle of my heart. Then I call to mind that injustice it would be fairer if one were to drag my body to the gallows, like a thief who had stolen from his rightful lord the precious treasure of purity, which God gave me in holy baptism.

As long as we live,
We shall ruefully lament
That we have darkened ourselves.
For this, Lord, may you forgive us like a father.

If a person did not confess a sin and has no intention of confessing it, he should not receive God's body.

Now I shall approach true hope
And shall thank God
That I was ever noticed,
That it can actually happen to a wretched person like me
That I may receive the body of God.
Now I shall joyfully go to God's table
And I shall receive that same bloody Lamb
That willed to be on the cross,
Bloody, with his holy five wounds untended.
Fortunate for us that this ever happened.
In his holy passion I shall endure all my troubles.
We go joyfully, then, and with hearts filled with love
And with our souls open, and receive our Beloved,
The most Beloved of our hearts,

And lay him down in our soul
As in a cozy cradle,
And sing his praise and honor
For that first hardship that he wished to endure
When he lay in the crib.
Then we bow down with our soul and our five senses
And thank our dear One and speak thus:
"Lord, I thank you for you.
I ask you now whether you might give me your jewels,
That I might live pure,
Free from all sin.
Lord, where shall I then put you?

I shall give you what I have.
I shall put you in my little bed.
This little bed is made completely of suffering.
When I ponder your suffering,
I forget about mine.
Lord, you shall lay my cheek down for me.
The pillow for my cheek is the pain I feel within
That I am not always ready
To receive your gifts of suffering.
That, Lord, is my whole lament.
The bed's blanket is my longing

That binds me.
Now if, Lord, you wish to soothe me,
Then do my will
And give me those sinners
Who are in the state of mortal sin.
Then you will bring joy to my soul.
Lord, what then do we want to say about love
As we are lying here so close together
In the bed of my suffering?
I have received you, Lord,
As you were when you arose from the dead.
Dear One to my heart, now console me
That I might remain pure with you always.

Great happiness shall follow.
Give me, Lord, the guilty souls from purgatory,
Though I do not have enough to pay the ransom.
I have just received you, Lord,
As you were when you ascended to heaven.
Now, Dearest, you should not be too easy on me.
I would like one day to die of love.
Lord, you can satisfy me no other way.
Give me, Lord, and take from me, Lord,
Everything you want,
And leave me just this wish—
That I might die of love in love. Amen.”

22. Praise of the Heavenly Father

It is well for me that I praise you, God, all ways for your noble goodness, that you have chosen me for your holy service. Sanctify my heart and mind, that I might receive all your gifts with holy inwardness and might remain with you in joy.

23. How One Should Thank the Son

It is well for me to thank you, imperial Son of God. I shall thank you always that you took me, in the world, out of the world. Your holy pain that you suffered for my sake is mine. All that I ever suffer I want to give to you in return. Even though this is an unequal bargain, it nevertheless makes my soul free. Keep me always in your favor, so that you may be praised forever. Jesus, my dearly Beloved, loosen my bonds; let me remain with you.

24. The Flood of Love

It is well for me to thank you, Holy Spirit. It is my belief that you are one Person of the Holy Trinity. Your sweet loving spring waters erase all the suffering of my heart, for they come forth softly out of the Holy Trinity. I beg you, Lord Holy Spirit, to protect me from all malice of the evil spirits with your divine love, so that they not find in me what they are seeking.

25. The Greeting for the Holy Trinity

I, lacking all virtues; I, fragile in my being; if I dare or can, then I shall greet the sublimity, the splendor, the bliss, the wisdom, the nobility, and the wondrous oneness of the Holy Trinity. Out of it has flowed forth immaculate all that was, that is, that ever shall be. There I must one day enter again. How shall that happen? I must crawl back, for I am sinful. I must make amends with good works. I must hurry with faithful diligence. I must fly with the feathers of doves-these are virtues and goodness and a holy frame of mind. I must soar in all things above myself. When I am utterly spent, then I shall enter. How I shall then be received-never has a human eye beheld such a sight; never has a human ear heard it; never could a human tongue describe it.¹⁹ Glory to you, Trinity!²⁰

26. How One Should Entreat God in Temptation

Lord Jesus Christ, I, a poor human being, implore you and desire your help, for my enemies are hunting me down. Lord God, I appeal to you, for they want to drive me from you. Lord, almighty Son of God, drive them away from me. Do not deliver me into their power, and keep me pure in you, for you have redeemed me with your suffering. Be now my help and my consolation. Lord, let me not perish, for you willingly died for my sake. Lord Jesus Christ, I seek your help. Awaken my soul from the sleep of my lethargy and illumine my senses from the darkness of my flesh. Accompany me as I travel all my paths to you, as far as is humanly possible, without sin; for your eyes see my failings.

Mary, Mother of God, heavenly Empress!

May you be my helper in this,

For I am, alas, a sinner.

May I find favor

With your dear Child.

Mother of all chastity.

I lament all my interior suffering to you.

Hail Queen!²¹

27. How a Religious Person Should Turn His Heart Away from the World

When a person in religious life sees his relatives and dearest friends fashionably dressed and decked out, he indeed needs to be armed with the Holy Spirit so that he not entertain the thought: you could have had such a life. From such a thought his heart becomes so dark and his mind so unreceptive to God and his mouth so sluggish for holy prayer and his soul so completely alienated from God that inwardly he resembles his relatives much more than he does a person in religious life.

If he wants to stand pure with God,

He must take up the struggle.

For his conscience is then clouded,

This beacon of the Holy Spirit.

For the conscience does not shine

Without the light of the Holy Spirit.

But when the beacon has been brightly lit,

Then is its splendor well recognized.

So it is, too, with a religious person

For whose heart the baubles of the world are a terror.

He preserves well his beacon unextinguished.

But if his heart is open to the world,

His beacon shatters

And the bitter north wind of craving the life of our kinfolk comes,

And they claim they are unaffected by the swamp

In which, alas, they are indeed sinking

And drowning in sin.

Thus is our beacon extinguished,

And yet we have nothing from worldly things.

After this comes the south wind,

The fraudulent allurements of the world,

That appear so beautiful
Yet contain much bitter suffering.
If this is what pleases us,
Eternal loss is ours.
We must indeed preserve ourselves,
For there is no sin so small
That it does not leave its eternal mark on the soul.
Why is this so?
Never was a sin repented so completely
That it would not have been better left undone.
And so we should be in constant fear

If we want to stand pure with God.
What we have given to God,
We can never take back without serious harm to ourselves;
For we were given to him in a fair deal.
The fish in water sees with great appetite the dead red bait
With which one wants to catch it.
But it does not see the hook.
So it is with the poison of the world.
She²⁹ does not reveal its danger.

If you really want to reform,
Then look to your Bridegroom,
Lord of the whole world.
How fair he stood there
Richly clothed in bloody red,
Blackened, battered with scourges,
Bound to the pillar.
There he received many piercing wounds for love of you.

Take this to heart
And you will be able to escape the deceits of the world.
If you would follow further with your holy thoughts,
Then look up and behold
How he stood there on the cross
Raised up on high before the eyes of the world,
Blood running down over him.
These garments shall be the darlings of your heart,
His kingly eyes brimming over with tears,
His sweet heart flooded with love.
Now harken to the voice
That teaches you of God's love:

How the henchmen's hammers pounded
And pierced through his hands and feet on the cross.
Remember, too, the wound of the lance
That went through his side to the center of his heart,
And lament to him all your sins.
Thus shall you gain knowledge of God.
Look at the piercing crown
That he wore upon his head.
Kiss him before all else.
He gives you richly all delights.
Thank him for wishing to die out of his great love for you,
And let no one deceive you.
Then you can be a queen of his realm forever.
If this is what you choose,
You shall in joy overcome the sufferings of the whole world.

28. The Misfortunes of War

I was commanded with a holy seriousness to pray for the troubles now going on in Saxony and Thuringia." When I set about doing this with prayers of praise and petition, our dear Lord did not receive me and remained gravely silent. I had to endure this in loving patience for seventeen days. Then I said to our dear Lord: "O dear Lord, when is the fortunate hour to come that you want and that I must pray for because of this distress?"

Our Lord then revealed himself to me and said:

"The bliss-filled dawn,
Rich in hues,
Is the poor people
Who are now enduring many kinds of misfortune.
After this the eternal sun of everlasting light
Shall rise for them,
Which after this trial shall shine upon them in eternal joy.
They shall be made holy thereby and as bright as the dazzling sun
As it rises in mid-morning and reaches its zenith.

Some are in the army out of need and fear. These I shall let be taken prisoner and die, so that they can come to me. Those who are the causes of the war are more horrible in themselves and more fierce in their deeds than if they dared to attack the images in my churches."

Then I saw that eternal death followed those common foot soldiers who robbed and pillaged on the streets. If there were no war, they would be thieves and charlatans. But, as always, the bad people are making the blessed good. Thus must God show his love through suffering. He can win them no other way. Thus did God explain to me the advantages,²⁴ and I know not when or where it shall finally end.

I know this for certain: that I shall gladden the hearts of God's friends. I know this for certain: that no matter what the friends of God suffer, God never forgets them, for he is their help and their consolation in all their troubles. We should fight on accordingly, and suffer willingly in joy. Then we shall sparkle and shine in the sight of God.

29. A Teaching

If you want to turn your heart completely to God,
You should hold onto three things as a teaching:
Fearful in the face of sin,
Well-intentioned as to all virtues,
Constant in all good things.
Then shall you bring your life to a good end.
If you make yourself act thus,

You can indeed accomplish it with God's help.
Pray to God for this constantly
And you shall bear all your troubles lightly.
Confess purely and serve God diligently
And you shall be rich in joy.

30. A Prayer When Virgins Receive Their Crown

Receive, Lord, your brides, and approach them with the lilies of pure chastity all their days.

Receive, Lord, your brides, and approach them with the roses of diligent work for a good end.

Receive, Lord, your brides, and approach them with the violets of profound humility and lead them to your bridal bed and, united inseparably with them, embrace them with all love forever. Amen.

31. A Lament

This is the lament of the loving soul,
The only one she cannot bear.
She must tell it to the friends of God
So that they may find love more enjoyable:
“Lovesick and weak in body,
The trials of suffering and the harshness of force,

This is what makes the way
To my dear Lord too long for me.
Lover, how can I do without you for so long?
Indeed, I am, alas, far too distant from you!
Lord, if you will not receive my complaint,
I must again take up my sorrowing
And wait and suffer both inwardly and outwardly.
You know full well, dear Lord,
How much I want to be with you.”

Our Lord:

“When I come, I come in magnificence.
Never was there anguish so great
That I could not heal it completely.

You must continue to wait.
I want to prepare you better
Before I bring you to my Father,
So that you please us all the more.
I still hear your plaint of love with pleasure.”

Whenever our human understanding grows dark,
With the lament in our heart we awaken divine love.

32. How the Works of a Good Person Shine Forth in Relation to the Works of Our Lord

How the works of a good person shall light up and shine in heavenly honor these words make evident:

To the degree that we have been innocent here, God's holy innocence shall light up and shine into our holy innocence.

To the degree that we perform good works here, God's holy toil shall light up and shine into our holy toil.

To the degree that we possess inwardness here in intimacy with God, God's holy intimacy shall richly light up and send sparks into our holy inwardness.

To the degree that we accept our suffering with gratitude here and bear it with patience, God's holy suffering shall light up and shine into our suffering.

To the degree that we have diligently practiced all virtues here, God's holy virtue shall light up and shine into our virtue with much glory. May this last forevermore.

To the degree that we here burn in love and shine in a holy life, God's love shall burn in our soul and our body unceasingly forever, and never be extinguished.

These counter-illuminations light up and shine forth from the eternal Godhead. We receive these good works from God's holy humanity and perform them through the power of the Holy Spirit. Thus do our works and our life return to the Holy Trinity. Then it becomes manifest how we are doing here. To the degree that we lead a holy life in divine love here, we shall blissfully soar there in the heights, and to that degree shall the power of love be given us there as a reward, that we receive the power to carry out our whole will, that we are known by the saints as we have been. Thereby shall we be their companions! Amen.

33. A Spiritual Potion

I am sick: I thirst longingly for the health potion that Jesus Christ himself drank. When he, God and man, came into the crib, the potion was ready at hand. He drank so much of it that he became so drunk with the fire of love that with all virtues he endured for us all his intense sufferings. He always bestowed virtue; his goodness never faltered. I long for a health potion. This potion is suffering for love of God.

Suffering is bitter. And so we grind up a spice called "willingly suffer." A second spice is called "patience in suffering." It is also bitter. And so to counter it we grind up another spice called "holy intimacy," which turns patience sweet, as well as all our hard work. A third spice is "to persevere long in suffering," waiting for our eternal life and salvation. This is also very bitter. And so to counter this we grind up a spice called "with joy unflagging."²⁵

Ah, dear Lord, if you would give me this potion, I could live unflagging in suffering with joy. Then I would for a time forgo heaven. So intense is my longing for it. Lord, may you give this potion according to your very dear will, to me and to all those who desire it for love of you.

34. Spiritual Food

After a bitter potion one is certainly in need of tasty food. Rising desire and sinking humility and flowing love-these three maidens bring the soul up to heaven before God. And then she becomes aware of her Lover. She says: "Lord, I make my complaint to you that you are under attack by what is dearest to you on earth; namely, by Christians. Lord, I make my complaint to you that your friends are so seriously hampered by your enemies."

Our Lord: "If they have true goodness, they can transform all that they encounter, except for sin, in a marvelous manner into a valuable dissemination of the word of God." That is why suffering shouts the loudest of all ways of serving God: "Depart from me, for it is better for a person to be unconsolated in accordance with God's will than to be consoled in accordance with his own will." God's will is pure; our will is very much contaminated by the flesh. All who inwardly love intensely become outwardly calm, for all outward effort hampers the inward spirit. What the spirit then sings inwardly transcends every earthly voice.

Patience sings most sweetly of all above the angelic choirs, for angels have no patience since they experience no pain. We have this from the humanity of our Lord, but all honor as well by which we are honored by God on earth and shall also be elevated in heaven. Through the noble struggle of our Lord and through his holy suffering our Christian struggle and our suffering, accepted in good spirit, are ennobled and made holy in the same way that all waters have been made holy from the River Jordan, in which our dear Lord was baptized.

Ah, dear Lord, help us that our holy desire may never rest and our sinking humility may never rear up in arrogance. May the flowing fire of the holy love of God be here our purgatory, where all our sins shall be devoured.

35. The Seven Psalms

Dear Lord Jesus Christ, I recite these holy seven psalms²⁶ in praise and honor of all your holy suffering in which you wanted to die on the holy cross for my sake. Dearly Beloved, I ask you, when the time comes for you to carry out your command regarding me—that I am to die—may you then come to me as a trustworthy physician to his child; and give me then, Lord, a holy sickness in which I may prepare myself with the proper attitude and with true Christian faith. "Lord, rebuke me not in thy anger."²⁷

I ask, dearest Lord, that you come to me as my very dearest friend in my distress, and bring me then, Lord, such sincere sorrow that all my sins shall be blotted out, so that they shall not sadden me after this life. "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven."²⁸

I ask, dearest Lord, that you come as a trustworthy father confessor to his dear friend, and bring me then the true light, the gift of your Holy Spirit, that I might see and know myself in it, and lament all my sins from the heart with such holy hope that my mouth not become bound by all my sins and that I be found pure. And give me then, Lord, your very own body, that I may receive you, Dearest One, with as much love as ever a human heart can. May you remain sustenance for the journey of my lonely soul, so that I, Dearest One, remain your beloved companion with you for life eternal. Amen. "Lord, rebuke me not in thy anger."²⁹

I ask you, dear Lord, to come to me as a faithful brother to his dear sister, and bring me holy armor with which my soul may prepare herself, so that my enemies cannot harm me when they shall accuse me. May they feel shame for all their efforts directed against me. "Have mercy on me, O God."³⁰

I ask you, Lord, to come to me as a trusted father to his dear child, and watch over my end. When my sinful mouth can no longer speak, then speak to my soul inwardly that you might console her and protect her forever, so that I might feel joy and not sadness. For this I beg you, Lord, through your abundant goodness. Amen. "Hear my prayer, O Lord; let my cry come to thee!"³¹

I ask you, Lord, to send me your virgin mother. I cannot do without her. May she then fulfill what I have long desired and defend my poor soul from all her enemies. "Out of the depths I cry to thee, O Lord!"³²

I ask you, dear youthful Jesus, Child of the pure maiden, to come as my dearest bridegroom and make me rich, as is the custom for noble bridegrooms when they give their brides a handsome morning gift," and receive me on the arm of your love and cover me with the mantle of your long-cherished desire. Blessed am I forevermore when I am then released! If we were to think of this hour often, all our pride would sink to the ground, as he shall then reveal his glorious countenance to us. Then my soul shall have its favorite pastime. What I now painfully long for can never happen on earth as I wish it. "Hear my prayer, O Lord, give ear to my supplications."³³

36. A Spiritual Convenf⁵

I begged God to let me know, if it were his will, that I might stop writing. Why? Because I know that I am just as weak and unworthy, and more so, than I was thirty years ago when I was required to begin. Then our Lord showed me a little sack in his hand and said: "I still have healing herbs."

And I said: "Lord, I don't know these herbs at all."

He said: "You shall well recognize them when you see them. With them one shall refresh the sick, strengthen the healthy, awaken the dead, and sanctify the good."

After this I saw a spiritual convent that was constructed of virtues.

The abbess is sincere love
Who has much holy understanding
With which she diligently preserves the community in body and soul,
All for the glory of God.
She gives them many a holy teaching—
Whatever God's will is.
Thereby she frees her own soul.

The lady chaplain of love is divine humility.
She is always subordinate to love.
Then pride must depart.

The prioress is the holy peace of God.
To her good will is given patience
To instruct the community in divine wisdom.
To whatever things she gives her attention
It is always done for God's glory.

The subprioress is amiability.
She it is who gathers up faults and disposes of them with kindness.
Whenever one does something wrong,

One should not carry it around inside for a long time.
Thus does God increase a person's goodness.

The chapter should have four things about it³⁶:
Manifestation of holiness that is rooted in God's service.
Its calming efforts hurt the enemy and honor God.
This is cause for it to rejoice much.
It should guard against empty honor
And should be a help to honor for others.
If they serve diligently,
God shall reward them accordingly.

The choir mistress is hope.
She fills one with holy humble devotion
So that the impotence of the heart rings in song so beautifully before God
That God loves the notes
That sing in the heart.
Whoever sings along with her
Shall share her success
In celestial love.

The schoolmistress is wisdom
Who sedulously teaches the unlearned with even temper.
For this she shall be honored before good people.
That someone enjoys zealously teaching the helpless poor
Brings the convent holiness and honor.

The mistress of the cellar is an outflowing of helpful gifts.
Because she does this in divine joy
She gains from divine grace a holy heart and mind.
All who ask anything of her
Should be ever disciplined, frugal, and uncomplaining.
Then God's sweet gift shall flow into their hearts.
Those who are her helpers
Shall gain God's sweet gifts, just as she.

The mistress of the chamber is generosity
Who always enjoys doing good in measured amounts.
She gives what she has kindly.
For this she shall receive from God a special gift.

Those to whom she gives something thank God with holy fervor.
He finds his dwelling place in her heart,
As does a noble drink in a spotless cask.

The mistress of the sick is toiling mercy
Which ever hungers to be untiringly at the service of the sick
With help and with cleanliness,
With balsam and with good cheer,
With solace and with friendliness.
God gives her recompense,
That she might ever serve gladly.
Whoever sends her help
Shall be treated the same way by God.

The portress is watchfulness
That always accomplishes with a holy will Whatever is demanded of her.
Thus her efforts are not lost,
And she comes to God well prepared.
Whenever she wishes to pray,
God is with her in holy peace
To soothe the sufferings of her heart.
When she sometimes falls into difficulty,
Holy obedience, whom she joyfully serves,
Smooths it all over.

The mistress of discipline is holy custom.
It shall always burn like a candle
Inextinguishable in heavenly freedom.
Thus we easily endure all our interior sufferings
Until we achieve a holy end.

The provost is divine obedience, not sinful obedience.
To him all virtues are subordinate.

Thus can the convent thrive in God.
Whoever enters this convent
Shall ever live in divine joy
Here and eternally.
Blessed are they who persevere in it!

37. The Eternal Feast of the Holy Trinity

Whoever in sincere love wishes to prepare himself for the eternal feast of the Holy Trinity has to begin it here. He should obey and serve the heavenly Father constantly in all things with holy fear and humble humility. He should obey and serve his Son in suffering and in patience, with voluntary poverty in holy toil. He should obey and serve the Holy Spirit in holy hope beyond all fear with a joyful heart and an ever-gentle disposition. Then one shall taste his goodness.

Pure loving virgins shall, moreover, follow the noble Youth, Jesus Christ, Child of the pure maiden, who is utterly filled with love, as he was at age eighteen. His Person is the most beloved of the virgins, and he is the most handsome of all. They follow him with bliss-filled tenderness into the blossoming meadow of their pure conscience. There the Youth breaks for them the flower of all virtues from which they fashion garlands that they shall wear to the eternal celebration.

When the fine meal has been enjoyed, which Jesus Christ himself shall serve, one shall look on at the most sublime dance of praise. Their soul and body shall wear the garland of their virtues which they have practiced here with great holy devotion. And they shall follow the Lamb in untold bliss; from bliss to love, from love to joy, from joy to splendor, from splendor to power, from power to the highest heights before the eyes of the heavenly Father.

This is how he greets his only begotten Son and also his many pure brides who have accompanied him: "Ah, dear Son. What you are, I am. What they are fills me with joy.³⁵ My dear brides, be joyful forever, rejoice in my eternal purity; let all pain and all suffering softly disappear. My holy angels shall serve you; my saints shall honor you; the mother of my Son's humanity shall be ready with praise for you because you are like her. Rejoice, dear brides, my Son shall embrace you warmly; my Godhead shall permeate you totally; my Holy Spirit shall lead you evermore, all according to your wish, to a delightful feast for your eyes. Could your success ever be greater? I myself shall love you. Those who are not pure virgins shall share and observe and enjoy this feast as far as possible."

After hearing and seeing this with the eyes of my soul in a short time, I was human dust and ashes as I had been before.

38. How a Person in Religious Life Should Daily Lament and Confess His Sins to God

I, a sinful human being, lament and confess to God all the sins of which I am guilty in God's eyes. I confess and lament all the good works that I did not perform. I confess and lament those sins I committed when I did not know what sin was.³⁹ I confess and lament those much worse sins I committed knowingly and maliciously and actively and out of vanity.

Have mercy on me, O Lord, for I am truly sorry for them; and give me, Lord, complete certainty that you have forgiven me for all of them. Otherwise, I can find no joy in living. Jesus, dearest Lover of mine, let me approach you in true sorrow and with deep love for you in my heart, and never let me grow cold, so that I constantly feel your intense love in my heart and in my soul and in my five senses and in all my members. Then I can never grow cold.

39. How the Devil Rages and Chases About, Bites, and Gnaws When a Loving Soul That Burns with Divine Love Departs This World

Blessed is the good person that he was ever born who follows God with all the virtues he can possibly attain. His soul will be free in love. At the end of life the holy angels come and receive the pure souls with immeasurable love into the bliss of heaven and lead them off from here and bring them with great praise to God.

The enemies from hell who came there⁴⁰ will find all their efforts in vain. They had come there filled with hate and rage. When they then realized that they were not going to get their way at all, how they did rage about and chase around! How they did gnash and gnaw! How they did howl and whine! For they feared the horrible torments that they were going to receive from their masters because they had lost the soul. Thus do they curse at each other:

"You wretch, it was your fault."

"Shut up, mate. I never caught her in great impatience. When I assailed her with evil thoughts, sorrow was always her companion."

"That whispering to her confessors robs us of all our glory. There were a lot more like us to whom she was dearly entrusted. How can we now show up back at court?"

"Woe, master, what were you trying to prove by assigning this person to us? We couldn't discover any big sin in her."

"I often tempted her severely, and then she would start bawling. Me and my mates, we couldn't bring her down. With her weeping she drove me off. With her sighing she singed my hair and burned my claws. I just could never get near her."

"Her obedience was so great; never was it ever equaled. That is how she escaped us fair and square. This was our greatest disadvantage: All her good works burned inside with divine love, for she performed all her good works with good intentions."

And their master says: "Gentlemen, you have come here to court heavily incriminated. I entrusted her to you. The pain I shall impose upon you shall last forever. You shall not spend time among humans, as I would gladly do if I were granted the honor. But now you shall lie with me here in hell. That shall be your punishment. I shall send forth learned scholars to blind the understanding of good people. If we could destroy the great zeal they have for God, we would recover all our honor, the young would follow them, and our tribe would be increased. If only one soul could belong to me that so brightly burns with love of God, I would wear her as a crown and would reward myself for my tenacious efforts. Thus would I have pleasant recompense for my grief."

"Forget your presumptuous wishes." You desire something that you have never gotten and never will, come evil or torment. All the blessed Christians who love God in their interior suffering are so flooded with and immersed in love that they radiate holy virtues and are aflame with love in all their works. You well know it profits you not one whit that you tempt them so severely. They simply wait until it turns into an occasion for praising God. No matter how much you plot trickery against them, they are always ready with praise."

The growling and shrieking, the biting and gnashing he did in his bonds are beyond description."

Lord God, we thank you; give us a holy end. This is one of the greatest joys that the blessed soul has, that she sees and knows that the enemies who have caused her so much pain fight among themselves and suffer their punishments in hell. In spite of it all, she has joyfully escaped them and shall wear the eternal crown because of the torment they inflicted on her.

40. Thus Does the Loving Soul Speak to Her Dear Lord

If all the world were mine,
And if it were pure gold,
And if I were to be here eternally, as I wished,
The noblest, fairest, and richest empress,
That would ever be worthless to me,
So great is my joy in seeing Jesus Christ, my dear Lord,
In his glory in heaven!
Consider what they suffer who must wait for him so long.⁴³

41. How a Dominican Father Was Seen

Forty years agone I knew a religious man. In those days religious people were without duplicity and aflame with love. He progressed in the spiritual life and in piety and clearly performed much holy work for our Lord. He has now departed from here. I prayed to our Lord for his soul, as Christians do, that God might forgive him if he were guilty of anything. Then I saw, first of all, a radiance. God had prepared it for him. But I did not see him in it and this saddened my soul.

Some time later, when I was again praying for him, I discovered him in a fiery cloud. He was asking that he be forgiven. So I spoke with all my might to our dear Lord: "Ah, dear Lord, grant me this, that I might repay evil with good."

Then he drew himself up in the cloud and said: "O Lord, how strong is your power, how right is your truth!"

And I said: "Well then, how are you doing now?"

He said: "You can see for yourself how I am doing."

"Why are you suffering these torments?"

The soul: "Those who falsely appeared to be holy made accusations to me against innocent people. I judged them accordingly and had a sinful opinion of them. That is why I suffer these torments. Ah, if I could still sigh!"⁴⁵

I was unable to help him in this matter. He had also harmed me a bit.

A third time I again prayed for him. Then he ascended in bliss. Our dear Lord went to meet him and said to him: "That your path after your death has been so long and so difficult is the result of malicious people. You followed me in a holy manner and served me loyally. You shall wear the crown of virgins, the crown of justice, and the crown of truth."

Then he ascended in radiance above eight choirs and touched the ninth. Then I saw him no longer. Had false liars not influenced him, he would have entered into eternal joy with no suffering. That he trusted them was his undoing.

42. The Drink of Honey

Lord God, bless your precious treasure with a holy end and open it so that it might be a cause for praising you in heaven and on earth.

And a voice said:

"You shall keep your drink of honey.
It lies hidden in a safe place.
I shall open it
So that many might enjoy it."

43. Of Simple Love, How Wisdom Is Seen

Those who wish to know but have little love
Remain forever at the beginning of a good life.

And so we must ever be in constant fear
How we are pleasing God in it.
Those who simply love and know very little
Are opened to great things.
Holy simplicity is the physician of all wisdom.
It causes the wise man to see himself for the foolish person he is.
When simplicity of heart dwells in the wisdom of the mind,
Much holiness results in a person's soul.

44. Five Sins and Five Virtues

Covetousness in poverty,
Falsity in truth,
Slowness to show mercy,
Sneering ridicule in public,
Neglect of order:
These five failings seriously infect the spiritual life.

Truth free of duplicity,
Manifest mutual love,
Fear in speech,
Hidden love for God in one's heart,
Open zeal for all good things:
These five things keep the spiritual life healthy.

45. Seven Things, Five of Which One Finds in Heaven and Two on Earth"

Seven things I must say to God's honor: "Lord God, if it is possible, grant that I never forget them on earth." Five are found in heaven; two must remain here.

The first is: harm that is my fault because I have sinned and neglected to perform good works I could easily have done.

The second is: that I, Lord, wait for you with constancy, no matter when you want to come to me and in whatever manner you ordain a holy end for me.

The third: the fiery longing that I have for you.

The fourth: the burning love unextinguished in me that you cause.

The fifth: the first look of your sublime countenance upon me. Alas, that I was never able to experience this on earth as I desired. This is why my soul often sings, "Woe."

The sixth I scarcely dare to mention.
I might be struck dumb in mentioning it.
I never heard it named on earth.
This is the playful flood of love
That flows mysteriously from God into the soul
And through his power flows back again according to her ability.
What bliss there is then between them!
No one else knows
What activity goes on between them.⁴⁷
For each finds its part.
Whatever one has given out here
Will all be given back there.
This is God's heavenly love
That begins here so delicately
And goes on there boundlessly.

The seventh can hardly be touched with words.
One can sense it through Christian faith:
How great it is, how lofty, how vast, how blissful,
How glorious, how joyous,
How full of unending joys.⁴⁸
Blessed is he who shall dwell there forever.
The happy sight full of all pleasure
And the holy enjoyment of one's wishes,
They are of many kinds
And go on endlessly without number,
Glorious yet measured.
For they spring forth from the living God.
The deliciously sweet desire,
Blissful, ravenous, full of love,
Flows ever forth lavishly from God.
And yet the soul keeps her sweet hunger
And lives on without care.

46. How the Soul Presents Herself in Spiritual Poverty

Here the soul presented herself in spiritual poverty and in eternal love to God and in restless longing to go to God. Thus does she speak: "The long waiting is coming to an end. In the future God and the soul shall be united, unseparated forever. Whenever I think about it, my heart feels intense joy. Ah, dear Lord, how still you have become. I thank you evermore that you have been avoiding me for so long a time. And so may you be praised eternally that your will is done and not mine. And now today I shall find consolation in your words that I heard in Christian faith, when you say: 'I love those who love me. We want to come to them, my Father and I, and want to make a dwelling place with them. '49 Blessed am I, dear Lord, because of your generous goodness, which makes you hold back nothing."

Then our Lord said: "When the time of redemption comes, when I shall give you heavenly gifts, then I shall act very quickly because my eternity is contained therein. I shall unfold and raise it high above the bloody earth. I can think of nothing I would like more."

Eternal love of God dwells in the soul. Transitory love of earthly things dwells in the flesh. The five senses have the power to determine which way they turn.

47. One Sin That Is Evil Beyond All Sins

I heard tell of a sin. I thank God that I never had anything to do with it. It seems to me, and is, evil beyond all sins. This is total unbelief. It enrages me in my whole soul and in my whole body and in all my five senses and in my whole heart. I thank Jesus Christ, the living Son of God, that it has never entered my heart. This sin did not arise among Christians. The arrogant fiend has duped simple people with it. They claim to be so holy that they shall enter into the eternal Godhead and rest next to the eternal holy humanity of our Lord Jesus Christ. Though they think they are in a sublime state, they have really delivered themselves over to being eternally cursed; and yet they claim to be the holiest. They scoff at God's words written about the humanity of our Lord.

You, most needy of all humans, if you really had knowledge of the eternal Godhead, it would be impossible for you not to know the eternal humanity as well that hovers in the eternal Godhead. You would have to know the Holy Spirit as well, who illumines the heart of a Christian there and whose fragrance in the soul surpasses all sweetness and who instructs one's mind better than any learned professor, so that one then says in humility that one cannot be perfect in the sight of God.⁵⁰

48. How Love Was Seen with Her Maidens

In the night I spoke thus to our Lord: "Lord, I dwell in a land called exile, which is this world. For nothing in it can console me or cheer me except suffering."" In this place I have a house. It is called full of pain. This is the house where my soul lies captive: my body. This house is old, small, and dark. One should take this in a spiritual sense.

In this house I have a bed called restlessness, for everything not connected with God causes me pain. In front of the bed I have a chair called discomfort. It causes me discomfort to see the sins of others of which I was never guilty. In front of the chair I have a table called vexation, because I so seldom find a spiritual way of life among religious people. On the table is a tablecloth that is clean. It is called poverty. It contains much holy goodness. If one were to use it properly, one would cherish it in one's heart. Love of riches is a thief of poverty. On the table a dish is served up to me called bitterness of sin. It should be called well-intentioned effort as well. The beverage is called scant praise, because, alas, the good works I perform are all too few.

This house looked dark inside. Then true love of God revealed itself to me. It was like a noble empress. The outline of her body was refined, white, and rosy in the blossom of youth. She was accompanied by a great number of virtues. They all resembled maidens. She put them at my disposal if I myself wanted them. For her part she would gladly put all of them at my service. She was more splendidly crowned than with glittering gold. Her clothes were like green, light taffeta. When I gazed upon her properly, my dark house was all lit up so that I saw everything that was in it and that had ever happened there. When I looked at her, I recognized her easily, for I had also seen her when she was my dear companion. But now I shall not talk about this because this has all been put down in the book.⁵²

Then I said: "Ah, dearest of all ladies, you are more than a thousandfold above me, and yet you serve me with such great honors, as though I were more than an empress."

She replied: "When I found you with the pure intention of separating yourself from all earthly things, I didn't just want to be your lady. I also had to be your constant lady-in-waiting. Such is the pleasure I take in a pure heart that has freed itself from all earthly things through sincere love of God." By this she meant: No matter how many earthly things a person has, they must not be allowed to stick to a person's heart.

"Dear maiden," since you have served me for so long a time, it is only right that the feeble lady reward the maidservant honorably. As a reward I have given you everything I had and could achieve on earth."

She said: "I have gathered it all up; I shall return it to you with great honor."

"I don't know, lady, what else I can give you, unless you want my soul. That I shall be very happy to give you."

And she said: "That is what I have been longing to have from you for a long time. Now you have finally given her to me. Speak to my maidservants also, that they serve you diligently. Then I can remain with you in God's true love, which I myself am. God is love.""

Then the soul speaks to the first maidservant-sorrow: "Lady True Sorrow, come to me and bring me holy tears. They shall make me free of sin.

"Lady Humility, sit at my side and drive pride and vain honor away from me. When they see you near me, they are forced to flee from me.

"Dear Lady Gentleness, sit by me beneath my habit. Then friendliness will be at my disposal.

"O noble Obedience, I subordinate myself to you in all my actions. May you never leave me. Then in all my actions I shall retain divine truth free of lies, which well befits God's intimate friends.

"Dear Lady Mercy, be at my side when I minister to the sick, that I be hardworking, that I may well bear the cost, that I may serve them with my person and my resources.

"Ah, dear Lady Chastity, I commend my virginal garment to you, that it may ever be pure and clean; for my dear Bridegroom Jesus Christ is always at my side.

"Lady Patience, I have great strength in silence and suffering. You rob all my temptations of their power, so that they are not able to harm me. I want to have you toiling with me.

"Lady Sanctity, come here to me and kiss the mouth of my soul and dwell in the ground of my heart. Then I shall always remain healthy.

"Lady Hope, I ask you to bind all the wounds of my heart that love has inflicted upon me so that I may ever keep God's blessing, no matter what distress I am given.

"Ah, glorious, holy Christian Faith, you have always illumined the eye of my soul so that I well know where to turn in matters of Christian thought. I commend to you my works and my mind.

"O dear Lady Vigilance, do not sit, but rather stand always at my side. Then I shall remain free of evil.

"Lady Temperance, be with me always. Then I shall be ever ready for God's service.

"Lady Frugality, may you be my dear chambermaid. I shall love you so. You make my hard bed soft, my coarse food tasty. You give me power in poverty. This comes from God's goodness.

"Peace and Calm, I cannot do without you. May you walk with me on all my journeys. Those who talk much and whisper much seldom keep their honor. Those who boast-that can never be all to their advantage.

"Wisdom is always together with love and is the mistress of all maidens. She keeps whatever love gives. She makes useful whatever a person learns or reads.

"Chaste Modesty has special qualities about her. She is pleased to remain without praise in the presence of all people.

"Now I am well provided for as to ladies-in-waiting. But there are two more that I do not want to forget: Fear and Constancy. May the two of them be ever with me. Then all my servants shall be attentive to their duties.

"I thank you, dear Love of God, Lady Empress, that you have given them all to me as a help as I travel in exile on the road to heaven."

49. Concerning a Lay Brother

A lay brother of the Order of Preachers was struck dead by thunder. Prayers were said for his soul with the sincere wish that anything for which he had not done penance might be forgiven him. And his soul was shown to that person who was praying for him. He was fair in celestial bliss and in no way suffering. His soul gave the reasons why this was the case: "I was always humble in my heart, cautious in my thinking, and well-intentioned in my actions. That is why I experience no pain."

The soul: "Why then didn't you go immediately to heaven?"

He replied: "I had to receive divine knowledge and heavenly love here first. I didn't have these on earth."

"Why do you have that small blemish on your face?"

He said: "I used to frown at those who didn't do what I wanted. I never did penance for this."

"How can the blemish be removed?"

He said: "If I just had a sigh!"

But he could not get one from that person, for at that instant he was given it.⁵⁵

Then he was happy and said: "Now it is gone."

"Why are you wearing this crown? After all, you are not yet in heaven."

He said: "I had an unusual death. That is why God gave it to me."

50. The Visible Favor of God

O dear Lord Jesus Christ, who are one eternal God with the eternal Father, remember me! I thank you, Lord, for your visible favor with which you constantly touch me, which cuts through all my bones, all my veins, and all my flesh. Whenever I can repay you for it, Lord, with holy thankfulness, I am secure; otherwise, I am not. You can certainly consider your frail creature feeble, Lord, for your intention is good, even better than good. For many things are called good which are not as good as that which you do to me. But when you touch me with your most sublime sweetness that permeates my body and my soul utterly, then I fear that I can draw to myself all too much of your divine pleasure. For I am unworthy of it on earth. And so I pray to you at times more for other people than for myself, so that I might draw away from my pleasure out of love of God and Christian loyalty. Thereafter I fear the rearing up of pride, which cast the most exalted angel out of heaven. I also fear the serpent of vain honor that deceived Eve. I fear the betrayal that thrust Judas from God. If I am faithful to God, I shall persevere in all virtues, in all goodness, and in great vigilance with God along with our dear Lady, his virgin mother.

51. A Prayer Against Sins of Omission

I, the least, the weakest, the most unworthy among the whole human race, it is my desire and I beg you, Lord heavenly Father, Lord Jesus Christ, Lord Holy Spirit, Lord Holy Trinity, that you might forgive me today all my sins of omission which I have committed in your holy service, and not just while seeking my advantage or out of necessity, but rather because of my sinful malice, which I could easily stop if I wanted to. Accept now, Lord, this tiny improvement that I now achieve with my will to the honor of your dear mother and of all the saints who are being honored today by Holy Christianity, and to praise and honor the blessedness of all God's saints through which, dear Lord, they have drawn near to you. Now help me, dear Lord, to such a change in my life that I may so become a companion of your saints on earth through a holy life that I might share their company in your kingdom before your glorious countenance along with all those who desire me to pray for them.

52. How the Loving Soul Bows Beneath the Hand of God

I say to my five senses: "Bow beneath the almighty hand of God. Even the fiends of hell, no matter how arrogant they are in their fiery fetters, must bow and cower beneath the hard coercion of almighty God. Those in purgatory must in their guilt bow beneath their punishment until that final hour when they shall be found pure. Sinners on earth must bow under the burden of their guilt and be judged penitent by doing penance or be damned to eternal hell. Good people on earth must bow in sorrow to do penance all their days. The chosen pure who love God in utter faithfulness are much oppressed and suffer much holy distress. They bow and bend down beneath all pain and beneath all creatures with their ever-hovering love. Pride is rare among them.

"This is what I should keep in mind, and I shall and must drink from the same cup out of which my heavenly Father drank if I am to possess his kingdom." The kingdom of heaven bows with all the holy angels in delight-filled holiness. For their existence and life were given them by God as a gift. The saints bow and bend low before God in flowing love and in blissful longing with zealous devotion. Thus do they thank God for putting his gift so lovingly at their disposal in their distress on earth. This enabled them to endure all their anguish of heart. May I also experience this, for I, too, am in much distress for love of him."

53. The Prison of Religious People

I felt sorry in my heart for the distress of the community in which I live. In the night I spoke to our Lord in the solitude of my heart thus: "Lord, how do you like this prison?"

And our Lord said: "I am held captive in it."

In these words I understood the meaning of all the following words:

“I fasted in the desert with them.
 I was tempted by the enemy with them.
 I toiled all my days tirelessly and productively with them.
 I was betrayed in hate with them.
 I was sold in unbelief with them when they offered themselves to me in God’s service.
 I was treacherously ambushed with them.
 I was fiercely attacked with them.
 I was taken captive in grasping envy with them.
 I was bound in obedience with them.
 I was scorned in great contempt with them.
 I was beaten in great innocence with them; what they are forced to hear against their will should not sadden them.
 I was dragged before the court with them like a guilty thief; they should call this to mind during chapter meetings and in confession.
 I was scourged with them; when they scourge themselves, they should remember me.
 I bore my cross with them; when they are downcast, they should remember me.
 I was nailed to the cross with them; for this reason they should suffer willingly and complain little about their troubles.
 I entrusted my spirit with them to my Father at my death; thus should they entrust themselves to me in all their trials.
 I died with them a holy death; thus shall they become free of all their bonds.
 I was buried with them in earthly stone; thus shall they be and remain pure of all earthly things.
 I arose from the dead; thus shall they always rise out of their failings;
 thus may they receive heavenly radiance into their souls.
 I ascended into heaven by my divine power; there they shall follow me in all the power of these words.”

I truly hope that you⁵⁷ constantly achieve this and know; whoever has not yet done so, may the true God bring it about in him.

54. Four Qualities of Faith

That one believe in God in a Christian manner and that one love God in a holy manner and that one truly know Jesus Christ and that one faithfully follow his teaching to one's human end: I believe that in these four things one shall find eternal life. We believe as Christians, not like Jews or like unbelieving Christians. They claim to believe in God but do not believe in his most holy work that he wrought; that is, that he gave us his only begotten Son. They reject him. Lord God, this is what we complain about to you. We believe it was the divine will that he sent us his only begotten Son into this world. We believe in the works and the death of our Lord Jesus Christ by which he redeemed us. We believe in the Holy Spirit who brought our happiness to completion in the Father and in the Son, and brings it even now to completion in all our good works.

How should we love God in a holy manner? We should love everything that the Holy Trinity commands us to love. God did not create sin. This is why he hates it in us. God loves goodness in us, which is he himself.

How should we know Jesus Christ? By his works we should know him and should love him more than ourselves.

How should we follow his teaching? Just as he taught us to and as his followers still teach us. As long as we do this, our blessedness shall increase.

55. How a Friend Writes to a Friend

Because you love God beyond your human power, because you hold God dear with all the strength of your soul, because you know God with all the wisdom of your soul, and because you have received God's favor with much holy thankfulness, I am sending you this letter.

The great outflow of divine love that never ceases flows on and on unceasingly and effortlessly in such a sweet course unfaillingly that our tiny vessel becomes full and brims over. If we do not block it with self-will, our small vessel is always overflowing with God's favor.

Lord, you are full and you fill us as well with your favor. You are great and we are small. How are we to become like you? Lord, you have given us much and we should pass it on in turn. Though we are a small vessel, still you have made it full. One can pour a small full container into a larger container so often that the large container becomes full from the small container. The large container is the satisfaction that God receives from our works. We are, alas, so tiny that a single little word from God or from Holy Scripture fills us so completely that for the moment we can take in no more. Then we pour the gift back again into the large container that is God. How are we to do this? In holy longing we should pour it over sinners that they be cleansed. If it again becomes full, we should then pour it over the imperfection of religious people that they fight on and become perfect and remain so. If it again becomes full, we should pour it over the distress of poor souls who are in torment in purgatory, that God in his goodness might relieve them of their many sufferings. If it again becomes full, we should then in holy mercy pour it over the distress of Holy Christianity that is afflicted with many sins. Our Lord God loved us first of all. He also toiled for us first and foremost. And he also suffered most of all on our behalf. We should give him the same in return if we want to be like him.

Thus did our Lord speak to a person: "Give me everything that is yours, and I shall give you everything that is mine." The recompense of love that we return to God is sweet indeed. The recompense of the toil is very often, alas, burdensome, for a person must sometimes outwardly do without what love has inwardly consumed. Someone asked me how difficult that is. I could not in the least make it clear through merely human concepts. Our Lord suffered much for us, even death. But, alas, a small suffering seems to us great indeed. Because of this I have to feel contempt even for myself and complain to God that I have so little virtue. Love makes suffering sweet, more than one can say. And if we wish to become like God, we have to overcome in many a conflict. The mind of God and of the loving soul come together in the same manner as the sun and the air join together through the majestic energy of God in a sweet, vibrant mixture in which the sun overcomes the coldness and darkness of the air, so that one notices only that it is all one sun. That comes from divine bliss.

May God give us all this love and preserve it for us! Amen.

56. How God Touches His Friends with Suffering

When one experiences sadness
That one has not sought
And in no way has been the cause of,
Our Lord says this about it:
"I have set it in motion. That is,
Just as my Father had me set in motion on earth,
So, too, those whom I draw to myself on earth
Suffer much pain because of it.
They should indeed know this:

The harder I draw them toward me,
The nearer they come to me.
When a person so overcomes himself
That he considers suffering and consolation of equal value,
Then I shall raise him up into sweetness,
And thus he shall have a taste of eternal life."

57. A Bit About Paradise

This was revealed and I saw how paradise was constituted. Of its breadth and length I could find no end. I first approached it between this world and the beginning of paradise. There I saw trees, foliage, and a little grass but no weeds. Some trees bore apples but most of them had only leaves with a refined fragrance. Swift waters flow through there and the wind blows from south to north. There in the waters earthly sweetness is found mixed with heavenly bliss. The breeze was sweeter than I can say. Neither beast nor bird was there, for God had entrusted it to man alone, that he might live there in comfort.

I saw there two men, Enoch and Elijah." Enoch was sitting and Elijah was lying on the ground in great fervor. Then I spoke to Enoch. I asked him whether they were living as humans do. He said: "We eat a bit from the apples and drink a little of the water to keep the body alive. But most important is God's power."

I asked him: "How did you get here?"

"I came here in such a manner that I don't know how I got here or what I was doing before sitting down here."

I asked him what his prayer was like.

"Faith and hope are the basis of our prayer."

I asked him how he felt, whether he found it at all irksome to be there.

He replied: "I am perfectly fine and suffer no discomfort."

"Do you have fears about the conflict that is yet to take place in the world?"⁵⁹

"God shall arm me with his strength so that I can hold my own in the struggle."

"Do you pray at all for Christianity?"

"I pray that God free them from sin and bring his kingdom to them."

Elijah sat up and his countenance was fair, fiery, the color of heaven. His hair resembled white wool. They were attired like poor men who seek their bread with a staff in their hand. I asked Elijah how he prayed for Christianity.

"I pray with mercy, humility, faithfulness and obedience."

"Do you pray for souls?"

"Yes, when I entreat, their suffering is decreased. When I ask, the suffering even disappears."

"Are they ever redeemed?"

"Yes, many of them."

"Why did God bring you here?"

"That we might be helpers of Christianity and of God until the last day."

I saw a twofold paradise. I have described the earthly part. The heavenly part is up above and covers the earthly part against all storms. In the highest part are those souls who have no need of purgatory but have not yet come into God's kingdom. They hover in bliss as does the air in the sun. Power and honor, reward and crown are not yet theirs until they enter God's kingdom.

When the whole earth passes away
And the earthly paradise no longer exists;
When God has held his judgment,
The heavenly paradise shall also pass away.
All that come to God
Shall dwell in a common house.
There shall be no more hospitals for the sick.
Whoever enters God's kingdom
Is free of all infirmity.
May Jesus Christ be praised
Who has given us his kingdom.

58. St. Gabriel`

Holy Angel Gabriel, remember me.
I entrust the message of my longing to you.
Tell my dear Lord Jesus Christ
How sick with love for him I am.
If I am ever to recover,
He himself must be my physician.
Tell him in confidence
The wounds that he has inflicted upon me
I can no longer endure
Unsalved and unbandaged.
He has wounded me to death.
If he leaves me lying here untended,

I can never recover.
If all mountains were a balsam for wounds
And all waters a health potion
And all blossoming trees a bandage to heal wounds,
They could not restore me to health.
He must lay himself onto the wounds of my soul.

Holy Angel Gabriel, remember me.
I entrust this message of love to you.
Whoever wants to hold God dear,
This love letter shall awaken his senses,
If he wishes to follow God.

59. How the Message Came Before God

In my spirit I heard the truth clearly;
My message has reached God.
The reply that is to come back to me
Is so great, so powerful, so profound,
So rich, so blissful, and so overwhelmingly radiant
That I am incapable of receiving it
The while I am a creature of the earth,
Unless I depart for a short while from this poor existence
In such a manner that I remain in it not at all.
But for now I must simply keep silent about this message.
I was able to receive no more of it
That one may speak of openly.

To the extent that a poor creature like me could,
I saw St. Gabriel in blissful glory
Standing in the heights of heaven before God.
He was clad in new garments ablaze with love.
They were his reward
For so ably and honorably bearing messages.
I saw the flames of love playing brightly about his face.
He was in the embrace of the Godhead
And permeated by it.
I could neither understand nor hear his words,
For I am still the likes of an earth-bound fool.

60. How the Child Was Seen

In the night when the Son of God was born, the Child was seen wrapped in poor pieces of cloth and tied with string. The Child lay alone on the hard straw in front of two animals. Then I spoke to the mother: "O dear Lady, how long shall your dear Child lie there alone like that? When will you take it on your lap?"

Our Lady replied that she never let the Child out of her sight. She held out her hand to him and said: "It shall lie on this straw for seven hours by day and by night. Its heavenly Father wants it that way."

I then realized that the heavenly Father was especially happy with this. I prayed to the Child for those who had commended themselves to me. Then a voice spoke out of the Child, though its mouth did not move at all: "If they want to keep me in their minds, I shall keep them in my favor. I have nothing to give them but myself and eternal life."

In the crib⁶² the Child lay on the hard straw.
Its heavenly Father wanted it that way.

61. How One Should Prepare Oneself for God

If a bird remains on the ground for a long time, its wings deteriorate and its feathers become heavy. Then it raises itself aloft beating its feathers and drawing itself far upward until it catches the air. Then it takes flight yet higher. The longer it flies, the more it soars in exhilaration, scarcely returning to earth to refresh itself. Thus did the wings of love take from it earthly pleasure. In this same way we should prepare ourselves when we are to approach God. We should raise the feathers of our longing to God. We should elevate our virtue and our good works with love. If we do not give up on this, we shall become conscious of God.

Ah, Desiring Love,
You call out many a sweet word
To the ears of your dear Lord.
You rarely rest.
Now be glad and let yourself be heard.
He shall yet turn to you in joy.

Ah, Sinking Love,
You suffer much sweet anguish.
Your loneliness is great.
How shall you win Jesus?
He is running much too far ahead of you.
Indeed, you chose him instead of sin
And have lost yourself in him.
And so you must suffer many a torment.
I shall restore myself in him.

Ah, Free Love,
You so strongly lure my heart and senses

That I would soon bolt from here.
Yet I cannot win you as I would.
And so I must still love you in anguish.

Ah, Powerful Love,
You are well protected.
You have good intentions in all things.
You carry one well past all troubles.
Your hope and your faith are great.
You shall overcome all your troubles.

Ah, Wise Love,
You keep holy order
As you praise God and know him therein
And accomplish his will in all things.
If you do this faithfully,
You shall take your rest in God.
This shall be the cause of my rejoicing.

62. How the Maidens Serve Their Lady the Queen

This conversation was revealed to a person in her spirit as follows: I saw a path that went from the east where the sun rises to the west where it sets. All those who have good will toward God traveled this path. They all passed through the valley but traveled at different speeds. They journeyed as pilgrims who had left what was dear to them and wanted to seek what is best of all: God. Some turned back to the sensual pleasure they had left and did not complete the journey. Some rested in the grass of various pleasures and among the flowers of vanity. They remained a very long time on the journey. Thereafter, they shall experience the stern rod of bitter purgatory, even if they live free of mortal sin. Concerning this our Lord said: "Some people journey with good intentions in their holy works yet have about them such bad habits and are so repulsive in their vehemence that one can hardly put up with them. In the case of such people I withhold my judgment. They should seek mercy from me in humble fear. Then they would not lose their good works, and the bitterness in their hearts would disappear. Then they would be able to become themselves again. Whoever seeks my mercy cannot endure the darkness."

One person went alone along the path. This was because earthly pleasure was not able to give his soul consolation. Then the person saw two persons going along before him. One went on the left side of the path, the other on the right. He asked them who they were and what they were doing. The one on the left said: "I am God's justice. God's judgment was entrusted to me and is mine since Adam sinned in paradise. My judgment has long-lasting and serious consequences. Now this maiden has come along and stands beside me. She has become my equal. Her name is mercy. All who seek her and constantly call out to her overcome all their inner anguish. She is utterly perfect. She has taken from me what was rightfully mine. Whatever troubles a person has, if he then flees to me in penitence, she lays her soft hand on what is crooked. Then I stand there like an idiot and can do nothing about it. All of this came about through the true Son of God, who robbed me of my strictest justice with his mercy. She consoles the downcast; she heals wounds; she brings joy to all who come to her. She wrested great power from me. I am dear to her and she to me. We shall always be together until the last day. Then judgment is mine."

God's judgment and God's justice are not completely one and the same. Judgment portions out guilt for what comes before it unrepented. Justice is a holy life God has given to all his dear friends. He practiced it in his own life. For he was just in all he did. Hence he knows when we practice it. Thus can we become pure with him.

This mercy of God and the holy justice of his Son, to which he held during his life on earth, and the favor of the Holy Spirit of them both were followed on the path by a worthy throng. They all resembled virgins. When I saw them, I recognized all of them easily. And yet I made inquiries of them because I was interested in their replies. I asked who they were and what their duties were. They said: "We are noble and well-bred maidens and serve to God's praise his most beloved queen, whom God has chosen above all things; that is the human soul. We serve our lady the queen so that she might accomplish her Lord's will with all zeal and with her full attention in all things, always according to the Christian dispensation. Then she shall never be found guilty."

"Lady Wisdom, what service can you render together with your sister Discernment?"

"We teach my lady the queen to distinguish between evil and good in divine wisdom with the holy power of discernment, so that she can imagine how things are now and might be later. Thus she gains a practical advantage in all things."

"Lady Truth, what service can you render at court with your sister Sanctity?"

"I serve my Lord and my lady the queen in total devotion, that she might always be true to her Lord in all trials. Thus shall she ever remain secure and free and be ever inwardly holy, subject to her Lord in all things. This shall keep her outwardly worthy of praise."

"Lady Humility, what service can you render together with your sister Gentleness?"

"I teach my lady the queen to love from the heart the will of my Lord and all his gifts. Thus can she rest in holy gentleness, driving out with cheerfulness all her interior suffering."

"Lady Generosity, what service can you render together with your sister Obedience?"

"I teach my lady the queen, with her longing love of God, always in her prayers to be generous to the wicked and the good, to the living and the dead. The treasure is manifold and large; it all returns to her lap. If she carries out her Lord's will, she shall practice holy obedience in all her works. Thus shall she remain God's queen."

"Lady Strength, what service can you render together with your sister Constancy?"

"I teach my lady to be strong in all conflict. Thus can she remain in her kingdom being ever constant. Then she shall remain ever free before her Lord."

The number of these maidens is beyond human reckoning. For everything that a good person does in God, inwardly and outwardly, requires virtue.

Together on the path with these maidens there journeyed a great lord who resembled a very holy and mighty bishop. This was our Christian faith. He was fiery within and was completely aflame with divine love. Together with all these virtues he served this queen.

High overhead hovered a maiden resembling a golden eagle. She was surrounded by a heavenly radiance. She illumined and taught and put all these maidens in the proper order for serving their lady the queen. This love dwells in Christian faith; she rests in the palace of her lady the queen. It is her task to force love to love, God to the soul, and the soul to God. That is why she is in the first commandments'

63. God's Will Is a Sovereign Lord in All Being

Constant longing in the soul,
Constant days of pain in the body,
Constant anguish in the senses,
Constant hope in one's heart for no one but Jesus—
All who have forsaken themselves in God
Know well what I am saying.

For two days and two nights I was so seriously ill that I had hope that my end had come. I thanked God as best I could for his favors. And I urged God to take me to him if that were his dearest will. "And yet, Lord, if your praise can at all be increased thereby, I shall gladly remain in this miserable body for love of you. Lord, I have so lived for many a day that, Lord, I never offered you such a difficult sacrifice as this. Lord, thy will be done and not mine. I do not have dominion over myself. You do in all things."

Then I saw high up in the distance how the saints were making preparations as though they were about to come to my end. I could not distinguish the individual persons among them. For such a powerful light was shining in their midst that it seemed to me that I was one with them. This was high in the west where the sun sets. From the north came evil spirits who stood close by. They had to witness my judgment. They were all tangled together and tied up like whipped dogs. Choking at the collar, they tried to get at me. I was not afraid of them. I was glad. I realized that their presence would have to bring honor to God because God has relieved his friends of all harassment from them and they, in their wickedness, return to hell.

In the midst of all this a change took place in my condition, so that I had to remain in this bitter, wretched life. I had been so secure and free, without fear or suffering. Woe, woe, woe! If only I could have remained in this death! If it were not for God's goodness, I would now be utterly disheartened. If I now had normal human strength and divine love, then I would really start serving God. I would try to bring things to a good end, just as I always wanted to and still do.

64. How God Serves Man

Thus does a beggar woman speak to God in her prayer:

"Lord, I thank you because in your love you have stripped me of all earthly riches and now clothe and feed me from the resources belonging to others. For everything that clings to me in possessiveness, causing pleasure in my heart, has to become completely alien to me.

"Lord, I thank you for taking from me my eyesight and for now serving me with the eyes of others.

"Lord, I thank you for taking from me the use of my hands and for now serving me with the hands of others.

"Lord, I thank you for taking from me the strength of my heart and for now serving me with the hearts of others.

"Lord, on their behalf, I beg you to reward them on earth with your divine love, that they might entreat you and serve you with all virtues until they achieve a holy end."

All who for love of God leave all things with a pure heart-they are all archbeggars. On the last day they shall sit in judgment with Jesus our Redeemer.

"Lord, may you change in me and in all sinners everything I complain of to you.

"Lord, for your own honor may you grant me and all imperfect religious people everything I ask for.

"Lord, whatever I do, fail to do, or suffer, may praise of you never grow silent in my heart. Amen."

65. How God Adorns the Soul with Suffering

Whenever virgins in all ages are clothed according to the will of their Bridegroom, they need nothing more than their wedding dress. This means being racked with pain in sickness, in days of suffering, in temptation, and in much anguish of heart. We find much of this among sinful Christians. These are the wedding dresses of loving souls. But the everyday work clothes are fasting, keeping vigils, scourging oneself, going to confession, sighing, weeping, praying, fearing sin, severely curbing the senses and the body in God for love of God, sweet hoping and ceaseless loving desire and a constantly praying heart in all one's works. These are the work clothes of a good person. When we are sick, we wear wedding dresses; and when we are healthy, we wear work clothes.

This is how the tormented body speaks to the lonely soul: "When shall you soar with the feathers of your yearning to the blissful heights to Jesus, your eternal Love? Thank him there for me, lady, that, feeble and unworthy though I am, he nevertheless wanted to be mine when he came into this land of exile and took our humanity upon himself; and ask him to keep me innocent in his favor until I attain a holy end, when you, dearest Soul, turn away from me."

The soul: "Ah, dearest prison in which I have been bound, I thank you especially for being obedient to me. Though I was often unhappy because of you, you nevertheless came to my aid. On the last day all your troubles will be taken from you.

Then we shall no longer complain.
Then everything that God has done with us
Will suit us just fine,
If you will now only stand fast
And keep hold of sweet hope.”

Obedience is a holy bond. It binds the soul to God and the body to Jesus and the five senses to the Holy Spirit. The longer it binds, the more the soul loves. The less the body preserves itself, the fairer its works shine before God and before people of good will.

NOTES TO TEXT

Prologue to the Lux Divinitatis

1. Revelationes Gertrudianae ac Mechtildianae, ed. Solesmes Monks (Louis Paquelin), 2 vols. (Poitiers and Paris: Oudin, 1875-77); Vol. 2: Sororis Mechtildis Lux divinitatis, pp. 435-37. Hereafter referred to as Rev. I and II.

2. This Heinrich cannot be Heinrich of Halle, Mechthild's longtime spiritual advisor, who died before the translation was undertaken. Because of the consistency in style between this prologue and the text of the Lux div., Neumann concludes that this Heinrich, a lector in the Dominican house in Halle, is responsible for both (1964, 193-94).

3. Satan's "body" signifies his follower and provides a parallel to "Christ and his church."

4. Historical and mystical indicate that the book should be read on more than one level, as was the common way of reading the Bible, which was often said to have four senses or meanings: literal or historical, allegorical, anagogical, and mystical. As used here, mystical seems to comprise all those ways of interpreting that are not literal or historical.

5. Cf. Liber specialis gratiae, Mechthild of Hackeborn in Rev. II, 11 42; V 3, 3; and Legatus divinaepietatis, Gertrud the Great in Rev. I, V 7.

6. The rest of the prologue, which continues for a few pages, is comprised almost entirely of quotations taken from various parts of the Lux div.

Latin Foreword with Table of Contents and Middle High German Translation

1. This foreword precedes the text of the FL. A later hand has added in German the heading "Concerning the Revelations of a Loving Soul." About the author of the Latin foreword it can be said that he struggled to write it in Latin (the final paragraph is in Middle High German); that he wrote it about 1270 and was familiar only with Books I-V; and that his index of subjects, which he takes imperfectly from the chapter headings, shows him to be careless and superficial. See Neumann 1964, 180-83.

2. The Latin word inspiratus literally says that the book was "breathed into" its human author by the Lord through grace.

3. The Latin word conscriptus seems to refer less to writing as done by an author than to the acts of compiling or writing down something being dictated. See Neumann 1964, 183-84.

4. Neumann (1964, 182-83) believes that this final thought about reading the book nine times, etc., was added about the middle of the fourteenth century.

Book I

1. The first paragraph of this prologue, which is best understood as an introduction to FL as a whole, has been pieced together from sentences coming later in the text. Neumann credits these lines to the compiler or editor (1964, 182-83). The first part ("This book... standing") is taken from V 34, 41-43; N I 195. The second part ("and it... me alone") is taken from 11 26, 11; N I 68. The third part ("and proclaims ... intimacy") is modeled on 11 26, 15-16; N I 68. Unlike the concluding sentence ("All who... nine times"), which Neumann considers to be, both here and in the Latin prologue to FL, a mid-fourteenth-century addition, these lines are also found at the beginning of the Lux div. and hence were part of the book before Mechthild's death. Because these lines are preceded by the statement that God himself speaks the words of the book and, more importantly, because the words are spoken by our Lord (V 34), or God (11 26), in their original context, the "I," "me," and "my intimacy" must be taken to refer to God and not to Mechthild.

2. Given the context, it is most likely that "religious people" means primarily members of the clergy and religious orders.

3. That is, the pillars of the church.

4. An example of clever wordplay gets lost in the translation: gemachet and unmaht. The word gemachet (made) recalls

God's maht (might or power). Thus his unmaht (un-might) is his powerlessness to withhold the gift of making the book.

5. This chapter is a fine example of Mechthild's appropriation of the language and conventions of courtly-love poetry for her purposes. The dialogue was a popular device in courtly-love poetry. Here it is combined with allegory: in courtly fashion the soul (queen) converses with the allegorical figure Lady Love. Love is addressed as frouwe minne and the soul as frouwe kfineginne. However, though each uses frouwe (lady or mistress) in addressing the other, they are not equals, as the course of the dialogue makes clear. As to rank, the soul is superior and, when Lady Love uses frouwe in addressing her, frouwe retains much of its original meaning as the feminine equivalent of lord, or one's feudal master. Thus, I have chosen to render frouwe kfineginne with "my Mistress and Queen," which is meant to convey the deference Love shows the soul. Emotionally, however, the roles are reversed. Clearly the soul is utterly dependent on Lady Love, who is, of course, divine love in both senses—the soul's love for God and God's love for the soul, which is the soul's reward for having given up everything for God. When the soul addresses Love as frouwe, she is acknowledging the latter's nobility. Hence the more usual translation "Lady" seems appropriate. As the course of the dialogue reveals, however, the soul has surrendered everything to divine love. Hence the more radical dependence is that of the soul on Lady Love. This dependence is conveyed to the audience in part by the soul's using frouwe to address her.

6. As becomes clear through the word hundredfold and Lady Love's statement that the soul can demand God and his kingdom in return for leaving everything, the scriptural context for this dialogue is Matthew 19:27-29.

7. In this chapter Mechthild offers us a poetic description of mystical union or the experience of ecstasy, which she calls God's greeting. One is left with the impression, however, that she is not recounting one specific event in her life but rather is giving a generic description of such experiences.

8. In order not to offend against orthodoxy in describing ecstasy, one could not imply a complete separation of body and soul. For more on this, see Schmidt, note 13, p. 347.

9. The predicate of this sentence is Neumann's not completely convincing attempt to save a corrupt passage. See note to I 2, 13; N 11 5.

10. In addition to "laments" the ms seems to suggest "recognizes" as a possibility as well. See note to I 2, 23; N 11 6.

11. "Raised up" (verzogen) alludes to her having been raised up, like Paul, in ecstasy or rapture. Cf. 2 Cor 12:2-4.

12. In the Song of Songs the bride is frequently called a dove by the bridegroom. Cf. Sg 2:14; 5:2; and 6:9.

13. From what follows it seems that the "master of the house" is the body to whom the soul is unhappily married. A nasty spat ensues when the soul returns from her tryst.

14. This calls to mind a poem by Walther von der Vogelweide, "Nemt, frouwe, disen kranz," in which the speaker of the poem is dreaming of a love encounter and is so elated that he laughs, wakes himself up, and thus spoils the dream. Perhaps Mechthild is alluding to this poem.

15. That is, to me, Mechthild.

16. Mechthild's oxymoron, that she wishes to "die living" to describe ecstatic union, may be in imitation of Gottfried of Strassburg who, in his narrative Tristan, often similarly juxtaposes love, life, and death.

17. Mechthild repeats this theme of "blind saints... who love and do not know" in a varied form in I 20 below.

18. Many themes and images occurring in this chapter are similar to themes and images in the Song of Songs; examples include the beating and wounding of the beloved (5:7), the bed of love (3:1), and love sickness (2:5 and 5:8).

19. This translates Neumann's rendering of the sentence and implies that the soul wishes that love kill her. This fits well with the loved-death thoughts of the previous chapter. The punctuation in Morel's edition elicits the following translation: "Am I not going to be killed by your hand? Then it would be better if I had never known you."

20. During the offertory of the mass a drop of water is added to the wine in the chalice and loses itself in the wine.

Mechthild is no doubt alluding to this. The passage also recalls Bernard of Clairvaux's discussion of union with God in On Loving God 10.28.

21. The German title differs markedly from the Latin title in the Lux div. (De collatione anime et corporis). Neumann (note to I 5, 1; N 11 9) takes this as an indication of an early corruption.

22. Paul (Rom 9:3) expresses similar sentiments.

23. Cf. I 2 and note 7 above.

24. The most influential thinker on the doctrine of angels in the Middle Ages was Pseudo-Dionysius, who divided them into nine ranks or choirs. Beginning with the highest rank, these are Seraphim, Cherubim, Thrones, Dominions, Virtues, Powers, Principalities, Archangels, and Angels.

25. The speaker is presumably the Lord.

26. That is, free of bitterness or rancor.

27. Chapters 12-21 bear resemblances to two types of poems occurring in courtly-love poetry: the dialogue and the Wechsel (exchange). The dialogue is a conversation between lovers who talk to each other directly. Chapters 14-15 seem the clearest example of this. The Wechsel consists of two or more loosely connected strophes. The lovers do not address each other directly but speak of what they share: their love, for example, or a common experience. Though the logical connection between the strophes is weak, each speaker speaks a kind of monologue that the reader intuitively refers to the other speaker. Many of these chapters may be thought of as part of a Wechsel.

28. For an interesting study of this passage, see Paul Michel, "Dutch die bilde uber bilde: Zur Bildgestaltung bei Mechthild von Magdeburg," In Abendlandische Mystik im Mittelalter, Symposium Kloster Engelberg, ed. Kurt Ruh (Stuttgart: Metzler, 1986), 509-26.

29. Cf. the frequent similar references to fragrance in the first chapter of the Song of Songs.

30. Cf. Sg 1:13.

31. The word I have rendered "protection" (sicherheit) means, among other things, the oath of submission that a knight conquered in single combat, if he is to avoid being killed, must swear to the knight who has bested him. In view of the preceding phrase ("defeat and retreat"), the soul might well be admitting that she has been conquered by divine love, to which she then utterly submits in order to stand under its protection.

32. Schmidt (note 20, p. 349) points out the similarity of this thought to one occurring in William of St. Thierry, to the effect that one needs two eyes to know God: love and knowledge. One eye, working alone, does not suffice.

33. Jubilus is a Latin word used here and in other spiritual writings of the age to signify rapture or ecstasy in which the soul is raised up above all earthly things. It is interesting to note that Mechthild uses it here for the state or condition of the Trinity as it creates the human soul.

34. Here begins a long series containing a good number of mystical paradoxes, which caused the copyists much difficulty, as is evidenced by the number of corruptions and questionable passages. Neumann is quite aware that he has not been able to restore the original wording in every case. Cf. note to I 22, 12-34; N 11 14.

35. Despite the attempts of others to replace "experiences" (ervert) with something else, Neumann decided to retain it from ms E. One suggested substitution is erwert (= enwirdet: becomes nothing, is annihilated). Cf. note to I 22, 13; N 11 14-15.

36. All editors assume a lacuna here and in the other instances in this passage where ellipsis points occur.

37. That is, the deeper she dwells in infinite God.

38. The Middle High German word eigen, which I have translated by "own," means more than simply belonging to someone. When used with reference to a person it implies the status of an unfree serf (eigenman=serf). Thus God here becomes the unfree serf or slave of the soul.

39. That is, in the Trinity.

40. The red wine of Christ's suffering restores the health of the soul.

41. In the original, for purposes of rhyme (lust-brust), the singular (breast) occurs.

42. Schmidt (note 24, p. 351) calls attention to the long tradition, beginning with early ecclesiastical writers, according to which Mother Church (ecclesia) suckles Christians. See also Caroline Bynum's treatment of this theme in her Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982).

43. Chapters 23 and 24 offer another example of dialogue similar to that found in courtly lyric poetry.

44. Neumann finds this sentence puzzling and possibly corrupt. Though he does not emend it, he considers emendations that would make it mean: 1. His (Christ's) life died out of love for you. Or: 2. Your lover (Christ) died out of love for you. Cf. note to I 28, 5; N 11 19.

45. "Death... life": the usual order (life-death) is reversed here because of assonance rhyme (beliben-libe).

46. Neumann (note to I 29, 2; N 11 19) attributes the final phrase, "in Twenty-Three Steps of the Cross," to Heinrich of Halle's sense of order. The Lux div. introduces this chapter with the following narrative: "One day, when the sisters all hastened off to hear the word of God, Sister Mechthild remained behind alone, shut up in a small room. She began to lament sorely and to be sad, saying in her heart: 'Woe is me, Lord, that I, poor wretch, because of my infirmity am not strong enough to be present to hear your word.' Soon there appeared the Consoler of those who grieve in the habit of the Dominicans, and he said to her: 'Look at me, my bride, and see.'"

47. This phrase is in Latin in the text: Vide me, sponsa!

48. These are the hours at which the corresponding parts of the Divine Office are sung.

49. The charm of this chapter rests largely on the fact that each line has interior rhyme.

50. The Lux div. adds here: "The holy woman used to sing these seven phrases to the Lord when her body was weakened by sickness or in ardor of the spirit or in the delight of longing love."

51. Nothingness (das niht) and somethingness (das iht) are staples of the vocabulary of later mystics, especially of Meister Eckhart. Here we find a clear indication that they predate Eckhart's innovative influence on vernacular mystical vocabulary.

52. This is most likely a reference to the standard interpretation of the story of Martha and Mary (Lk 10:38-42), in which Jesus chides Martha for being too busy and worried regarding everyday matters and praises Mary's contemplative focus on what alone is truly necessary.

53. Chapters 36 and 37 present us with another example of Mechthild's employment of a device related to the dialogue form of courtly lyric poetry.

54. The deer and the eagle are traditional animal symbols of the contemplative soul based on Psalms 41:2 and 102:5, respectively.

55. These last sentences continue the allegory: the woods are the companionship of holy people; the nightingale is union with God; and the voice of the birds is holy knowledge.

56. I have chosen to follow Schmidt here and have translated "to circle higher." Cf. Schmidt, note 37, p. 354. Neumann (note to I 44, 36; N II 23-24) seems to conclude that the original phrase meant "to crawl/creep further."

57. That is: I will accompany you willingly, I depart from you in sadness.

58. Neumann (note to I 44, 62; N 11 24) is of the opinion that Mary's milk is unnatural because of its miraculous origin, which Mechthild explains in detail in V 23 below.

59. This is Neumann's proposed reading of a very problematic sentence. See note to I 44, 74 f.; N 11 25-26.

60. The original has: "ir sint so sere genattirt in mich" (I 44, 82; N 31). This translates literally as: "You are so very natured into me." This line serves as the culmination of Mechthild's play with "nature" in this chapter. For more of her thoughts on the nature of the soul, see VI 31 below.

61. This coyness is reminiscent of passages in courtly poetry: the poet of the Nibelungenlied, for example, discreetly refuses to reveal explicitly to his audience the joys of Siegfried and Kriemhild on their wedding night; and the girl in Walther von der Vogelweide's Under der linden hopes no one finds out what happened when she met with her lover.

62. Courtly poetry often plays with the paradox of lovers being inseparable, even when they must leave each other.

63. The names of these feast days may have been added to the original text by a later hand. Cf. note to I 45, 3-18; N 11 27.

64. Cf. Rv 12:1.

65. Schmidt (note 45, p. 357) points out the frequent occurrence in the Bible of images of grapes, wine, and the wine press, usually referring to a process of transformation. Cf. Lam 1:15; Is 5:2 and 63:3; Prv 3:10; Mt 21:33; and Rv 14:20.

66. Hartmann von Aue in the prologue to Gregorius (ll. 97-143) gives an allegorical interpretation of the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10:25-37). The oil and wine the Samaritan pours on the wounds of the robbers' victim are taken to be the balm (oil) of mercy or grace and the stinging antiseptic (wine) of the law or justice, which requires penitence and penance.

67. These words are in Latin in the text: "Veni, dilecta mea, veni, coronaberis!" As Neumann (note to I 46, 51 f.; N 11 28-29) points out, these words, taken from Song of Songs 4:8, were sung during the consecration of a virgin, a ritual in Mechthild's time not exclusively reserved for the ceremony of nuns' professing their vows but allowed also to women living outside the cloister, such as beguines.

68. I have used "religious" to translate geistliche here. It seems to indicate priests and members of religious orders, but perhaps it is not restricted to such in this context. Cf. Book I, note 2 above.

Book II

1. The toils Mechthild has in mind are most likely extreme acts of asceticism.

2. The phrase "with separation" possibly indicates that God and creatures retain their separateness even in special intimacy.

3. The uninterrupted bliss of the soul in heaven after death would be more than a human being on earth could endure.

4. That is, the nine choirs of angels mentioned in I 6 above.

5. The thought seems to be that it was a good idea for God to put Mary, the pinnacle of his creation, next to his throne. The archangels, surprised to see mere human beings above them in heaven, cannot quibble about someone as perfect as Mary being above them.

6. The tower should be thought of as being at the west end of the church over the entrance, at the opposite end from the altar.

7. The choir is that section of the church situated between the nave and the sanctuary, usually separated from the nave by a grill or something similar.

8. The Middle High German word ampellen (Latin: ampullae) can mean both small containers for liquid and lamps.

9. The complete lyrics can be found in 11 2 above.

10. These words are in Latin in the text: Gaudeamus omnes in domino. They are the first words of the introit for the feast of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Good Counsel, April 26.

11. Following the Lux div. Neumann (note to 11 4, 65 f.; N 11 31-32) takes this she to be the poor girl.

12. This "Book of the Genealogy" of Jesus Christ is Matthew 1:1-16 and is read on the feast of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin Mary, September 8.

13. Since Mechthild uses the word wihen (ordain) here in alluding to the marvelous happening that occurred when the pregnant Mary visited pregnant Elizabeth, whose baby leaped in the womb and was filled with the Holy Spirit (see Lk 1:41), perhaps she is interpreting this event to mean that John thus received ordination. However, when she later defends this vision against the charge that it is not authentic because in it John the Baptist, a layman, celebrates mass, she does not bring up such an argument. See VI 36 below.

14. Neumann (note to 11 4, 89-91; N 11 32) finds this phrase confusing. He suggests emending the text to read "at the words [of consecration] and signs of his hand."

15. This is probably best taken to mean that the lamb unites itself completely with the soul of the girl, which is in the divine image. This happens "in her stable," her body.

16. The lines in brackets, which also occur in the Lux div., were obviously added after Mechthild's death. No one, however, has been able to offer convincing arguments as to exactly when, where, or by whom they were added.

17. That is, the garment worn next to the skin.

18. The reader is warned not to attach undue theological weight to the phrase "one being." The context does not warrant it. God speaks here in lyrical phrases and as a lover-not as a theologian-in saying he and the soul shall become one.

19. As Neumann (note to 11 6, 14; N 11 33) points out, Mechthild usually employs Playful or playing (spilend) to refer to ecstatic mystical union, availing herself thereby of the traditions of courtly love and bride mysticism.

20. This is the beginning of the Gloria in the ordinary of the mass. Translation: "Glory to God in the highest."

21. In the text the pronouns and possessive adjectives in the beginning of the chapter are masculine because they refer back to "A person" (Ein mensche), which is masculine. They are best taken, however, as referring to Mechthild herself because she often refers to herself this way. Therefore I have changed he, him, and his to she and her.

22. Neumann (note to 11 14, If.; N 11 33) considers this title to be at least partially corrupt.

23. Because the Lux div. translates "from humanity" with "from the weakness of humanity" (ex infirmitate humanitatis), Neumann (note to II 14, 3; N 11 33-34) weighs the possibility that the original might have been more in line with the Lux div.

24. The lyrical charm of this passage, as in many passages, is enhanced by the rhyme in the original: stunt, runt, gesunt, munt, count.

25. Chapters 17 and 18 are another example of Mechthild's employing the courtly-lyric form of the dialogue or exchange.

26. That is, regrettably I sink back to earth because our union also involves my body, which weighs me down and hastens my return to earth.

27. A more literal rendering: "in your and God's bed of love."

28. I have adopted Schmidt's (p. 54) punctuation here because I cannot discover a plausible meaning by following Neumann's (II 19, 12-13; N I 50) punctuation.

29. As Neumann (note to 11 19, 17; N 11 35) points out, notlich, which I have rendered as "overwhelmed," is used by Mechthild to refer to the soul or God's (overwhelming) love at the point of mystical ecstasy.

30. In I 1 above, Lady Love also addressed the soul as her mistress and queen.

31. Cf. 2 Cor 12:2-4.

32. I have not translated this last clause in line with the reading that Neumann, despite misgivings (note to 51 ; 11 19, N 11 36), has decided to retain. A literal translation of that reading would indicate that the soul deceives the senses. Taking the context into consideration and the translation of the clause offered in the Lux div., it seems likely that Mechthild wants to say that, in this heaven created by the devil, either the senses are themselves deceived, or they deceive the soul.

33. Cf. 2 Cor 11:14.

34. I have omitted two lines after "Three Persons" that Neumann puts in brackets because they were clearly not written by Mechthild. Translation: "which begin thus: God's true greeting, coming from the heavenly flood." This is a reference to the opening line of I 2 above.

35. Another of Mechthild's references to herself as a dog. Cf. 11 3 above.

36. See Book II, note 28 above.

37. The Lux div. introduced this chapter with "In raptu..." (In a rapture,...).

38. The Seraphim are those in the highest order of angels. The lowest order is made up of those simply called angels.

39. Concerning a sword piercing Mary's soul, cf. Lk 2:35.

40. That is, clerics and/or members of religious orders.

41. Cf. Mt 14:1-12 and Mk 6:14-29.

42. John the Evangelist, the disciple "whom Jesus loved" and who at the Last Supper "was lying close to the breast of Jesus" (Jn 13:23), was in medieval times considered the mystic among the apostles. His symbol was the eagle, which, according to medieval lore, was the only animal that could look directly at the sun and not go blind. In like manner, John was thought to be able to look into the Godhead and not go blind.

43. Cf. 2 Cor 12:2-4.

44. Cf. Acts 7:54-60.

45. The word in the text, petze, is a corruption of the Latin pax (peace) and refers to the kiss of peace in the mass or to the object (crucifix or image of Christ) that the celebrant passed around to be kissed after the recitation of the "Lamb of God."

46. Cf. Jer 30:12.

47. Cf. Mt 8:4

48. The whole exchange between Mechthild and the devil is modeled on Christ's temptation in the wilderness. Cf. Mt 4:1-10; Mk 1:12-13; and Lk 4:1-13.

49. That is, by love.

50. Schmidt (notes 85 and 87, p. 363) points out Mechthild's probable dependence on Richard of St. Victor's De quattuor gradibus violentiae caritatis (On the Four Steps of Violent Love) for her concept of "bound love."

51. Cf. Jb 7:5 and 30:30.

52. In love poetry to break off or pluck flowers is frequently an allusion to loss of virginity.

53. This is perhaps a reference to her writing the FL.

54. For the apples, cf. Sg 2:3-5. The tree in most medieval interpretations of the Song of Songs is the cross of Christ. Concerning color symbolism, see Horst Laubner, Studien zum geistlichen Sinngehalt des Adjektivs im Werk Mechthilds von Magdeburg (Göppingen: Kummerle, 1975), 41-48.

55. Because this line is missing in a good manuscript (B) and in the Lux div., and because its meaning in this context is unclear, it may not be authentic. Cf. note to 11 25, 129; N 11 45.

56. These two final lines occur only in the Lux div. In the critical edition Neumann offers a Middle High German reconstruction of them (translated here).

57. That is, because I am trying to honor you by writing this book.

58. These last three words succinctly describe the three major difficulties Mechthild faces in seeking acceptance for her book: 1. Learned: she has little education. 2. Religious: she does not belong to a religious order approved by and under the jurisdiction of the church. 3. Man: women in general found it difficult to be taken as speaking with authority. Thus arises the need to insist that God is the book's author.

59. The gospel passage providing the foundation for this entire speech by God is Matthew 11:26/Luke 10:21-22.

60. The sentence up to this point presents some textual difficulties. How many writers are indicated? What does Mechthild mean by "write after me"? Neumann has chosen to rely heavily on the Lux div. in attempting to establish the critical text. The Lux div. speaks of writers (plural) and has them writing (conscripterint; most likely a future perfect indicative) after Mechthild (post me). Conscribere can indicate either the act of writing according to a model or text, or the act of taking down dictation (note to 11 26, 34 f.; N 11 46 and Neumann 1964, 183-86).

Book III

1. That is, the empty space left by the fallen angels.

2. For an extended study of this chapter, see Petrus Tax, "Die große Himmelsschau Mechthilds von Magdeburg und ihre Hollenvision," Zeitschrift für deutsches Altertum und deutsche Literatur 108 (1979), 112-25.

3. This is a ceremonial greeting. Schmidt (note 98, p. 365) describes a picture in a ms in Einsiedeln (Cod. Eins. 710, fol. 20b) of Christ laying his right hand on the breast of the soul represented as a nun. She has her left hand resting on his right shoulder.

4. Cf. Walther von der Vogelweide's Under der linden, where the girl asks: "Did he kiss me?" (Kust er mich?); to which she immediately supplies the answer: "Yes indeed, a thousand times." Schmidt (note 100, pp. 365-66) gives examples of occurrences of the divine kiss in medieval religious writings.

5. God, a spiritual being, creates or makes by giving a command with words; e.g., "Let there be light" (Gn 1:3).

6. Tax, "Himmelsschau," p. 117, interprets this to mean that a whole tenth (and highest) choir fell together with Lucifer.

7. This short sentence probably means that some angels from the other nine choirs fell with Lucifer as well.

8. Tax, "Himmelsschau," p. 117, considers desolation (das ellende) to be a synonym for breach (bruch). But perhaps it is better to think of it as the upper reaches of the breach. Cf. also Schmidt, note 103, p. 366.

9. The song of the virgins that one would expect here is absent from all mss.

10. That is, they have not yet assumed their places on the chairs.

11. First in ascending order.

12. That is, in the choir totally vacated by Lucifer and those closest to him.

13. Christ arose from the dead in the perfect manhood of someone thirty years old. All redeemed Christians shall rise from the dead as thirty year olds. But the unbaptized children shall not rise from the dead in the same manner as the faithful elect.

14. That is, the body.

15. Exactly what Mechthild means by this allusion is not clear. The Middle High German word used here to describe the dog is edel (noble), but the Lux div. translates edel with crudelior (fiercer). Perhaps that conception is that a dog with good bloodlines is a better watchdog or hunter.

16. This concluding paragraph offers a clever defense against possible objections: first, by calling to mind the evangelical injunction to become as guileless children and not take on the legalistic attitudes of the Pharisees; and, second, by stating that God is the chapter's primary author. Perhaps already at this stage of her writing Mechthild was experiencing attacks by detractors, or perhaps she added this paragraph later.

17. Mechthild here addresses the bride in the Song of Songs.

18. Cf. Sg 2:17.

19. That is, that wisdom teach me moderation.

20. That is, the Annunciation.

21. That is, that she cannot be present at the recitation of the Divine Office.

22. That is, from celebrating mass.

23. That is, if a priest in serious sin celebrates mass, the mass is valid but the priest sins mortally.

24. The image (plucking) is that of the Trinity as a stringed instrument.

25. The word hanttrfiwe (solemn assurance) means literally hand-loyalty; i.e., faithfulness promised by some formal gesture with the hand. It is used in reference to the faithfulness promised by the groom to the bride at the wedding ceremony. Cf. note to 111 9, 52; N 11 56.

26. The prophets frequently called Israel a whore for being unfaithful to its God. Cf., for example, Is 1:21; Jer 3:6-10; and Ez 16 and 23.

27. The Lux div. reads "mystical temple of Solomon."

28. The following chapter is filled with allusions to the accounts of the passion and death of Christ given in the gospels.

29. I have rendered mit heliger itelheit by "in holy simplicity." However, as Neumann (note to 111 10, 22; N 11 57-58) points out, the phrase is troublesome for several reasons. Another possible reading is "in hellish vanity."

30. Neumann's (note to III 10, 29; N 11 58) best guess for this difficult word (minnelouffe) is to relate it to the chase or hunt imagery of the Song of Songs, imagery that appears also in 11 25 above.

31. Mechthild seems to be saying that "that," i.e., receiving communion despite her feelings of unworthiness, is no more a hindrance to her glorifying God in so doing than it is to use an oven to bake. Just as an oven fulfills its purpose through baking, she fulfills hers by accomplishing in herself God's goodness. And to do so, she must receive communion.

32. This is in Latin in the text: Puer natus est nobis (Is 9:6). It is from the introit of the third mass of the Feast of the Nativity of the Lord.

33. That is, those in purgatory.

34. That is, members of the clergy and/or religious orders.

35. A venia is a complete prostration performed while praying.

36. A discipline is a whip made of cord for penitential practices.

37. That is, female members of religious orders and beguines.

38. That is, fellow members of my order.

39. The biblical imagery most similar to that in this chapter would seem to be Paul's in Ephesians 6:11-17.

40. The final section of this sentence is hopelessly corrupt in ms E. The Lux div. preserves a vestige of the image of mutual illumination between God and creature found elsewhere. The final three words of the critical edition are "in das mine" (into mine). I have rendered them literally and think that mine means my (God's) heart, parallel to creatures' hearts mentioned earlier in the sentence.

41. That is, with God, or familiarity with divine things.

42. I have translated "gegen dem ewigen gotte" by "face to face with God eternal." Although face to face may seem at first an unnecessary addition, I think it is warranted because, in the standard medieval view of Moses, which goes back to Augustine (De genesi ad litteram 12, cap. 27, n. 55; PL 34, 477-78), this prophet's exalted position rested on his being the only Old Testament figure to have seen God face to face. The preposition gegen employed by Mechthild instead of the more usual mit (with) seems to imply this traditional thought concerning Moses.

43. That is, the Song of Songs, whose author was believed to be Solomon.

44. Cf. Sg 4:7.

45. Cf. Jer 31:22. Patristic theology considered this passage to be a prophecy of the Incarnation.

46. Cf. Dn 14:30.

47. For a detailed analysis of this chapter, see Tax, "Himmelsschau," pp. 126-36.

48. A medieval reader would most likely see this as an allusion to the city of the devil, or Babylon, as described by Augustine in his City of God.

49. "High spirit" (hoher muot) is a conventional term in courtly poetry and describes the feeling of exhilaration one should feel because one is a member of such a worthy society. Thus, Mechthild seems to be condemning courtly literature as a frivolous pursuit that distracts from serious spiritual concerns.

50. Such effects of a powerful vision have a long tradition. Cf., for example, Dn 7:28; 8:27; and 10:7-9.

51. The neo-Platonic influence and perhaps heretical implications of the soul's origin emanating from this passage need not be taken with complete theological seriousness. Content here is clearly being influenced by Mechthild's striving for rhyme and lyrical effect.

52. Mechthild seems to be saying that limbo (or Abraham's bosom), where those pre-Christian figures destined for heaven, such as Adam, Eve, Moses, the prophets, etc., had to wait until saved by Christ's redemptive act, was converted into the worst part of purgatory after Christ's ascension. Just as Mechthild condemns Christians to a worse punishment than non-Christians, so also does she consign prominent Christians who barely avoided hell to this "renovated" limbo.

53. That is, what we have not done penance for on earth has to be atoned for hereafter.

54. That is, they have repented and confessed their sins, but have never done penance for them.

55. The Lux div. translates this phrase by "sine medio" (directly). Perhaps the image is that of the soul at death escaping the body through the mouth.

56. The critical edition has a period here and joins the following clause to the next sentence. I find it much more difficult to come up with a satisfactory reading following that punctuation. Schmidt (p. 113) punctuates as I do.

57. Neumann (note to 111 23; N 11 64) remarks that this chapter has no corresponding chapter in the Lux div. and was probably moved here from Book VII.

58. The soul's final speech marks her as a courtly lover pursuing her beloved. Her love consists in desire rather than in fulfillment. She is willing to suffer anything to attain her goal, but she knows, as does, say, the poet Reinmar von Hagenau, that her basic manner of bearing herself is to be one of faithful waiting.

59. Here Mechthild expresses a thought that recalls lines of a poem by Walther von der Vogelweide (Herzeliebe frouwelin) in which he states that it is not beauty that causes love but rather love that causes one to be beautiful: "Liebe machet schoene wip" (Love makes women beautiful).

Book IV

1. Neumann (note to IV 2, 101-3; N 11 66) thinks these last two sentences might well have been added by Mechthild later, as she was editing her work.

2. Schmidt (p. 125) translates die cristanheit with "the church" (die Kirche). I have chosen the more literal "Christianity." Clearly, however, the two concepts are almost identical in Mechthild's thinking.

3. These three words are in Latin in the text: "Ego sum Jhesus."

4. Mechthild seems to be indicating here that she went into ecstasy.

5. That is, the cupidity's desire.

6. That is, the spiritual authority Christ gave to Peter and his other disciples to bind and to absolve. Cf. Mt 16:18-19; 18:18; and Jn 20:23.

7. Neumann (note to IV 3, 37; N 11 67) explains that this refers to Christ's sitting at the right hand of the Father.

8. A more literal translation would be: "and her nostrils are stuffed with sweet violets." I doubt, however, that such a rendering captures the spirit of the image.

9. I have rendered "die gruenen wissen lylien" (green white lilies) as "verdant white lilies" and "das wisse gruene morgenrot" (the white green dawn) as "the pale green dawn" because a literal translation leads to confusion about the colors. However, as Mechthild continues her allegorical description, it is important to realize that green and white have already been explicitly mentioned twice.

10. The Trinity is threefold and one, like an eye that is made up of white (Father); green, i.e., the iris (Son); and light, i.e., the pupil (Holy Spirit).

11. Neumann (note to IV 3, 60; N 11 68) explains horn as a corner of the battlements and remarks that Mechthild is here exploiting the tradition of the fortress of love allegory frequently occurring in courtly poetry, but that she adds to it by employing technical terms of military engineering. Schmidt (note 144, p. 375) notes the implied reference to the Trinity in the threefold horn and recalls the symbolic meaning of the horn among the ancient Assyrians, Babylonians, and Hebrews as well as the horns on the head of Moses in Christian art.

12. That is, members of religious orders.

13. That is, the gift of the wisdom from the natural faculties.

14. The verse form Mechthild chooses for this chapter, except for the last few lines, resembles the couplet, though the lines vary in the number of feet, and not all couplets rhyme.

15. The "it" refers to false consolation.

16. This should probably be interpreted to mean: the possibility that I might sin in the future.

17. Probably an offering connected with a successful harvest.

18. Just what the four kinds of offerings are is not self-evident. Neumann (note to IV 9, 3; N 11 70) suggests: for mass, for bringing communion to the sick, for the last anointing, and at harvest time.

19. Here Mechthild is drawing on the tradition of the dawn song, which expresses the sadness of the lovers because, after a night together, they must separate. Cf. also, Sg 3:1.

20. That is, the souls in purgatory.

21. That is, the lowest joy in heaven.

22. 1 Jn 3:2.

23. Translation: We praise you, God.

24. That is, Mechthild.

25. A very confusing sentence that puzzles the commentators. The Lux div. seems to interpret it to mean that, if the Second Person had been flesh before the Annunciation, flesh would have been a beginning or principle of the Second Person's nature or being. This is what is then denied.

26. That is, the more virtuous we are on earth, the higher is the rank of the angels we are given as vassals in heaven.

27. The Lux div. interprets this specifically to mean "take up the life of a beguine."

28. Instead of claws, this might mean "with sharp points on its horns." See Neumann, note to IV 7, 9; N 11 74-75.

29. This entire chapter is obviously modeled on the traditions of the bestiaries (German: Philologus). These were works treating real and fabled animals by listing their (often merely imputed or imagined) characteristics, which were then allegorized in a moral or theological vein.

30. The word in the text is empfangen, which can mean both "to receive" and "to conceive."

31. Schmidt (note 164, p. 379) suggests that the fish is Christ. From early Christian times the fish was a symbol for Christ.

32. Neumann (note to IV 18, 99; N 11 77) explains this clause as referring to the public ceremony during which relics of the saints were held up for veneration.

33. The name in German: Alles Nictze.

34. The Lux div. introduces this chapter with this addition: "The beginning of the order was on fire with glowing divine love and, while it shone in the faultlessness of external purity, it gave forth, as it were, the fragrance of lilies, and it knew nothing of hypocrisy. Clothed in true simplicity, it was bright with beauty."

35. This refers no doubt to the Dominicans as confessors and praises them for being theologically schooled enough to carry out their duties in the confessional knowledgeably and with good judgment.

36. The Lux div. introduces this chapter with the following addition: "I was in the habit of visiting the graves of deceased pious people and of greeting them as though they were God's household servants."

37. That is, Mechthild.

38. The clarification about the length of time is necessary because the text does not say "a week" but rather "fourteen time periods" (vierzehn stunde).

39. The Lux div. gives the name of the sister: Oda.

40. The word burial in this chapter heading either means something like "lying in state" or rests on a reading in ms E that says that John's body lies and is buried (. and begraben) which Neumann (note to IV 23, 3; N 11 79), following the Lux div., has emended to "lies unburied" (unbegraben)

41. Creation is a literal translation (schoepfnisse). Mechthild seems to be using the phrase "creation of the eternal kingdom" to denote heaven as a place or space with a clear but thin border between it and what is beneath it.

42. The orthodoxy of this statement is questionable. Usually the knowledge that their punishment will come to an end is seen as the decisive difference between those in purgatory and those in hell.

43. See above 111 21.

44. The Lux div. introduces this chapter with the following remarks, which are the basis for the claim that Mechthild had a brother who became a Dominican: "Brother Baldwin, brother by blood of Sister Mechthild, was brought up from childhood in good manners and was instructed in all virtues. In addition, he strove by his own industry to attain learning and was steeped in scholastic training. Finally, because of the merits of his sister, he was received into the Order of Preachers. Here he made such progress in virtue and knowledge that his brothers promoted him to the office of subprior, though against his will. He was so weighed down by this that, though he was young and strong, his bodily strength began to deteriorate."

45. That is, members of a new religious order.

46. That is, members of the order are not to travel alone.

47. In Mechthild's day this would be from November 1 to February 22.

48. Cf. Jn 12:3; Mt 26:7; and Mk 14:3.

49. That is, ordinary Christians should anoint the feet of the members of this new order, but only men should do this anointing because the members of this order are not God.

50. English: I believe in God.

51. The German word meister (master) means primarily a teacher or professor but, as this chapter also seems to imply, someone who wields authority, such as a religious superior.

52. These last two sentences seem to be saying that the founder of this new order, the son of the king of Rome, shall be authorized by the pope to write a rule for the new order, which then receives the pope's approval. Mechthild's prophecy of a new religious order may have been very controversial. It seems to reflect the prophetic writings of the Calabrian abbot Joachim of Fiore (c. 1135-1202), who foretold the appearance of a new and more perfect religious order in the coming new age. Joachim's views on the Trinity were condemned by the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 and, in a perhaps not unrelated move, the founding of new religious orders was also prohibited.

53. That is, Jesus and his twelve apostles.

54. That is, by Judas. See Mt 26:15. The selling of Jesus is called "blessed," most likely in line with the felix culpa tradition. Adam's fall (culpa) was fortunate (felix) because it resulted in the elevation of the human race by causing the Word to become flesh. The selling of Christ can be seen in this same light.

55. Also in her elaborations on the last days, the Antichrist, and the return of Enoch and Elijah, Mechthild seems to have been greatly influenced by Joachim of Fiore. For more on this, see Schmidt, note 1 81, pp. 382-83; and Bernard McGinn, The Calabrian Abbot: Joachim of Fiore in the History of Western Thought (New York: Macmillan, 1985).

56. Elijah (cf. 2 Kgs 2:11-12) and Enoch (cf. Gn 5:24 and the pseudoepigraphical book of Enoch) were both taken up to heaven (or, for Mechthild, to paradise) without dying. Hence the common belief that they shall come back to earth in the last days.

57. That is, Enoch and Elijah.

Book V

1. Neumann (note to V 1, 24 f.; N 11 83) points out that the Lux div. modifies this passage concerning the angels and omits the names of the two highest ranks, probably because Mechthild's words could cause some concern as to the orthodoxy of her conception of the angels.

2. That is, the angels.

3. Concerning innate and acquired chastity in the soul: The former is no doubt that of Adam and Eve before the fall. This is the more perfect chastity and thus is put on the same level as the highest angels, the Seraphim. Acquired chastity, the best that humans can achieve since the fall, shines into the second highest choir, the Cherubim. On the sources for Mechthild's views on the angels, see note to V I, 27-33; N 11 83-84; and Schmidt, note 184, pp. 384-85.

4. That is, the Seraphim.

5. That is, souls.

6. Augustine's doctrine of original sin and its consequences for human sexuality are the most likely sources for Mechthild's statements about "marriage blood." According to the Bishop of Hippo, since the fall sexual intercourse is evil because it causes disorder in the human person. Passion overwhelms reason. Marriage, however, legitimizes sexual pleasure, which, nevertheless, remains disordering and hence evil in itself.

7. That is, the soul.

8. Kurt Ruh, "Mechthild von Magdeburg and Wichmann von Arnstein," Zeitschrift für deutsches Altertum und deutsche Literatur 120 (1991), 322-25, has discovered Mechthild's probable source for this unusual image of the soul under Lucifer's tail: the Magdeburg Dominican Wickmann of Arnstein, a contemporary of Mechthild and author of mystical writings.

9. Schmidt (note 157, p. 379) assumes the influence of Heinrich of Halle here because Mechthild so carefully distinguishes filial fear, which is still possible in heaven, from servile fear, which is not.

10. That is, I was following God's plan of redemption in coming to earth.

11. That is, though spiritually dead through mortal sin, they still live on earth and may be saved.

12. Cf. Jn 11:17-44.

13. The scriptural basis for this paragraph is probably Matthew 27:51-53. Schmidt (note 189, p. 385) lists many medieval theologians who were of the opinion that others arose from the grave and ascended into heaven when Christ did.

14. That is, the juice from the apple and the cursed blood.

15. That is, the name one receives upon entering religious life.

16. The Lux div. introduces this chapter with the following addition: "Brother Heinrich, named 'of Halle,' lector at Ruppín, having wondered at the sayings and writings of Sister Mechthild, received the following response from her."

17. Cf. Acts 2:3-7

18. Cf. Ex 3:6.

19. This is a reference to the role of young Daniel in saving Susanna from the elders, as related in the Book of Susanna. Cf. especially verses 44-63. The Lux div. concludes this chapter with the following addition: "This learned and good man, the aforementioned lector, collected all the writings of this Mechthild and put them together in one volume and divided it into six parts, as it now appears to those reading it. Sister Mechthild, who survived him, saw his soul in the sight of the Lord in heaven holding this book in his hand and rejoicing with his face radiant. For through the writing down of this book he attained for himself many rewards. Through them he appeared full of glory in the sight of the saints."

20. That is, by being truly sorry for our sins.

21. "Sinner" is feminine in the text and no doubt refers to Mechthild.

22. The words "over all humankind" appear in some manuscripts after "judgment" but are not considered authentic by Neumann (V 22, 7: N 1 172).

23. The following sentence appearing in some manuscripts "That is God's heart; alas for my guilty pain!" is not considered authentic by Neumann (V 22, 46-47; N 1 174).

24. Cf. Lk 1:38. Mechthild phrases Mary's reply to the angel in more courtly fashion than does the biblical text.

25. Cf. Lk 1:46-48.

26. That is, those gifts brought by the three wise men.

27. Lk 2:22-24. Mechthild's concern seems to be: Why did Mary give an offering of two pigeons, the traditional offering of poorer people, and not a lamb, since they were suddenly rich because of the gifts of the three wise men?

28. The Lux div. explains this by adding "not be stoned as adulteresses according to the law. Schmidt (note 207, pp. 387-88) thinks these remarks about virgins would also call to mind for the medieval audience the legend about St. Nicholas: that he gave money to the father of three young sisters and thus saved them from having to become prostitutes.

29. A hunger cloth (hungerlachen or hungertuch) was a veil or curtain that was hung in front of the altars or in front of the sanctuary during Lent as a symbol of mourning and penance. It was often covered with rich, symbolic embroideries.

30. That is, during the time of the Old Testament.

31. The vertical gold stripe down the middle of the hunger cloth and the horizontal green border encrusted with gems form a cross.

32. Cf. Jn 20:1.

33. That is on Pentecost. Cf. Acts 2:1-4.

34. The mountain is Christ. Cf. 11 21 above. The tree bearing the mountain is the cross.

35. That is, the mountain.

36. That is, by becoming man the Son reconciled humanity to God. Cf. 1 Jn 2:1-2.

37. That is, he was married and belonged to a third order, either Franciscan or, more likely, Dominican. He probably ended his days in a religious house in Magdeburg. Mechthild is surprised to see the crowns of virgins over someone who was not a virgin. Neumann (note to V 28, 7; N 11 103) remarks that the crowns are suspended over his head. He is not actually wearing them, as is Sister Hildegund in 11 20 above.

38. The two prayer titles are in Latin in the text: Miserere mei dens and Pater roster.

39. St. Elizabeth of Hungary (1207-31) was canonized in 1234.

40. St. Dominic (c. 1170-1221) was canonized in 1234.

41. St. Francis (1181/82-1226) was canonized in 1228.

42. St. Peter was a Dominican who worked among the Catharists in Lombardy and Tuscany. He was murdered in 1252 and canonized in 1253.

43. That is, Mechthild.

44. Jutta of Sangerhausen, a noblewoman, after her husband had died on a pilgrimage to Palestine and her children had entered religious life, took the veil and served the poor and lepers. In 1260 she went to Prussia as a hermitess to work for the spread of Christianity. She died in 1264 and was later venerated there as a saint.

45. This sentence stands at the beginning of the preamble to Book I and thus serves as an introduction to the entire FL. See the preamble to Book I.

46. That is, participation in Christ's suffering and death.

47. That is, preserves one in faith and redemption until one attains glory in heaven.

48. This last phrase is in Latin in the text: Per dominum nostrum, jhesum Christum filium tuum.

Book VI

1. See Book III, note 35 above.

2. The text reads "his lord apostles." But Neumann (note to VI 1, 70; N 11 110) thinks lord is not original and suggests replacing it with holy, which I have done.

3. That is, with concern that we do not waste much time on them because they are temporary.

4. The next few lines allude to the often allegorized parable of the Good Samaritan in Luke 10:30-37.

5. The Lux div. identifies this person as "Dietrich, the venerable deacon of the church of Magdeburg."

6. The final phrase is in Latin in the text: per dominum nostrum.

7. That is, the canon in the previous chapter.

8. In the original, boeke (rams) can refer to male sheep, goats, chamois, etc. Given the function of the image of goats in the gospels and in popular tradition, I am assuming that Mechthild is referring to male goats.

9. The Lux div. introduces this chapter with the words: "When she had grown old, Sister Mechthild said:..."

10. This is an indication that Mechthild served at one time as the head of a beguine community.

11. Schmidt (note 245, p. 391) considers this last sentence to be an obvious addition by Heinrich of Halle.

12. The Lux div. interprets this to mean the act of honoring the saints in conjunction with all Christians.

13. Carenae were periods of additional fasting that could be imposed by bishops or abbots for serious sins. Cf. note to VI 10, 4; N 11118.

14. Neumann (note to VI 10, 7-8; N 11 118) assumes that the bracketed words were added later to the text.

15. That is, out of fear of what people might think and say if he left mass early.

16. The chapter heading is clearly incomplete. This rendering translates Neumann's attempt to restore it. Most likely the first part of the chapter has also been lost. The Lux div. introduces the chapter with the following information: "A certain student of good morals, devoted to God, and a blood relative of mine was struck with insanity and the loss of reason with God's consent and in his inscrutable dispensation; and he remained bereft of senses and mind to the very end of his life. I had considered him to be suitable for religious life and intimacy with God. Thus I was inwardly quite disturbed by the course of events. I prayed to God for him." Since such concrete references to people or events are rare in the German text, Neumann (note to VI 11, 1; N 11 118) assumes a missing introductory sentence along the following lines: "I prayed to our Lord for a student who lost his mind and whose nature was dead while he went on living."

17. This first phrase of the quotation (Mt 25:34) is in Latin in the text: Venite, benedicti patris mei. The last part is from Matthew 25:41.

18. That is, the senses refuse to turn inward from the external distractions they are drawn to and thus hinder God's activity in the soul.

19. Neumann (note to VI 13, 18; N 1 220) does not consider this phrase authentic.

20. That is, to spare the body the exhausting intensity of contemplative experiences and raptures that render it useless for external pastoral activities.

21. Concerning Enoch, Elijah, and the last brothers/preachers, see IV 27 and Book IV, note 55 above.

22. For literature on the traditions of God as a mirror, see Schmidt, note 19, p. 349.

23. According to medieval thought, the human soul is what is created in the "image and likeness" of God. Cf. Gn 1:26.

24. The soul of Christ, in saying "he," is referring to the "human" Christ.

25. That is, by becoming human, Christ ennobled human nature.

26. The image of the cross of Christ as the key opening the gates of heaven has a long tradition. See note to VI 16, 44 f.; N 11123.

27. The Lux div. begins this chapter with: "The Lord says:..."

28. Neumann (note to VI 21, 1 f.; N II 125) does not consider the bracketed words to be authentic.

29. That is, the clergy.

30. This probably refers to the higher clergy.

31. See IV 27; VI 15; and Book IV, note 55 above. See also note to VI 21, 2; N 11 125-26.

32. The reigns of the popes around this time were Innocent IV (1243-54), Alexander IV (1254-61), Urban IV (1261-64), Clement IV (1265-68), Gregory X (1271-76), Innocent V (1276), Hadrian V (1276), John XXI (1276-77), and Nicholas III (1277-80). Hence this chapter may have been written during the reign of Nicholas III.

33. This chapter is the same as VII 45. I have followed Neumann in placing it there.

34. This sentence is confusing. The Lux div. renders it thus: "Why, Lord, did you have to suffer such huge torments since in your pure prayer [in the garden of Gethsemane] the precious drops running down to the ground would have been sufficient to make reparation for the whole world." Implication: there was really no need for Christ to suffer more after that.

35. In calling those who do not love "schemers against love" (varer der minne), Mechthild is using the vocabulary of courtly-love poetry. Varerare those at court who are jealous of the happiness the lovers enjoy in loving and who do what they can to make their love public and thus destroy it.

36. This last sentence, taken from Luke 23:46, is in Latin in the text: in manes tuas commendo spiritism meum.

37. Cf. Mt 25:41.

38. The sense seems to be: If God were to give me the necessary virtue, I would gladly perform the good work connected with it.

39. See I 44 above, in a speech of the soul toward the close of the chapter.

40. And on earth and in purgatory these two things-suffering and bliss-are both continuously present together.

41. For some secondary literature on God as a circle, see Neumann (notes on umbezil and unbegriffenlich to VI 31; N II 132-33) and Schmidt (note 267, pp. 393-94).

42. That is, in battle against the desires of the flesh.

43. Chapter, as used here, is a regularly held meeting of a religious community, during which part of the rule is usually read and, among other things, matters of religious discipline settled.

44. I have followed the text in keeping the person holding strict chapter with himself masculine to this point. With the introduction of a she, Mechthild most likely wishes to reveal that she has been speaking of herself throughout.

45. Cf. the Song of Solomon, especially 2:10 and 13.

46. This chapter is a response to criticisms against Mechthild: that the experience she describes in II 4 above is theologically untenable and, by implication, not an authentic experience because she describes John the Baptist, who was never ordained a priest, celebrating mass.

47. Cf. Jn 1:29-34.

48. The words from the gospel of John (1:29 and 36) are in Latin in the text: Ecce agnus dei.

49. This final phrase Burch dine here name dri (for the sake of your three glorious names) bears striking resemblance, especially because of the similarities in unusual word order, to a line in Walther von der Vogelweide's Palastinialied: "durch die sine namen dri" (for the sake of his three names). The purpose of Walther's song is to recruit crusaders to go and free Jerusalem from the infidel. Given the similarity of Mechthild's sentiments, she may well be trying to recall Walther's song to the minds of her audience.

50. The last words are in Latin in the text: Requiescant in pace. Amen.

51. Neumann (note to VI 37, 63; N II 139) comments that, if this chapter was written before Mechthild entered the Cistercian convent at Helfta, "companions" (gaden) refers to the beguines with whom she lived.

52. Another example of Mechthild using "greeting" (gruos) to refer to ecstatic experience. Cf., for example, I 2 above.

53. This you is in the plural (ir).

54. The bracketed words are not considered authentic by Neumann. See note to VI 41, 7: N II 141.

55. These final two chapters are not listed in the table of contents and were probably added later.

56. This chapter, which is not included in the Lux div., is generally considered to have been added by an editor.

57. The final phrase is in Latin in the text: Deo gratias.

Book VII

1. Cf. Rv 14:4. This chapter draws heavily on images from the Book of Revelation.

2. Neumann (note to VII 1, 93; N 11 143) refers to Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica, I, q. 35, a. 1 and 2, in connection with Mechthild's calling the humanity of Christ an "intelligible image (begriffenlich bilde) of his eternal Godhead."

3. See Book VI, note 22 above.

4. That is, the blessed.

5. This "he" is confusing. One expects "they," i.e., Father and Son.

6. Ps. 112:1. In Latin in the text: Laudate pueri dominum.

7. I have followed Neumann's punctuation here. Schmidt (p. 273) changes the punctuation and the meaning of the ambiguous ih̄t and comes up with a rendering that is at least equally plausible. Her translation translated: "Alas, wretched ones, as long as we storm around in anger, there is nothing (ih̄t) good about us. We must then return again and again to our heart."

8. A reference to Mechthild's joining the Cistercian sisters at the convent in Helfta. There is general agreement that this happened in about 1270 or 1271.

9. In Latin in the text: Te deum laudamus.

10. The chapter room in a religious house (cf. Book VI, note 43 above) is here being used by Mechthild as a symbol for the activities of the conscience.

11. From here through "Glory be to the Father and the Son" the text is in Latin: Adiutorium nostrum in nomine domini. Laudate dominum omnes gentes. Gloriatur et filius. Regnum mundi. Eructavit cor. Quem vidi. Gloria patri et filio. These are all responses in the Divine Office sung on various feast days.

12. Mt 5:3. In Latin in the text: Beati pauperes spiritu.

13. This sentence is not contained in the main manuscript tradition. However, Neumann (note to VII 13, 17; N 11 148-49) does not exclude the possibility that it is authentic, especially since it serves nicely as a bridge between what immediately precedes and follows it.

14. That is, the mirror.

15. That is, the hours at which members of a religious community assembled to sing the Divine Office.

16. The first five lines, excluding "Lord Jesus Christ," also introduce V 20 above.

17. That is, before receiving holy communion.

18. This you is in the plural and is no doubt addressed to the sisters of the Cistercian community of Helfta, which Mechthild had joined. Helfta was known for the high level of learning among its members.

19. Cf. 1 Cor 2:9.

20. In Latin in the text: Gloria tibi trinitas!

21. In Latin in the text: Salve regina!

22. The antecedent of "She" is most likely the world. The noun world is feminine in German. Also, Lady World (frouwe welt) occurs frequently in medieval art and literature as a temptress poisoning the soul.

23. Schmidt (note 292, p. 397) sees King Gustav Adolf of Nassau's military campaigns in Saxony and Thuringia as being the historical events prompting this chapter. These campaigns took place in 1294. This would mean that Mechthild died after 1294. Neumann (1964, 197-99) makes a case for earlier military activities being Mechthild's point of reference and puts Mechthild's death in about 1282.

24. That is, the positive results of war.

25. Neumann (note to VII 33, 11; N II 154) is convinced that the numbering of the spices became confused in transmission. He thinks that Mechthild wished to enumerate five spices that would allude mystically to the five wounds of Christ. The five spices would be: willing suffering, patient suffering, holy intimacy, perseverance in suffering, and joy in suffering.

26. That is, the seven penitential psalms.

27. Ps 6:1. In Latin in the text: Domine ne in furore.

28. Ps 32:1. In Latin in the text: Beati quorum remissa.

29. Ps 38:1. In Latin in the text: Domine ne in furore.

30. Ps 51:1. In Latin in the text: Miserere mei deus.

31. Ps 102:1. In Latin in the text: Domine, exaudi orationem meam et clamor.

32. Ps 130:1. In Latin in the text: De profundis clamo.

33. It was often the custom in the Middle Ages for a bride to receive a gift from her new husband on the morning after the wedding night. In the Nibelungenlied, for example, Siegfried gives the Nibelungen treasure to Kriemhild as her "morning gift."

34. Ps 143:1. In Latin in the text: Domine, exaudi orationem meam auribus percipe.

35. Schmidt (note 298, p. 400) notes that allegorical use of the convent is frequent in medieval spiritual writing, but that Mechthild's is the first to occur in German and that a clear relationship to a source has not been demonstrated.

36. It is not really clear in the course of the next several lines just what these "four things" are. Also, the noun to which "it(s)" refers in the following three lines is not clear from the original text.

37. CE Rv 14:4.

38. Possible alternate rendering: "That they are here fills me with joy."

39. Schmidt (note 300, p. 400) refers to Psalm 51:5: "Behold, I was brought forth in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me" and to the problem of unknowingly becoming involved in guilt, as it is treated by Wolfram of Eschenbach in Parzival and Willehalm. Another medieval line of thought that might provide the background for Mechthild's statement is the Augustinian doctrine of original sin, which often documented its claim of human sinfulness before birth by referring to this psalm verse. For more on this and its consequences for an influential medieval view on human sexuality, see, for example, John T. Noonan, Jr., Contraception. A History of Its Treatment by the Catholic Theologians and Canonists (Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1965).

40. That is, to where a person with a pure soul lies dying.

41. The devils bested by the soul respond to their master Satan.

42. Satan's growling and gnashing are his angry response to what his minions have just reported to him.

43. Mechthild is here drawing on medieval secular love poetry, which frequently expressed similar ideas in similar form. One of the best-known such poems in German is:

If all the world were mine
From the sea to the Rhine,
I would renounce it
That the Queen of England
Might lie in my arms.

Translated from Poets of the Minnesang, ed. Olive Sayce (Oxford, 1967), p. 2.

44. Schmidt (note 303, p. 400) sees this mention of forty years as evidence for the view that Mechthild died after 1290, since it is generally agreed that Mechthild started writing in 1250 and her writings are what made her known. Those favoring the time around 1282 as the time of her death could counter that Mechthild knew this clergyman for some time before she began writing and that the harm he caused Mechthild, mentioned later in this chapter, could have come after they have been acquainted for several years. Also, a mere five chapters before this one, at the beginning of VII 36 above, Mechthild says she has been writing for thirty years.

45. That is, if I could still have productive sorrow for my failings, as one can before death but not here in purgatory.

46. This chapter appears twice in ms E, once as VI 22 and here. Cf. Book VI, note 33 above.

47. For these three lines I have adopted Schmidt's (p. 316) punctuation. Neumann (VII 45, 15-17; N 1 291) has no punctuation after the first them, which turns the lines into an anacoluthon.

48. Neumann (note to VII 45, 22; N 11 159) considers this line to be a later addition, and not by Mechthild.

49. Cf. Jn 14:23.

50. Given the problems faced by Mechthild in defending her book against charges that it contained heretical statements, it is not surprising to see her in her later years taking a very clear stand on the question of unorthodox teachings. Here she distances herself from those who claim that the soul can become so holy that it may, as it were, enter the Trinity. (It would be possible to bring such a charge against Mechthild herself, given the vision she describes in 111 9!) According to Neumann (note to VII 47, 18; N 11 160) the final sentence of this chapter takes a position against teachings such as those of the homines perfecti treated by Herbert Grundmann in Religiose Bewegungen im Mittelalter, 2 ed. (Darmstadt, 1961), pp. 402-38 and 524-38.

51. I have translated ane pine as "except suffering," taking Mechthild to be saying here something similar to what she says in VII 46 above about spiritual poverty. Schmidt (p. 318) takes Mechthild to be saying that nothing in this world can console or cheer her without, at the same time, causing her to suffer.

52. Neumann (note to VII 48, 26; N II 160) takes book to mean the already complete ms of Books I-VI. More specifically the reference is to I 3 above.

53. In calling Love of God, her dialogue partner, "dear maiden," Mechthild is responding to her partner's words spoken above-that she wanted to be Mechthild's lady-in-waiting.

54. 1 Jn 4:16. In Latin in the text: Deus caritas est.

55. A troubling sentence. Possible meaning: Mechthild was not able to provide him with the necessary sigh because it was at that very moment being given him by someone else. Cf. Schmidt p. 323, lines 12-13.

56. Cf. Mt 26:39; Mk 14:36; and Lk 22:42.

57. This you is plural.

58. Mechthild places Enoch and Elijah here to await the last days when they shall return to earth. See IV 27 and VI 15 above.

59. Cf. VI 15 above.

60. That is, the souls in purgatory.

61. Mechthild has cast this chapter in the form of a Botenlied or messenger's song, a conventional form in courtly-love poetry in which the speaker addresses a messenger concerning the object of his or her love and asks him to bear the message of love to the beloved one. Mechthild also employs several expressions and/or images of such poetry, such as "sick with love," "recover," "physician" of love, "wounds" of love, etc.

62. In Latin in the text: Inpresepio.

63. Cf. Dt 6:5 and Lk 10:25-28.

Cover art: MOTHER PLACID DEMPSEY, a Benedictine nun of the Abbey of Regina Laudis in Bethlehem, Connecticut, is also a sculptor, painter, graphics designer and book illustrator. Regarding the cover and inside illustrations she says: "Doing art work for this volume became a unique personal experience in which I was struck by three things. First, I realized there has existed for centuries a body of illustrations of the Visions that are traditionally ascribed to St. Hildegard's 'direct supervision.' Despite their obvious differences in style, which suggest not merely different artists but entirely different historical periods, they have enjoyed a long history of commentaries by various spiritual writers and important scholars, including, in our time, Dr. Carl Jung. Recognizing their unique value in terms of tradition and their own intrinsic aesthetic beauty, I chose to represent them here in all their clarity and forthrightness. In so doing, I came to appreciate that, in a very real sense, they do proceed from her 'direct supervision.' Secondly, I came to understand directness and supervision as the marks of St. Hildegard, who looked upon the mystery of nature and mankind with the radical and comprehensive 'eye' of Faith, that is, through supernatural 'seeing' or, as one may say, through 'Super-Vision,' and this is what I have tried to express on the cover. Thirdly, I realized that her 'Super-Vision' includes the hidden bringing together of many persons to share and creatively carry out that Vision. In this regard I wish to express my debt to her and, through her, to the Abbess and members of my own community, to Sr. Mary Charles, R.S.M., Dr. John Farina, children's book illustrator Mercer Mayer, and to Jeanne Parr."

MOTHER COLUMBA HART, O.S.B. was graduated from Smith College in 1924 summa cum laude, having studied under Eleanor S. Duckett and Howard R. Patch. She remained for the M.A. degree in English and continued graduate work at Radcliffe and Harvard in romance philology, Middle English, and Latin paleography under John L. Lowes, John S. Tatlock, and Charles H. Haskins. She earned a second M.A. at Radcliffe in 1926. After European travel she studied French while living in Paris for two years, and later translated Ouvrons la Bible by Roger Poelman (How to Read the Bible, New York: Kenedy, 1953, and London: Longmans, 1955). Her first original book, Mary of the Magnificat, had come out in 1942 (Sheed & Ward). The work of translating from the Latin The Exercises of Saint Gertrude (Newman, 1956) brought to her attention the dearth of information about Gertrude's life and suggested research on thirteenth-century women, especially the Flemish mystics. Thus she discovered Hadewijch, some of whose letters she presented in The American Benedictine Review (1962). Her translation from the Latin of William of Saint Thierry's Exposition on the Song of Songs was begun at this time and appeared in Cistercian Fathers Series (1970). In 1972 Mother Columba contributed to The American Benedictine Review another article on medieval women "Consecratio Virginum: Thirteenth-Century Witnesses." In 1980 she brought out a volume in The Classics of Western Spirituality Series, which may well be considered her masterpiece, the translation of The Complete Works of Hadewijch.

At 86, Mother Columba has retired from active research for publication and remains a beloved elder and resource person in her Benedictine community of the Abbey of Regina Laudis in Bethlehem, Connecticut, where she has been a member for forty years.

JANE BISHOP received her B.A. from Vassar College and her M. Phil. and Ph.D. from Columbia University. After a precarious few years as an adjunct professor at Barnard College, Pace University, Iona College, the New School for Social Research and Manhattan College, she is now Assistant Professor of Ancient and Medieval History at The Citadel, Charleston, South Carolina. Dr. Bishop has written articles for Trends in History and the Dictionary of the Middle Ages, and "Bishops as Marital Advisors in the Ninth Century" for Women of the Medieval World, ed. Julius Kirshner and Suzanne Wemple (Basil Blackwell, Oxford, 1985). She was a founding member of the Institute for Research in History, which unfortunately became defunct in 1989. Dr. Bishop's specialties are Byzantine and papal political and social history, which makes Hildegard's mysticism a holiday from her main preoccupations. She is now seeking a publisher for her book Pope Nicholas I and the First Age of Papal Independence.

Author of the Introduction

BARBARA J. NEWMAN is Associate Professor of English at the Northwestern University College of Arts and Sciences. She received her B.A. from Oberlin College, her M.A. Div. from the University of Chicago Divinity School and her Ph.D. from Yale University, Department of Medieval Studies. Dr. Newman's publications include: Sister of Wisdom: St. Hildegard's Theology of the Feminine (University of California Press, 1987) and Hildegard of Bingen: Symphonia, critical edition with translations and commentary (Cornell University Press, 1988).

Author of the Preface

CAROLINE WALKER BYNUM is Professor of History at Columbia University and a MacArthur Fellow. She is the author of a number of scholarly works on medieval spirituality including Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages (University of California Press, 1982) and Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women (University of California Press, 1987).

Preface

Until recently the visionary women of the Western European Middle Ages were neglected by scholars. German historians tended to see the two great twelfth-century Rhineland prophets, Hildegard of Bingen and Elizabeth of Schönau, and the mystical group at the convent of Helfta in the thirteenth century as important only insofar as they foreshadowed Protestantism. The intense affective female piety of the early fourteenth century described in the collections of visions and pious biographies known as Nonnenbücher made scholars so nervous that they neglected these works altogether except as philological evidence of the development of the German language. English students of mysticism denigrated the female mystics of their own and the continental tradition as “experiential,” and judged their works, along with those of such male devotional writers as Richard Rolle, inferior to speculative, neo-Platonic mystical writing. Historians of science and psychology, as well as phenomenologists of religion, repeatedly explained women’s visionary experiences as neurosis or disease (migraine, hysteria, anorexia nervosa, and so on). Further, as Peter Dronke has pointed out, there is no major female writer from the Middle Ages whose works modern scholars have not attributed (often with very little evidence) to a man.¹ If I had written this preface in 1950, I might well have argued that the only thing the diverse female writers of the Middle Ages had in common was their neglect by modern scholarship.

All that has changed. Not only has the field of women’s history emerged as a branch of research with considerable methodological sophistication, but women’s theological writing and piety have received particular emphasis. Two anthologies of medieval women writers in translation have recently appeared, and religious texts predominate. At least two current series are devoted exclusively to women’s texts.² The plays of Hrotsvitha of Ganderheim and Hildegard of Bingen are now performed by college drama departments and church groups; several recordings of Hildegard's liturgical songs are on the market; extravagant claims about the effectiveness of women's medicine and midwifery circulate; radical feminists today appropriate from medieval texts insights they characterize as female or feminist and use them to challenge or reform or profoundly reinterpret the modern church. In the 1980s female authorship is often attributed to anonymous texts, sometimes on the shakiest of bases. A German postage stamp in 1979 honored the eight-hundredth anniversary of the death of Hildegard of Bingen; the postwar, apocalyptic German artist, Anselm Kiefer, includes the thirteenth-century beguine and visionary Mechtild of Magdeburg as the only woman in his monumental painting "Germany's Spiritual Heroes."

The recent enthusiasm for visionary women in general and for the immensely talented polymath Hildegard of Bingen in particular raises disturbing interpretative questions. For Hildegard is in no way typical, either as a nun or as a visionary or as a female writer. As Professor Newman notes in her introduction, Hildegard was profoundly different from such later figures as Catherine of Siena and Teresa of Avila, the only women taken seriously as theologians or as mystics by the Catholic church until recently. Nor is Hildegard, who is in any case an extremely difficult writer, made easier to understand by isolating her from her twelfth-century German, monastic context and relocating her in a tradition of female spirituality running from Perpetua (d. 203) to Therese of Lisieux (d. 1897). A Benedictine abbess, Hildegard advocated a monastic life of obedience and communal prayer—not the extravagant and individualistic asceticism of some later medieval women. A proponent of Gregorian reform, Hildegard proselytized for clerical purity and power, and argued that women should not hold priestly office, although she (virtually alone among medieval women) undertook preaching missions with ecclesiastical approval. Authorized to write by God's command (as were many other medieval women), Hildegard dominated her confessors, scribes and illustrators in a way not common with female saints, some of whom (such as Elizabeth of Hungary or Angela of Foligno) were so controlled by their confessor-scribes that it is indeed hard to know whether their piety and even their words represent truly the divine message they heard in the inner recesses of their hearts.³ Moreover, Hildegard was a prophetic seer whose visions had political content and were based in a physical experience of light and pain. She wrote in Old Testament images of precious stones and noble buildings, of agriculture and organic growth, of courts and war and beautiful garments—images radically different from the more tender, domestic, even sentimental meditations on the Holy Family and the human experience of Jesus common in Rhineland convents of the fourteenth century. A visionary who took her revelations as a text for exegesis, not an experience for re-living, Hildegard was not, technically speaking, a mystic at all. She wrote not about union but about doctrine, although her attention to bodily phenomena such as sexual desire or menstrual cramps sets her apart from other visionary theologians of the twelfth century (such as Hugh or Richard of St. Victor).

Readers who come to the complex and difficult text presented here equipped with a background in feminist theology or in women's history may be surprised by many things—among them Hildegard's sense of inferiority as a female and her confident self-assertion in castigating the clergy. Readers who approach the Scivias with knowledge of later medieval apocalyptic or mystical writing may be puzzled by the virtual absence of nuptial imagery—usually thought, quite incorrectly, to be characteristic of women writers—and by the lack of a spirituality of imitatio Christi and self-punishing asceticism. In presenting Hildegard's obscure yet brilliant visions to such readers, it is therefore tempting merely to underline their idiosyncrasy and leave it at that. This would, however, be unwise. The flood of questions raised by recent work on women's piety needs to be addressed, if only by spelling out clearly two issues at stake. First, is there a female spirituality in the period between 1100 and 1517? Second, did medieval women speak with their own voices and out of their own experience, or is their work merely the inscription of the misogynist and patriarchal values of the dominant religious tradition? Although related, these are not the same question.

To ask the first question is really to ask whether there are consistent and identifiable ways in which women's religious concerns, considered across decades, classes and national or linguistic lines, differ from those of men. The question does not, as some have argued, make essentialist assumptions about the "eternal feminine." To be sure, there were biological constraints affecting women's roles in the medieval period—constraints of which Hildegard, with her keen medical curiosity, was well-aware. But no modern theorist would explain women's religious options or opinions as biologically determined. There were, however, institutional and educational constraints not rooted in biology that were constant throughout the later Middle Ages. Women were prohibited from holding priestly office and increasingly from exercising roles as preachers and spiritual counselors. They were cut off from the new scholastic education of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, yet found encouragement and opportunities to write when vernacular languages and genres emerged in that much-studied shift from oral to written culture.⁴ The question of women's piety is therefore in part a question of whether social, educational and institutional limitations were so powerful an influence as to differentiate fundamentally women's insights from men's.

Recent studies of medieval saints have suggested that certain themes such as the religious significance of illness and the need for charismatic authorization do characterize women's religious experience. Analyses of the structure of women's prose and women's visions also suggest that particular fears shaped women's intellectual efforts, and indeed that the act of writing itself was often for a woman both service to others and audacious self-integration. Some recent scholarship has even argued that gender-related imagery is used differently by males and females, although the best of such work eschews any assumption that women are generally drawn to feminine or men to masculine images. Research on medieval medical texts has established that learned and folkloric traditions shared an emphasis on the threatening physicality of females; some historians would argue that such traditions underlie the extravagant physiological imagery in women's writing as well as the extraordinary bodily miracles such as stigmata, miraculous lactation, and so forth performed by women from the thirteenth century on.⁵

It is clear that this recent research cannot be ignored in a study of Hildegard. Different as she may be from later, more affective female mystics, her Scivias nonetheless scintillates with a concern for embodiment—as both glorious and deplorable—that puts her in the company of Mary of Oignies, Angela of Foligno and Catherine of Genoa. Atypical as we may find her moderate Benedictinism, her assumption of quasi-clerical roles and her exegetical rather than experiential stance toward her visions, the act of writing that wrenched her from depression into leadership reminds us of the stunning personal integration and religious creativity achieved by Beatrice of Nazareth, Catherine of Siena and Teresa of Avila in similar acts.

The second question asked in recent decades about women's writing is also complex. Both radical feminists and conservative students of mysticism have queried whether what we have in women's texts from the twelfth to the fifteenth century are women's voices at all. In a culture where official theology was defined by scholastic debate and papal pronouncement, where reception of the eucharist required the recipient to submit to previous scrutiny by a male confessor, where increasingly elaborate rules were devised for "testing" charismatic gifts, which could be adjudged "feigned sanctity," how can we be sure we hear women speaking freely? Can phrases such as Hildegard's repeated assertion of female inferiority really be accepted as women's own, even when penned or dictated by the woman herself?⁶

Some scholars have wished to decide this issue a priori, declaring women's writings either a vague echo of more theoretically powerful works by orthodox males or a species of "false consciousness" that reflects merely patriarchal repression. This position assumes not only that women's courage, serenity, self-sacrifice and loyalty were self-delusion but also that the power to repress is the only effective power in human history. To this a priori assumption scholarly scrutiny of texts can, of course, provide no rebuttal. But recent scholarship not committed to this ideological position has found in Hildegard, as in Catherine of Siena or Julian of Norwich or even—for all their orientation toward male advisers—Elizabeth of Schönau or Dorothy of Montau, the wellings up of profound female experience. The low-keyed irony with which Hildegard reminded corrupt clerics that God had been forced to choose an inferior mouthpiece because they had fallen so low, like the cheeky casuistry with which the fourteenth-century English woman Margery Kempe met the admonition not to preach, have hardly seemed to all recent interpreters an internalizing of misogyny.⁷ Nor have all scholars read as repression Hildegard's glorious sense of the power and independence conferred on women by virginity.

It would, however, be misleading to close with general methodological issues raised by the current discussion of female spirituality. Attentive readers will find that Hildegard directs her audience not to a consideration of woman but to a consideration of humankind. She meditates not on the experience of anima as sponsa, languishing with desire for Christ her bridegroom, but on the place of the human person (homo) in a divine plan that marches from creation through Christ's incarnation to last judgment and final redemption. For a lyrical evocation of soul seeking the sensual delights of ecstatic union, one must turn, in the twelfth century, to Cistercian or Carthusian monks. The homo of whom Hildegard writes is a lump of mire, although surrounded with jewels (pt III, vision 1). The body this homo wears as a garment is crucial to its self and will rise at the last day gendered and intact, but body is useful to homo not as a locus of earthly or celestial sensations but as an instrument of self-discipline.

Hildegard's Latin is less beautiful than that of her more affective and evocative Cistercian contemporaries; her concern is more ecclesiological; her vision of the divine economy more historical; her piety is tougher and less individualistic. Readers who expect to be moved or inspired as Bernard of Clairvaux moves and inspires may be initially disappointed. But if one pauses for a moment while reading and looks beyond the elaborate and often confusing details of Hildegard's revelations, one realizes one has been shown the structure of salvation. With Hildegard one does not feel; one sees. Before the eyes of the mind pass such vivid images as the first human being, formed of clay, refusing to pluck the flower of obedience (pt II, vision 1); the great maternal figure Ecclesia, with souls going in and out of her womb (pt II, vision 3); the pillar of Christ's humanity, up and down which the virtues climb as on a ladder (pt III, vision 8); the bones of the dead leaping together at the end of time into figures whose very appearance reveals their status as saved or damned (pt III, vision 12); the crystalline beauty of the heavens in eternity, filled with light and song (pt III, vision 13). Hildegard's visions are in fact one vision: a primer and a summa of Christian doctrine.

Hildegard spoke to recall the lukewarm and their faithless leaders to God. Her speaking required courage. It also required troubled times and divine inspiration. Indeed she believed God had called upon a weak woman to rage against evil only because humankind had turned away from heaven and bent its will toward the dust from which it had been created. But rage she did, with confidence and power. It is hard not to see in her parable of the apostles (pt III, vision 7) a description of her own prophetic role:

And so . . . the Holy Spirit came openly in tongues of fire. . . . And, because the apostles had been taught by the Son, the Holy Spirit bathed them in Its fire, so that with their souls and bodies they spoke in many tongues; and, because their souls ruled their bodies, they cried out so that the whole world was shaken by their voices.

And the Holy Spirit took their human fear from them, so that no dread was in them, and they would never fear human savagery when they spoke the word of God; all such timidity was taken from them, so ardently and so quickly that they became firm and not soft. . . . And then they remembered with perfect understanding all the things they had heard and received from Christ. . . .

And so, going forth, they made their way among the faithless peoples who did not have roots. . . . And to these they announced the words of salvation and of true faith in Christ.

Introduction

St. Hildegard (1098–1179), founder and first abbess of the Benedictine community at Bingen, is one of the most fascinating spiritual figures of the twelfth century. The bearer of a unique and elusive visionary charism, she was also a prophet in the Old Testament tradition—the first in a long line of prophetically and politically active women—yet at the same time a representative of the German Benedictine aristocracy in its heyday. Proudly aware of belonging to a social and spiritual elite, she was profoundly humble before God, awed by the audacity of her own mission, and by turns diffident and strident about her gifts.

Measured in purely external terms her achievements are staggering. Although she did not begin to write until her forty-third year, Hildegard was the author of a massive trilogy that combines Christian doctrine and ethics with cosmology; a compendious encyclopedia of medicine and natural science; a correspondence comprising several hundred letters to people in every stratum of society; two saints' lives; several occasional writings; and, not least, a body of exquisite music that includes seventy liturgical songs and the first known morality play. Although other women had written before her, their works had fallen back into silence; the names of Perpetua, Egeria, Baudonivia, Dhuoda and Hrotsvitha were unknown to her. Nor was she aware of her great French contemporary, Heloise. We must not underestimate the courage she needed as the first woman, to the best of her knowledge, to take up wax tablets and stylus in the name of God. Even greater, perhaps, was the daring required to embark on her career as a public preacher of monastic and clerical reform. This mission led her to undertake four prolonged preaching tours, beginning at the age of sixty; she spoke mainly to monastic communities, but on occasion addressed clergy and laity together in the public squares. In the meantime she continued to guide and administer the two nunneries she had founded, the first despite strong opposition from her abbot. Its daughter house, located in the Rhineland village of Eibingen, is still thriving today.

To her contemporaries Hildegard was "the Sibyl of the Rhine," an oracle they sought out for advice on everything from marital problems and health troubles to the ultimate fate of their souls. Often she gave her advice unsought—most notably to her patron, the emperor Frederick Barbarossa, whom she rebuked fiercely for his role in the German papal schism. Her books enjoyed a modest circulation and a widespread notoriety. By later medieval generations she was remembered primarily as an apocalyptic prophet. Her fiery but enigmatic writings about the Antichrist and the last stages of world history were collected by a Cistercian monk in 1220 and continued to circulate until the Reformation, when she was perversely hailed as a proto-Protestant because she had prophesied the confiscation of ecclesiastical wealth by princes and the dissolution of monasteries.

In our own day the voice that Hildegard had called "a small sound of the trumpet from the living Light" is resounding once more. In Germany she still enjoys a wide popular cult, and the abbey at Eibingen has become a center of scholarship and pilgrimage. Herbalists have rediscovered some of her prescriptions and begun to experiment with their use in modern homeopathic practice. Musicians have performed her liturgical songs and her drama, the Ordo virtutum, to great acclaim. To students of spirituality Hildegard remains of compelling interest, not only as a rare feminine voice soaring above the patriarchal choirs, but also as a perfect embodiment of the integrated, holistic approach to God and humanity for which our fragmented era longs. While the movement for creation-centered spirituality has exaggerated certain elements of her teaching and denied its more ascetic and dualistic aspects, it remains true that Hildegard unites vision with doctrine, religion with science, charismatic jubilation with prophetic indignation, and the longing for social order with the quest for social justice in ways that continue to challenge and inspire.

Hildegard's Life and Works

Hildegard's life, which is well-known from her own writings as well as a variety of contemporary documents, presents a mixed image of oppression and privilege.¹ Born into a noble family of Bermersheim near Alzey, she enjoyed the inestimable advantages of wealth, high birth, membership in a large and well-connected family and easy access to the holders of political and ecclesiastical power.² At the time of her birth the Cistercian order was in its infancy and the first stirrings of the apostolic poverty movement had barely begun. Benedictine monasticism, especially in Germany, remained an option for the elite, and many communities had close connections with the houses of their noble founders or patrons. On the other hand, the ethic of world-renouncing asceticism held a strong appeal for these powerful families, so it was not unusual when the daughter of the Count of Sponheim, a woman named Jutta, decided in 1106 to adopt the solitary life of a recluse.

INTRODUCTION

Jutta's family was closely connected with Hildegard's, and her conversion provided an ideal opportunity for Hildegard's parents, Hildebert and Mechthild, to perform a pious deed. They offered their eight-year-old daughter, the last of ten children, to God as a tithe by placing her in Jutta's hermitage.³ As a handmaid and companion to the recluse, Hildegard was also her pupil: She learned to read the Latin Bible, particularly the Psalms, and to chant the monastic Office. In time, other women joined Jutta and Hildegard, and the hermitage became a nunnery professing the Benedictine Rule. As a teenager Hildegard made her formal profession of virginity. We hear nothing more of her until 1136 when Jutta died and Hildegard was elected abbess in her stead. Five years later she received the prophetic call that eventually led her to compose the Scivias and embark on her public mission.

Although the outward circumstances of Hildegard's life were in no way remarkable until that date, her inner life had always been mysterious. In the personal memoirs that form part of her official biography she reports not early mystical longings or a precocious sense of vocation, but rather a peculiar temperament, which doomed her to chronic ill health and, at the same time, gave her a propensity for visions from earliest childhood. She could see things that were invisible to those around her; she foretold the future; and her visual field was filled at all times with a strange luminosity that she later came to call "the reflection of the living Light." In this light she perceived a variety of figures, ranging from human forms to elaborate architectural models, which she was able to interpret with the aid of a "voice from heaven." Finally, on rare occasions she came into contact with a greater brightness, which she called "the living Light" itself; her description of this experience (written at the age of 77) suggests a direct encounter with the divine presence.⁴ Initially, however, her visions were merely baffling. Hildegard confided them only to Jutta and to the monk Volmar, her teacher and later her secretary and close friend.

The early genesis of these visions, their connection with the "aerial fires" and other illnesses that plagued Hildegard, and above all, the fact that she experienced visions for forty years before receiving her prophetic call and learning to interpret them as a gift from God, strongly suggest a physiological basis. Charles Singer and, more recently, Oliver Sacks have concluded that the abbess suffered from "scintillating scotoma," a form of migraine.⁵ But illness did not prevent her from living an extraordinarily active life and surviving to the ripe age of eighty-one. Moreover, she always stressed that she received her visions while “fully awake in mind and body” and without any impairment of her normal sense functioning—a description that would exclude any seizures, ecstasies or trance states. It is even clearer that she did not in any way seek to induce the visions. As a Benedictine she practiced and counselled only moderate fasting and avoided mortifications; nor is it reported that she spent long hours in private prayer. Her visionary experience, then, was one of the givens of her physical and psychological make-up. It took decades of painfully acquired self-knowledge—and the authority of an abbatial position—before she was able to understand the visions as a vehicle for divine revelation. Her spirituality thus stands in contrast with that of later mystics who deliberately cultivated visions and other paranormal experiences. Nevertheless, her visions set a seal on the prophetic authority she claimed: without them she would have had neither a message nor an audience. Illness, on the other hand, kept her constantly aware of her human frailty and furnished one of the abiding themes of her spirituality, that of divine power made perfect in weakness.⁶

Hildegard's prophetic call came to her in 1141 in the form of a fiery light that permeated her whole heart and brain and gave her an infused knowledge of all the books of Scripture. In the Scivias preface, where she describes this illumination, she is careful to give her exact age at the time as well as the names of all her superiors (the reigning emperor, the archbishop of Mainz and the abbot of St. Disibod). This scrupulous dating follows a literary convention established by the Hebrew prophets and continued by the seer John of Patmos; like them, Hildegard was keenly aware of history and her own historical moment. The illumination, with the subsequent command to “cry out and write,” had come to her not because she was any more devout or deserving than others, but because the times were desperate. Unlike modern historians Hildegard did not perceive the mid-twelfth century as a time of spiritual fervor and renewal, but as an “effeminate age” in which the Scriptures were neglected, the clergy “lukewarm and sluggish” and the Christian people ill-informed. Her mission, then, was to do with her prophetic charism what professional clerics had failed to do with their priestly charism: teach, preach, interpret the Scriptures and proclaim the justice of God.

After she overcame her initial hesitation about writing, it took Hildegard ten years to complete the Scivias with the editorial help of Volmar and the assistance and moral support of her favorite nun, Richardis von Stade.⁷ This decade was marked by numerous crises in her life. Through the agency of Volmar and of her bishop, Henry of Mainz, Hildegard's fame eventually reached the ears of Pope Eugenius III, who happened to be presiding over a synod of bishops at Trier in the winter of 1147–48. Eugenius, a Cistercian, had been a disciple of St. Bernard before his elevation. Not long before the synod of Trier, Hildegard had written to the abbot of Clairvaux to seek confirmation of her gifts, and Bernard intervened on her behalf with the pope. The upshot was that Eugenius took advantage of his proximity to Hildegard's convent to procure a copy of her unfinished Scivias, which he read in public before the assembled bishops and then officially endorsed, sending the seer a letter of apostolic greeting and benediction to continue her work.⁸ The importance of this papal seal of approval cannot be overestimated. Not only did it increase Hildegard's confidence and security in the face of continuing self-doubt, but it also authenticated her publicly and protected her from the censure she was bound to attract for violating the deuterio-Pauline strictures on female silence and submission.

At about the time of the synod Hildegard received a vision in which she was instructed to leave St. Disibod, the male community to which she and her nuns were attached, and found a new convent on the site of a ruined Carolingian monastery near Bingen. This plan met with vehement objections from her abbot along with many of the nuns, who were loath to leave their comfortable surroundings for a desolate wilderness. Hildegard's desire for independence from the monks—juridical and financial as well as spiritual—embroiled her in prolonged conflict with the abbot of St. Disibod.⁹ In addition, some of her daughters refused to move; her beloved Richardis left to become abbess of another monastery, much to Hildegard's chagrin; and her migration exposed her to ridicule from the local nobility, whose goodwill was essential if the new community was to prosper. Nevertheless she persevered, using her family connections to secure the land and a miraculous "charismatic illness" to persuade the abbot that her departure was the will of God. Her new monastic church of St. Rupert was formally consecrated in 1152.

During the 1150s Hildegard devoted herself to securing the welfare of her monastery, the Rupertsberg, with every means at her disposal.¹⁰ She worked to establish monastic discipline by teaching and preaching; supervised construction of the new buildings; obtained gifts and bequests to make her community financially secure; fought for a charter of independence from St. Disibod; and fostered the cult of her new patron, St. Rupert, by writing his vita. To instruct her nuns she wrote a commentary on the Athanasian creed, and she enriched their liturgical life with the repertoire of songs that she eventually gathered into her Symphonia.¹¹ To this period also, in all likelihood, belong the final version of her music drama, the Ordo virtutum (Play of Virtues), and the mysterious Lingua ignota, which she seems to have created as a kind of secret language to instil a sense of mystical solidarity among her nuns.¹²

This intense burst of activity directed toward her daughters was complemented by an ever-widening correspondence with the outside world. Hildegard's growing fame brought a constant stream of pilgrims and miracle-seekers, as well as prospective nuns, to the Rupertsberg gates. Most of her correspondents were fellow abbesses, abbots and priests, although there is an impressive sprinkling of secular rulers and prelates and a less prestigious, though perhaps more revealing, selection of letters to ordinary laymen and women. It is difficult to evaluate Hildegard's correspondence in its present state, however, since her secretaries edited freely in order to upgrade the status of her associates and enhance her image as an inspired oracle of God—possibly with a view to imminent canonization. A forthcoming critical edition of her letters will make it possible, for the first time, to assess the actual scope and influence of her correspondence.¹³

According to an autobiographical preface, it was in the same decade of almost unbelievable energy that Hildegard composed her two scientific works. The Book of Simple Medicine, also called Nine Books on the Subtleties of Different Kinds of Creatures, summarizes the natural science of her age in a logical encyclopedic format. Four books on animals, two on herbs and trees, and three on gems, metals and “elements” combine a wealth of empirical observation with medical notes on the wholesome and poisonous properties of creatures, moral symbolism belonging to the genre of bestiary lore, and magical charms to be used in healing. A companion volume, the Book of Composite Medicine or Causes and Cures, was apparently never redacted in final form. Along with more or less systematic material on diseases and their treatment, it contains a fascinating miscellany of traditions about Adam and Eve, observations on sexuality and even astrological lore.¹⁴

It is significant that these works, unlike the Scivias and Hildegard's later visionary writings, make no claim to divine inspiration. Neither she nor her secretaries ever made any attempt to disseminate them, nor are they included in the huge manuscript of her collected works, prepared at the Rupertsberg shortly after her death. This omission suggests that Hildegard made a sharp distinction between God's work and her own, yet her creativity and curiosity knew no bounds. The medical works, especially Causes and Cures, were probably compiled for her personal use. A tradition of miraculous healings ascribed to her suggests that she practiced medicine informally, like many monastics; on the evidence of these writings, she used both natural and supernatural means.¹⁵ Only in her last written work did she attempt to combine her scientific interests with her prophetic and theological mission.

Around 1158, Hildegard was ready to turn her restless mind in new directions. The Rupertsberg, strengthened and stabilized by two charters from the new archbishop of Mainz, was now well enough established that she could risk prolonged absence for the sake of preaching. Over the next five years she undertook three major tours, despite the burden of illness. Travelling along Germany's great rivers, the Rhine and the Main, she preached at numerous monasteries and gave fiery apocalyptic sermons in the cathedral towns of Cologne and Trier. Many of these communities subsequently requested transcripts of her sermons, which can be found among her correspondence.¹⁶ This period also saw the composition of a new visionary work, the Liber vitae meritorum (Book of Life's Merits), which became the second volume of her trilogy. Based on her own experience as a spiritual director, it deals with moral psychology and penance in the context of an overarching christological vision. This little-known work represents a novel synthesis of at least three medieval genres: the psychomachia or virtue-vice debate, the penitential and the otherworld vision. It is an important early witness to the developing doctrine of purgatory and represents an interesting compromise between the older medieval concept of virtues and vices as static entities and the newer psychological dynamism favored by the Victorines and Cistercians.¹⁷

By the time she had completed the Book of Life's Merits Hildegard was sixty-five and in constant ill health, but her old age witnessed both the most remarkable literary work and the bitterest conflicts of her long career. Although the abbess could inspire deep loyalty and devotion in her friends, she also had a talent for making enemies. Her sheer force of will, combined with a dazzling array of spiritual and intellectual gifts, a courage hardened by decades of struggle, and a prophetic persona, which she displayed in season and out, made her a formidable opponent; and she did not take defeat easily. When Richardis left her to become abbess of Bassum, Hildegard contested the election and appealed the case all the way to the pope, who ruled against her; she relented only when her young disciple took sick and died at the height of the conflict.¹⁸ The monks of St. Disibod, too, had tasted her wrath when they objected to her plans for independence. But the conflicts of her last years show Hildegard in a more disinterested light, taking considerable risks for the sake of her principles.

The most celebrated of these quarrels set the prophet against the emperor, Frederick Barbarossa.¹⁹ The two had earlier been on excellent terms. Sometime in the mid-1150s Frederick had summoned Hildegard to his palace at Ingelheim to give a prophetic oracle, the contents of which neither party ever disclosed in writing. In 1163 he gave her an imperial charter of protection for the Rupertsberg, guaranteeing valuable liberties. But from an ecclesiastical point of view, Frederick was already schismatic at this time, for in 1159 he had supported an antipope, Victor IV, in opposition to Alexander III. Most of the German bishops had been willing to support Victor, but when he died in 1164 and Frederick appointed a successor instead of seeking reconciliation with the legitimate pope, the prelates were outraged and Hildegard added her prophetic voice to the chorus, calling her imperial patron a madman. She continued to oppose the emperor when he named a third antipope in 1168, thus refusing to let her loyalties be dictated by political self-interest.²⁰ Her staunchly orthodox stance is also demonstrated by a polemic she wrote against the Cathars in 1163 at the request of the canons of Mainz.²¹

In the meantime Hildegard had begun work on her final visionary opus, the Liber divinorum operum or Book of Divine Works (also called De operatione Dei or On the Activity of God).²² This work, inspired by an overpowering vision of Caritas or Divine Love, sets forth Hildegard's cosmology and her most mature views of history and eschatology. Like the Scivias, it ends with an apocalyptic scenario, which was eagerly scrutinized for centuries to come. The heart of the book, however, lies in a pair of carefully balanced commentaries on the Johannine prologue and the first chapter of Genesis. This construction holds the key to Hildegard's whole theological vision, which revolves around the identity of the Creator with the incarnate Word. Reverent meditation on the cosmos and its proportions, which all have their analogues in the microcosm of the human body, leads to the same eternal center as meditation on history in its divinely ordained stages. Just as the human form is inscribed in the center of the universe in a celebrated illustration of this text, so Christ or incarnate Love is inscribed in the center of time.²³ The consequences of this vision are worked out in detail by means of the ingenious allegories and intricate numerological correlations so dear to Hildegard's age.

Before completing the Book of Divine Works the abbess lost her secretary, Volmar, who died in 1173. He was replaced first by Gottfried of St. Disibod, who began to compose her vita, and then by the extraordinary Guibert of Gembloux, a Belgian monk.²⁴ Through hearsay Guibert had become fascinated by Hildegard's visions, and it is to his insatiable curiosity that we owe most of what she recorded about her inner experience. In return for this spiritual favor he rendered her invaluable aid by coming to serve as secretary and provost of the Rupertsberg during her final years. Despite the impatience of his own community, Guibert did not leave Hildegard even in 1178, when her feisty and unyielding temper led to the unexpected consequence of an interdict.²⁵ The occasion was the burial of a nobleman, at one time excommunicated, in her monastic churchyard. Learning of the incident, the prelates of Mainz demanded that the corpse be exhumed, but Hildegard maintained that the deceased had died in a state of grace and refused to obey even at the price of being excommunicated herself. For six months she and her nuns endured deprivation of Mass, sacraments and their unique liturgical chant. The abbess continued to fight until the interdict was lifted only a few months before her death. At this date the underlying cause of the prelates' antagonism is no longer clear, but Hildegard's resistance stands as a final testament to her courage and the loyalty of her disciples. The controversy also occasioned one of her most profound and poignant letters, an apologia for music and its role in the spiritual life.²⁶

Hildegard's Spirituality

Although Hildegard is frequently classified as a mystic, she may be more precisely identified as a visionary and prophet. Classical definitions of mysticism stress the union of the soul with God and the whole system of ascetic and contemplative disciplines that aim to facilitate that union. But Hildegard, while she certainly had a powerful sense of the divine presence, did not follow the unitive way. "Prayer" to her meant primarily petition and liturgical praise, while "the love of God" meant reverence, loyalty and obedience to his commands. In the rare texts where she portrays herself as a partner in dialogue with God, she is not the enamored bride longing for divine union, as in St. Bernard's Sermons on the Song of Songs, but the fragile and woefully inadequate mortal—"ashes of ashes, and filth of filth"—trembling before the great commission she has received. Like Moses "stuttering and slow of speech," and like Isaiah "of unclean lips," she offers the prophet's classic response to a calling she has not chosen, yet cannot do other than obey.

The essentially prophetic character of Hildegard's spirituality explains the startling lack of interest in her own subjectivity. In spite of her unusual inner experiences, she recorded only as much as she had to reveal in order to authenticate her works. Thus only at the beginning and end of each book does she describe its genesis in visions; elsewhere the emphasis rests firmly on the content, and still more on the meaning, of the things seen. Moreover, her autobiographical prefaces and endings tend to focus as much on the seer's disabilities (her femaleness, poor health and lack of education) as they do on her revelations. These disclaimers, far from representing a simple "modesty topos," also serve the aim of authentication; they are meant to persuade readers that, because the author is not "wise according to worldly standards," her weakness and foolishness have been empowered by God alone.²⁷

Hildegard's prophetic self-awareness pervades all her writings except for her scientific works, and accounts for many of their stylistic features as well as their characteristically objective or outer-directed teaching. Because she saw herself as the voice of another, not as a speaker in her own right, she often seems disturbingly unaware of the human element in her writings. Not only does she lapse easily from speaking about God in the third person, as preacher, to speaking for him in the first person, as prophet; she also claims direct verbal inspiration for her entire opus and threatens terrible divine vengeance on anyone who dares to add, delete or alter a word. This instrumental view of her activity also required her to deny any education beyond "simple reading," although she was already well-acquainted with the Church Fathers and standard biblical commentaries when she wrote the Scivias, and by the end of her life was a woman of remarkably wide culture. Her posture as a simple, unlearned person was not intended to deceive; aside from reinforcing her prophetic persona, it constitutes an implicit critique of the learned clerics whose negligence, she believed, had necessitated her mission.

Hildegard never went beyond her limited and stylized self-disclosures to reveal more of her inner life until she was in her seventies, and even then she did so only at the request of hagiographically inclined admirers. For her first biographer, Gottfried, she wrote or dictated a valuable autobiographical memoir; and for the adoring Guibert she supplied this celebrated and oft-quoted account of her "mode of seeing":

In this vision my soul, as God would have it, rises up high into the vault of heaven and into the changing sky and spreads itself out among different peoples, although they are far away from me in distant lands and places. And because I see them this way in my soul, I observe them in accord with the shifting of clouds and other created things. I do not hear them with my outward ears, nor do I perceive them by the thoughts of my own heart or by any combination of my five senses, but in my soul alone, while my outward eyes are open. So I have never fallen prey to ecstasy in the visions, but I see them wide awake, day and night. . . . The light that I see thus is not spatial, but it is far, far brighter than a cloud that carries the sun. I can measure neither height, nor length, nor breadth in it; and I call it "the reflection of the living Light." And as the sun, the moon, and the stars appear in water, so writings, sermons, virtues, and certain human actions take form for me and gleam within it.

Now whatever I have seen or learned in this vision remains in my memory for a long time, so that, when I have seen and heard it, I remember; and I see, hear, and know all at once, and as if in an instant I learn what I know. But what I do not see, I do not know, for I am not educated. . . . And the words in this vision are not like words uttered by a human mouth, but like a shimmering flame, or a cloud floating in a clear sky.

Moreover, I can no more recognize the form of this light than I can gaze directly on the sphere of the sun. Sometimes—but not often—I see within this light another light, which I call "the living

INTRODUCTION

Light." And I cannot describe when and how I see it, but while I see it all sorrow and anguish leave me, so that then I feel like a simple girl instead of an old woman.²⁸

This is not the kind of experience that could be taught or learned. Readers might be reminded of Augustine's theory of illumination, which was probably familiar to Hildegard, or of the variant form of Neoplatonic light-mysticism that reached medieval Europe through Pseudo-Dionysius. A still closer parallel can be found in the experiences of Simeon the New Theologian and the Byzantine hesychasts, who sought by means of spiritual exercises to attain purity of heart and thus behold the uncreated light of Mount Tabor. Hildegard could not possibly have known this latter tradition, however; and as we have seen, she made no effort to cultivate or promulgate her special mode of seeing. Nor did she theologize about her visionary experience per se.

Aside from the dynamics of prophetic inspiration, Hildegard's spirituality is best understood through the ecclesiastical roles she played: Benedictine abbess, Gregorian reformer and apocalyptic preacher. As mistress of the Rupertsberg, she was indeed a Benedictine to the core. The Scivias opens with a vision of two thoroughly monastic virtues, Fear of the Lord and Poverty of Spirit; one has eyes on every side, and the other is inundated with the glory of God, indicating that only the humble possess true vision. Throughout Hildegard's works, but especially in the Scivias, the foundational virtues are humility, obedience and discretion, which, like Benedict, she called "the mother of virtues." In governing her community and advising her fellow superiors, she advocated a middle way between laxity and self-indulgence on the one hand and excessive abstinence on the other. She placed a premium on unity, and her teaching is pervaded with classical monastic themes: spiritual warfare, knowledge of good and evil, the conflict between soul and body, the acquisition of virtues, the special merit of chastity. Monks and virgins, in her view, were "new planets" which first appeared in the heavens at Christ's nativity;²⁹ she never doubted that they formed an elite corps among Christians and, if they persevered in their vows, would receive a special reward.

Although she herself was raised by a recluse, Hildegard was not particularly sympathetic to the eremitic life. A number of abbots and abbesses sought her counsel because they longed to lay down the burden of governing and work out their salvation in a hermit's cell; she always replied that this was a temptation to be resisted.³⁰ In fact, Hildegard's originality in so many fields should not obscure the fact that she represented a rather old-fashioned type of monasticism. Her reaction to the newer currents is neatly epitomized in her quarrel with the abbess Tengswich of Andernach, sister of the canonical reformer Richard of Springiersbach.³¹ Richard and Tengswich were pioneers in the movement for apostolic poverty, and Tengswich had criticized Hildegard sharply (under the veil of ironic praise) because the abbess of Bingen accepted only noble girls in her convent. What is more, she allowed them to wear jewelry when they received communion. In a spirited reply Hildegard defended the principle of class discrimination: One would not put beasts of different species in the same stall, and even angels had their hierarchy. As for wearing jewels, it was perfectly acceptable for the brides of Christ to dress like noble ladies because, as virgins, they were exempt from the rule of female subordination that required matrons to wear veils and lay aside their elegant attire. This blend of renunciation with privilege continues the long tradition of high-born abbesses, who gave up the titles and secular powers of nobility while retaining its influence, prestige and corporate wealth.

INTRODUCTION

As a reformer Hildegard belongs squarely within the Gregorian camp. In fact, as Jeffrey Russell wrote of Gregory VII himself, her life "is proof that a burning spirit can dwell within a breast committed to order."³² Ordo is indeed a key word in the Scivias. Hildegard did not call for radical change of social or ecclesiastical structures; it was the abuse of authority, not the nature of it, that she opposed. Her ideal was a Christendom wherein the secular power would be firmly subordinate to the spiritual, princes and prelates would rule with vigilance and justice, and subjects and layfolk would offer prompt obedience. Yet because her message was largely directed to those in power, and particularly to the ecclesiastical hierarchy, she concerned herself far more with the negligence of clerics and the arrogance of rulers than with the sins of subjects. Three issues that particularly concerned her were clerical celibacy, simony and the subservience of prelates to the secular power—a burning question in Barbarossa's Germany where the bishops were virtually ministers of state. All of these issues, of course, continued the eleventh-century struggle of the reformed papacy against what it perceived as lay encroachments on the dignity of the church.

In addition, Hildegard was zealous for orthodoxy and thus deeply troubled by the hierarchy's failure to offer any effective resistance to the Cathars, who were making numerous converts even as she composed the Scivias and had infiltrated the Rhineland by the 1160s. Their alarming success may account for the space she devoted to the sacraments of marriage and the eucharist, which were particularly reviled by these dualistic sectarians. In her most vehement and memorable preaching the abbess highlighted purity of doctrine along with sexual purity, both of which could be symbolized by the powerful image of the virgin Ecclesia. Hildegard not only personified Mother Church in this ancient symbol; in a sense, she impersonated her, making herself a mouthpiece for the pure but continuously imperilled bride of Christ.³³ In short, she placed her zeal for reform at the service of an essentially clerical vision of the church and a hierarchical vision of society. For her there could be no conflict between the spirit of prophecy and the spirit of order.

Hildegard's apocalyptic preaching must be understood in its proper context.³⁴ As she was not a radical reformer, neither was she a millenarian; she did not envisage an imminent Second Coming or look forward to a golden age of the Spirit. Rather, her apocalyptic message is closely akin to that of the Old Testament prophets. She shared their perception that divine judgment inevitably follows on human sin, and especially on the sins of rulers. If the princes of the church did not renounce their greed, fornication, oppression and negligence, they would be punished by the loss not only of their wealth and power, but even of the dignity they had signally abused. The perpetrators of this vengeance would be princes and people, not because Hildegard believed that kings were superior to prelates or that laypeople had a right to choose their own priests, but because she saw that the secular power could serve as God's scourge to punish his faithless people, just as the Assyrians of old had been allowed to punish Israel. Apocalyptic imagery coupled with the preaching of reform carries the same message that Jonah brought to the Ninevites: If the preaching is obeyed, it is just possible that the prophesied disasters will be averted.

But there is another dimension to Hildegard's apocalyptic. Like all prophets she was deeply concerned with history, and in both the Scivias and the Liber divinorum operum she surveyed the course of salvation history from beginning to end, from the creation to the final judgment.³⁵ In order to understand the present it was necessary to consider the past—the successive dispensations of grace before the birth of Christ—as well as the future, in which his work of salvation would at last be fulfilled. Hildegard's vision of the end, as set forth in Scivias III.11–12, entails a grim succession of evils that must come to pass before the judgment. As elaborated in the Liber divinorum operum, however, her scenario for the last times represents neither a gradual improvement nor a progressive deterioration in the state of the world. On the contrary, history is now seen as “one thing after another”: ages of justice and injustice, each with its own deformations or reforms, would alternate until the coming of Antichrist. Hildegard did not presume to say when he would arrive, but she did frequently speak of her own era as an “effeminate age,” which had succeeded the virginal epoch of paradise and the masculine epoch of the apostles and would in turn cede to still worse times. In one passage she even suggested that this effeminate age, signalled by the advent of feminine prophets, began around the time of her own birth.³⁶ But as a rule, the succession of periods is not dated even in the flexible and teasing manner that is typical of apocalyptic. Later generations could and did interpret the prophecies as they pleased, inserting themselves into the sequence wherever they chose.³⁷

The Scivias

The title Scivias is short for Scito vias Domini, or Know the Ways of the Lord. The firstfruits of Hildegard's prophetic labor, this book was ten years in the making (1141-51), and during her lifetime it remained the best-known of all her works. Pope Eugenius III's approval granted it an instant celebrity, which it has retained among modern cognoscenti in large part because of the splendid illuminations that adorn an early manuscript. The Scivias resulted directly from Hildegard's prophetic call and was addressed to a largely clerical and monastic audience, more specifically to indolent male theologians: "Unlock for them the enclosure of mysteries which they, timid as they are, conceal in a hidden and fruitless field. Burst forth into a fountain of abundance, and overflow with mystical knowledge, until they who now think you contemptible because of Eve's transgression are stirred up by the flood of your irrigation."³⁸ The visionary's gender is defiantly flaunted as a challenge to idle and "effeminate" clerics.

For modern readers the initial challenge of the Scivias lies in its distinctive style and structure. The text is divided into three books of unequal length, dealing respectively with the orders of creation, redemption and sanctification. The third book contains as many visions as the first two combined. Within each vision, or major structural unit, the organization is complex but uniform. Hildegard always begins with a simple and usually brief description of what she has seen; her visionary experience itself is taken for granted. Occasionally she is addressed by a divine voice or a figure within the vision. At the end of each vision proper, its interpretation is introduced by a formula: "And I heard a voice from heaven, saying . . ." From this point onward the initial vision becomes a "text" to be interpreted phrase by phrase, just as a traditional monastic commentator would gloss a text from Scripture. First the visual phenomena are interpreted allegorically; then more or less elaborate teaching follows, clarifying points of doctrine and morality that have been suggested by the vision.³⁹ Within each of these doctrinal units, scriptural passages are introduced as proof texts, and these in turn receive allegorical readings. The didactic and exegetical nature of the whole is signalled by the recurrent pedagogical questions, Quid est hoc? and Quomodo?—"What does this mean?" Finally each unit closes with an admonitory formula that remains constant for all the visions in a particular book, thus lending further structural unity.

The order of visions is carefully arranged to afford multiple perspec-

INTRODUCTION

V tives on the system of Christian doctrine. In the division into three books focusing on creation, redemption and sanctification, there is an allusion to the works of the Trinity. The first book explores connections between macrocosm and microcosm, things above and things below, the created world and the fallen world. In the second book, which is dominated by the figure of Ecclesia or Mother Church, Hildegard presents her teaching on the sacraments of redemption: baptism, confirmation, priesthood, penance and the eucharist. She apparently regarded monastic vows as a sacrament too, for they are treated at length. (Marriage, as a sacrament of the original creation, is discussed in Book I.)⁴⁰ Book III has a double structure, at once historical and moral. Most of the visions in this part develop the image of a complex allegorical building, the "edifice of salvation," which is upheld by divinity and inhabited by the Virtues. Hildegard's depiction of its walls, pillars and towers traces the successive ages of salvation history from creation through the last judgment, while her visions of the personified Virtues allow her to present a theology of the moral life. The two themes coalesce in the last vision, a symphony of praise for the inhabitants of heaven. Both history and moral struggle are here transcended and consummated.

Read as a visionary text the Scivias is unique; read as a compendium of Christian doctrine, it takes its place alongside many similar works of the period. The closest parallel is provided by Hugh of St. Victor's summa, On the Sacraments of the Christian Faith, written only a decade before (c. 1134; Hugh died in the year Hildegard began to write).⁴¹ As an early scholastic who was also a noted teacher of contemplation, Hugh bridged the gap between the older monastic theology represented by Hildegard and the newer, more systematic mentality of the schools. In his summa the Victorine theologian used the method of scholastic argument rather than inspired visions, and he claimed only human authority. But a comparison of his table of contents with Hildegard's will show the essential similarity of matter (see below), if not of manner, between the two contemporary works. The twenty-six Scivias visions treat subjects closely akin to Hugh's thirty sections. Of the topics covered by Hugh, Hildegard omits only philosophical subjects like causality, predestination and natural law, along with certain "priestly" matters like vestments, masses for the dead and ceremonials for the dedication of a church. On the other hand, she includes an extensive treatment of the virtues, which Hugh omits. If Hildegard had been a male theologian, her Scivias would undoubtedly have been considered one of the most important early medieval summas.

The fact of visionary inspiration, of course, gives her work a tone and style quite unlike Hugh's. Where he argues, she asserts; where he speaks in his own person, she speaks in persona Dei. Her untutored Latin is often difficult and idiosyncratic, despite the fact that she had Volmar as a copy editor to correct her mistakes in grammar. Occasionally she uses picturesque technical terms of her own devising; for instance, one of her standard phrases for monk is vivens odor vovens iter secretae regenerationis ("a living fragrance vowing the way of secret regeneration"). A priest is a pigmentarius, or "perfumer," perhaps with reference to the aromatic chrism of his anointing, and viriditas (literally, "the color green") means not only verdure or foliage, but all natural and spiritual life as quickened by the Holy Spirit.

The Scivias, then, can be approached from many angles: It is a prophetic proclamation, a book of allegorical visions, an exegetical study, a theological summa. Finally, it may be considered as a multimedia work in which the arts of illumination, music and drama contribute their several beauties to enhance the text and heighten the visionary message.⁴² The earliest manuscript to survive until modern times was prepared around 1165 in the Rupertsberg scriptorium and illuminated with thirty-five remarkable miniatures. These paintings were produced at great expense, using costly gold and silver leaf as well as colors, and they are iconographically unique.⁴³ In style, too, they diverge from contemporary manuscript illumination as strikingly as Hildegard's Latin differs from that of a rhetorically trained twelfth-century humanist. Recent literature has presented the abbess herself as painter, but there is no medieval evidence to support this hypothesis, and if it were true both Hildegard and her biographers would surely have mentioned such a notable achievement. Given the peculiarities of the work, however, it seems likely that the artist (or artists) lacked formal training and worked under the visionary's personal supervision. The painter may have been a gifted Rupertsberg nun, or perhaps a monk from St. Disibod or another monastery closely associated with Hildegard.

Whoever the artist, he or she stayed close to the text of the visions and apparently eschewed the use of models, recombining iconographic motifs in new forms as creatively as Hildegard re-envisioned the familiar themes of Christian doctrine. The paintings are thus far more than illustrations; insofar as possible, they draw the viewer into the numinous world of the visionary's own experience. In this respect they resemble the didactic and meditative diagrams sprinkled through the works of Hugh of St. Victor.⁴⁴ The originality of these miniatures becomes even clearer when they are compared with illustrated Hildegard manuscripts prepared outside the Rupertsberg, such as the Heidelberg Scivias and the Lucca manuscript of the Liber divinorum operum.⁴⁵

Unfortunately the famed Rupertsberg Scivias vanished in the bombing of Dresden and has not been seen since 1945. But a photocopy had been providentially made in 1927, and the twentieth-century nuns of Eibingen devoted seven years to the preparation of a hand-copied and hand-painted facsimile on parchment. This manuscript (1927-33), with miniatures painted by Dame Josepha Knips, is today our only surviving source for the original colors. Although the black-and-white copies reproduced in this volume do not convey the beauty of the originals, they may serve the reader as points of orientation when details of the text are difficult to visualize. Readers must be wary, however; although the correspondence between text and miniature is close, it is not exact, and discrepancies should be noted.

In the last Scivias vision Hildegard introduced music to end her work in a triumphant chorus of praise. We know from epistolary evidence that she was already celebrated for her lyrics as early as 1148 and as far away as Paris.⁴⁶ The fourteen pieces included in Scivias III.13, which were later incorporated in her Symphonia, comprise seven antiphons and seven responsories in honor of the Virgin Mary, the angels and the hierarchy of heaven. Although the Scivias manuscripts do not supply musical notation, Hildegard's melodies have come down to us in the two extant Symphonia manuscripts, and several of these pieces are now available on record.⁴⁷ In Hildegard's lifetime they were undoubtedly sung by the Rupertsberg nuns as part of the Divine Office.

Following the songs is a short play, which brings the reader from heaven back to earth, from the Church Triumphant to the Church Militant. It presents the struggle of a soul tempted by the enemy but rescued and strengthened by a choir of Virtues, until it finally attains salvation and sees the devil bound. In this short form the play admirably summarizes the themes of Book III. It was probably not long afterward that Hildegard expanded it into the longer version known as the Ordo virtutum and composed its melodies, if indeed she had not already done so.⁴⁸ This liturgical drama (also available on record) antedates other known morality plays by about a century and a half.⁴⁹ Unlike other moralities, it is set entirely to music, with the exception of the devil's speeches; as the spirit opposed to all harmony, he is incapable of song. While later morality plays, composed in the vernacular, aimed at wide popular appeal and often included humor, Hildegard's Latin drama is thoroughly monastic and aristocratic in character.⁵⁰ Its performance at the Rupertsberg may have coincided with the dedication of the nuns' new church in 1152, a year after the Scivias was completed.

Synopsis of the Visions

Because of the length of this volume it has unfortunately been impossible to provide detailed annotation. Hence the reader may find it helpful to use these capsule summaries as a vade mecum alongside the translation. The synopsis provided below highlights the salient features of symbolism, iconography and doctrine presented by each vision and its accompanying miniatures. It may be read either as an overview of the Scivias or as an introduction to the individual sections.

Book One: The Creator and Creation

1. The mountain of God. Hildegard sees the Lord of the universe enthroned as “angel of great counsel” on an iron-colored mountain, which represents the eternity of his kingdom. The commentary highlights divine majesty vis-à-vis mortal humility, for the two Virtues irradiated by the glory of God are Fear of the Lord and Poverty of Spirit—both images of the seer’s own state of mind as she confronts this awesome vision. One Virtue represents the beginning of wisdom, and the other, the first beatitude. Like Isaiah in his vision of the Temple (Is 6:1–8), Hildegard is called and sent by the Lord to proclaim his justice. She is then granted insight into the mystery of human intentions as God sees and judges them.

2. Creation and the fall. In highly compressed and allegorical form this vision depicts the fall of Lucifer and his angels (represented as “living lamps” or stars) and the subsequent fall of Adam and Eve. The iconography is unusual and full of arcane significance. Eve, for instance, appears as a shining cloud full of stars because she is the “mother of all living,” and her unborn children are meant to replace the fallen angels. Hildegard’s commentary on the Genesis narrative largely exonerates Eve and lays the greatest burden of blame on Satan, breaking with the usual tendency to interpret this text in a misogynist vein.⁵¹

Representation of the first human couple serves as a vehicle for teachings on sexuality and marriage. Hildegard’s message here is in complete conformity with mainstream Catholic doctrine. She teaches that marriage is good, but virginity is better; divorce, adultery and fornication are wrong; consanguinity is a bar to marriage; procreation is a natural process designed by God but tainted by original sin; and sexual relations are permissible only when both partners are fertile. In the relations between man and woman she affirms male supremacy yet stresses mutuality, even to the point of misquoting 1 Corinthians 11:9. Where Paul said “Man was not created for woman, but woman for man,” Hildegard states that “woman was created for the sake of man, and man for the sake of woman.” She adds that there is no reason why a menstruating woman should not attend church, although a bride who has just lost her virginity and a man who has been wounded in battle should abstain.

The vision ends on a note of reassurance. Although Adam and Eve were cast out of paradise, the sinless Redeemer delivered them by means of chastity, humility, charity and other virtues. Likewise, human disobedience caused the whole creation to rebel, destroying its original harmony, yet God preserved paradise inviolate as a sign of great mercy to come.

INTRODUCTION

3. The cosmos. This vision of the cosmic egg, depicted in loving detail by the miniaturist, represents the universe as a symbolic, layered structure in which God sustains powerfully contesting forces in a delicate balance. Moving from the outermost layer inward, Hildegard sees zones of luminous and shadowy fire, representing divine purification and judgment; pure ether, which signifies faith; a watery layer for baptism; and finally the globe made up of four elements. Each of the heavenly bodies also has its allegorical meaning: the solar disk is Christ, sun of justice; the moon is the church, which reflects his light; stars are the works of piety; and so forth. Surprisingly, Hildegard does not develop the creation and birth mythology that the egg shape may suggest to readers; rather, she represents this form—"small at the top, large in the middle and narrowed at the bottom"—as symbolizing the stages of human history. The rest of the allegory also focuses on the mysteries of the incarnation and the church, in keeping with the overall theme of the Scivias.

In the Liber divinorum operum I.2 Hildegard presents an alternative vision of the universe in the form of a sphere. Her interpretation there correlates its proportions with those of the human body, since a major theme of that book is the correspondence of macrocosm and microcosm. To explain the discrepancies between her two visions she remarks that the egg shape better demonstrates the distinction between the various elements, while the sphere more accurately represents the measurements of the cosmos.⁵²

The vision concludes with a long polemic against astrology, magic and divination. The seer argues that heavenly bodies are the servants of God and have no power in themselves for good or evil; people who scrutinize the stars to learn their fate are guilty of pride and fall prey to the devil's seductions. It is difficult to reconcile this polemic with the deterministic lunar astrology set forth in Causes and Cures.⁵³

4. Soul and body. In this three-part vision Hildegard begins with a powerful myth, continues with teaching on human nature and psychology, and closes with a series of moral exhortations. The vision must have been a favorite with the artist, who illustrated it with three separate paintings.

The structure is unusual in that a lengthy myth precedes interpretation of the vision proper. Hildegard introduces a lonely pilgrim soul wandering in the "tabernacle" of her body and lamenting because she has lost her mother, the heavenly Zion. The soul's poignant lament recalls the lamentations of Israel in the wilderness, seeking the promised land and the new tabernacle in which God dwelt. Attentive readers will hear echoes of Job, Jeremiah and other biblical sufferers. There is also a strong Platonic coloring, for the soul grieves that it is oppressed by the sinful and burdensome flesh; the mother-daughter dynamics may even suggest Demeter and Kore, with the devil cast in the role of Pluto. The myth is illustrated in the right-hand column of the first miniature, reading from bottom to top; here the artist has depicted the soul led captive by demons, tortured on the rack, assaulted by savage beasts, hiding in a cave, scaling a mountain and, at last, given wings to soar up to its heavenly tabernacle, where the devil continues to attack it in vain. This vividly realized psychomachia is akin to the Ordo virtutum.

The heavenly voice next explains the vision itself, which represents the infusion of the soul into the embryo in its mother's womb. Conception and pregnancy are described by means of the ancient folk analogy of milk curdling into cheese; the quality of the milk or semen determines the strong, weak or bitter character of the product. This vision is illustrated in the left side of the miniature, which shows men and women—the ancestors of the unborn child—carrying bowls of cheese, into which a devil insinuates corruption. There follows a discussion of the natural powers of soul and body: the intellect or moral judgment, the will, the reason and the senses. Soul and body are meant to cooperate harmoniously; the body is not inherently evil, but through the devil's temptations it is a continual source of tribulation to the soul.⁵⁴ The second miniature portrays a Christian kneeling in prayer to receive strength against demonic attack.

In a third painting angels and demons struggle for possession of the soul as it passes from the dying person's mouth. This image of the four last things (death and judgment, heaven and hell) corresponds to Hildegard's classic teaching on the Two Ways. Every soul must choose between the sacred East, where the sun of justice rises, and the bitter North, where Satan rules his realm of darkness and cold (Is 14:12–15).

5. The synagogue. This brief vision personifies the people of the covenant in the form of a woman, Synagoga, who is the “mother of the incarnation” and thus the mother-in-law of the church. Hildegard is adapting a traditional iconography, which depicted the two women as rivals—Synagoga rejected and blinded because of her unbelief and supplanted in God's favor by Ecclesia, or the Gentile church.⁵⁵ The stereotype of the Jews as a literal, carnal people is present in force. But the “true believers” in Israel—Abraham, Moses and the prophets—enjoy a privileged status and are allowed to admire the new bride's beauty from afar. Like many of the figures in Hildegard's visions, Synagoga can be “read” vertically from head to feet as an allegory of successive historical periods. In the end, the seer teaches, the Jews will be converted and “run back with great haste to the way of salvation." This commonplace view, derived from Romans 11, was shared by Bernard of Clairvaux, Honorius and many other contemporaries.

INTRODUCTION

6. The choirs of angels. The nine choirs of angels were conventionally ranked, in ascending order, as angels, archangels, virtues, powers, principalities, dominations, thrones, cherubim and seraphim, and arrayed in three clusters of three. Hildegard's text supplies an alternative division into two, five and two so that her nine choirs can provide analogues for human nature. Angels and archangels signify body and soul, the cherubim and seraphim, as always, symbolize the knowledge and love of God, and the five middle orders represent the five senses. Further allegorical details pertain to the incarnation and the life of virtue. From Pseudo-Dionysius Hildegard takes the notion that the celestial hierarchy above mirrors the ecclesiastical hierarchy below. Her vision of the choirs as "armies arrayed like a crown" inspires the artist's brilliant mandala-like image of nine concentric circles ranged about a void to signify the ineffable Presence.⁵⁶

The reason for placing the synagogue and the angels in this section of the Scivias is not immediately apparent. But Hildegard may have meant to show that while the synagogue prefigures the work of salvation and the angels assist in it, true redemption could not be accomplished until the advent of Christ and the church—the subject of Book II.

Book Two: The Redeemer and Redemption

1. The Redeemer. This initial vision recapitulates important themes of Book I—Hildegard's prophetic call, the creation and the fall of man—but the emphasis has now shifted to the Second Person of the Trinity. Vision I.2 focused on Satan and Eve; this vision concentrates on Christ and Adam. Hildegard first sees an unquenchable fire that is "wholly living and wholly Life," with a sky-blue flame to represent the eternity of the Word. After creating the first human being, the triune God offers him "the sweet precept of obedience" in the shape of a fragrant flower, but Adam fails to pluck it and thereby falls into thick darkness. The forbidden fruit of Genesis is here transmogrified into a blossom that the man is supposed to pluck, so that his sin becomes one of omission; thus obedience is seen as a positive good and evil as a privation. This revisionist view expresses Hildegard's idea that the "knowledge of good and evil" is God's gift to humanity rather than the devil's temptation.

Redemption proceeds in gradual stages. First the night of sin is illumined by the shining stars of the patriarchs, then by the prophets, culminating in John the Baptist; finally Christ appears as the radiance of dawn. By his passion and resurrection he delivers Adam, whose fate is contrasted with that of the unrepentant Satan. In the miniature Adam is represented three times: as the creature fashioned from mud (adamah = "red earth"); as the young man who withholds his hand from the flower; and as the old man who has fallen into darkness and "returned to his earth." The artist's vision diverges significantly from the text. He or she has added a central medallion to represent the six days of creation, and the unity of Creator and Redeemer is brilliantly figured in symmetrical spheres of light at the top and bottom of the miniature. A "finger of God" stretches downward from the light to awaken the newly created Adam, while the radiance of the risen Christ flames upward to redeem the fallen Adam.⁵⁷

2. The Trinity. Somewhat illogically, this vision of the triune God follows that of the Redeemer, perhaps because the Trinity was first revealed to humankind through the incarnation. Father, Son and Holy Spirit are signified by a radiant light, a sapphire-hued figure and a glowing fire; the exposition stresses the unity and inseparability of the Persons. Hildegard then introduces three similitudes from created things: a stone with its dampness, solidity and kindling power; a flame with its light, heat and color; and a word with its sound, breath and meaning. The analogies of the flame and the word are ancient, but they are developed here in original fashion. It is noteworthy that none of these analogues is gender-specific, and the naming of Father and Son is balanced by a reference to "the embrace of God's maternal love," which is charity.

From the rather abstract language of Hildegard's text the artist has conceived another mandala-image. "Light" and "fire" become concentric circles glimmering with gold and silver leaf, and quivering lines suggest the vitality and energy of the living God.⁵⁸

3. The church, bride of Christ and mother of the faithful. This is the first of four visions that center around the figure of Ecclesia and the sacraments. Baptism, the sacrament of her maternity, is represented in striking imagery faithfully reproduced by the artist. Reading the miniature from top to bottom and from right to left, the four panels illustrate successive moments of Hildegard's vision. (a) Ecclesia, the bride of Christ, lovingly embraces his altar. (b) She prepares to give birth to God's children; festive angels prepare their places in heaven. (c) Baptism. Two ancient images, the womb of Mother Church and the net of Peter, are conflated here. Converts or catechumens, represented as "black children," race to enter their mother's womb to be reborn; she gives birth "through her mouth," that is, through the words of blessing and the breath of the Spirit. The luminous disk, familiar from the previous visions, represents invocation of the Trinity. As the newly baptized Christians emerge, they shed their dark skins and are clothed in the "pure white garments" of initiation. (d) Christ instructs the newly baptized in the Two Ways of sin and justice.

INTRODUCTION

The teaching in this vision emphasizes the majestic and mysterious powers granted to the church as well as the grace of baptism. The church will never be conquered by hell; her secrets transcend comprehension; her crown is the teaching of the apostles, and her heart, the virginity of Mary. Following patristic doctrine Hildegard uses the symbol of Ecclesia's virginity to accentuate her pure faith, inviolate in the face of heresy and schism. But in her capacity as mother, Ecclesia grieves over the sins and rebellions of her children.

Baptism, Hildegard teaches, is analogous to circumcision under the old covenant, but is accessible to people of both sexes and all ages. It opens the kingdom of heaven to believers and remits the sin of Adam. Several brands of Donatism are rejected in passing; for example, baptism does not depend on the holiness of the priest, but on the invocation of the Trinity; infant baptism is acceptable to God; a layman may baptize in case of emergency. The symbolism of rebirth inspires an interesting digression on literal birth, which includes a surprising analogy between a man's motives in procreation and God's motives in creation. But the superior excellence of virginity is reiterated.

4. Confirmation. After the faithful are cleansed in baptism, they must receive the Holy Spirit through the sacrament of anointing with holy oil, which is reserved to the bishop. The vision depicts the power of the Spirit as a lofty tower that upholds and strengthens the woman Ecclesia. Her children appear in varying guises to indicate their spiritual and ecclesiastical status; thus, contemplatives are distinguished from lay Christians by the more glorious light on which they fix their gaze. But in each category some are more zealous in devotion, others more vigorous in justice. Hildegard teaches that while the sacraments are necessary for salvation, they are not sufficient; they must be accompanied by repentance and good works.

5. Three orders in the church. Ecclesia appears in her glory, clothed in radiant light of many colors: crystal clarity to signify the priesthood, the rosy glow of dawn for virginity, purple for monastic imitation of Christ's passion, and cloudy brightness for the secular life. This vision strongly affirms the principle of hierarchy in the church: spiritual people are to secular as day is to night, and monks rank as high above clergy as archangels do above angels. It is permissible to move from a lower order into a higher, but not to descend from a higher to a lower.

Hildegard treats the priesthood briefly, stressing clerical celibacy and commending the life of regular canons. Her vision of virginity is more lyrical, characterized by imagery of music, flowers and feminine beauty. Virgins, she says, imitate the example of Christ and John the Baptist; they alone are entitled to sing the new song in paradise [Rv 14:3-4]; they go beyond the letter of the Law to fulfill the counsels of perfection. On the subject of monasticism Hildegard addresses several points of contemporary controversy. Although monks rank higher than priests, they may be ordained and preach if the church has need of them. Since God considers the intention rather than the outward habit of the monk, children should not be offered as oblates without their consent. Renegade monks, on the other hand, must be brought back to the monasteries they have fled. Married couples cannot separate to take monastic vows unless both partners consent.

INTRODUCTION

Although Hildegard's position on oblates and her emphasis on intention are in keeping with the spirit of twelfth-century monastic reform, she expresses a highly critical view of new orders. Praising St. Benedict as a "second Moses," she inveighs against diversity, novelty and singularity and proclaims that God will judge innovators. The faithful monk ought to be "humble and content with what his predecessors instituted for him." This kind of humility is equivalent to conservatism; in her view innovation can spring only from pride. rather than humility

The last part of the vision elaborates on the unforgivable sin of "blasphemy against the Holy Spirit," which Hildegard defines as despair of God's mercy in the form of either final impenitence or suicide.

6. Christ's sacrifice and the church. This vision, by far the longest in the Scivias, deals with subjects of burning interest to twelfth-century theologians: the nature of the eucharist and of the priesthood. In the vision proper Hildegard draws on a patristic typology that enjoyed wide diffusion in medieval art. The crucifixion is represented as the wedding of Christ and the church: As Christ hangs on the cross his predestined bride, Ecclesia, descends from heaven and is united with him, receiving his body and blood as her dowry. Whenever Mass is celebrated, Ecclesia, as heavenly archetype of the celebrant, devoutly offers this dowry to the Father and renews her marriage union with the Son.

The numerous doctrinal points in this section can be grouped under six headings: eucharistic theology, liturgical practice, communion, requirements for the priesthood, sexual ethics and penance. Under the first heading Hildegard offers a commentary on the Mass, focusing particularly on the consecration of the gifts. Although she does not use the word transubstantiation and its related Aristotelian vocabulary, her teaching is in essence identical with the doctrine later defined by Fourth Lateran and elaborated by Thomas Aquinas. A surprising emphasis falls on the role of the Virgin Birth. The Virgin Annunciate becomes a model for priests, who bring Christ's body into the world by uttering the words of consecration just as Mary did by uttering her fiat; and the wheat of the eucharistic bread is made to symbolize the purity of Christ's virginal flesh. Since original sin is transmitted through the taint of lust, the Redeemer's body and blood must be free from every hint of sexuality in order to cleanse the sinful flesh of mortals.

After treating various points of ritual—fasting before communion, reception in both kinds, the use of traditional words and vestments—Hildegard presents a typology of communicants. The second miniature for this vision illustrates the five types: faithful believers, doubters, the unchaste and lustful, the malicious and envious, the warlike and oppressive. According to the quality of their faith and repentance, Christians may communicate either unto salvation or unto judgment.

In the section on priesthood Hildegard condemns simony (the purchase and sale of ecclesiastical office) and pluralism (the holding of multiple benefices by a single cleric). She also reiterates traditional criteria for the priesthood: a candidate must be adult, male and sound in body. (Women, she says, are “an infirm and weak habitation appointed to bear children,” but as virgins they can possess the priesthood vicariously through their bridegroom, Christ.) The bulk of this section is devoted to clerical celibacy. Priests must have no wife except for the church and the justice of God; a married priest is an adulterer and serves the devil. Hildegard answers the objection that priests were married in apostolic times by arguing that God formerly permitted this aberration “because there were so few priests,” just as he permitted the patriarchs to marry their female kin because there were so few people. “But now the church is adult and strong, and her ministers are many,” so a higher standard of celibacy can be enforced.

The polemic against clerical marriage leads into a long catalogue of sexual sins: cross-dressing, fornication, homosexuality, “unnatural” intercourse, masturbation, bestiality and “nocturnal pollution.” This list of prohibitions in turn raises the subject of confession and penance, which is treated more briefly. Confession resurrects sinners from death; it may be heard by a layman in case of emergency; and it is strengthened by almsgiving—especially if the recipients are among the “deserving poor.” Hildegard urges priests to use their power of binding and loosing effectively and condemns those who abuse this authority through anger or negligence.

7. The devil. Hildegard's placement of this vision is pivotal. The threat of satanic temptation ends this book as the promise of angelic assistance ended Book I, but the vision of the devil bound anticipates the dramatic victory that closes Book III.

The hideous multicolored “worm” or dragon symbolizes the many kinds of vice and temptation with which the Evil One assaults people. As in Hildegard's previous visions of the church, Christians are divided into categories according to their degrees of faith and justice. Satan assails the "spiritual people" (priests and monastics) in one manner, the secular people in another, while heretics are represented as wholly in his power. Some features of the heresy Hildegard attacks suggest the Cathars; for example, they revile the sacraments and the clergy, feign Catholicism out of fear and lay claim to a pretended sanctity. Other accusations, for instance of devil-worship and obscene sacrifices of human seed, are ancient slanders earlier hurled at Christians and gnostics of the subapostolic age. Satan's power appears to be formidable, even though he is bound firmly by a chain and in the end the saints trample on him.

INTRODUCTION

An interesting feature of the vision is the image of Vanity Fair, possibly inspired by Revelation 13:17 and 18:11-17. This scene is illustrated in the lower panel of the second miniature, where the artist has depicted the sinister merchants in the hats worn by medieval Jews.

Book Three: The Virtues and the History of Salvation

1. God, Lucifer and humanity. This vision at first recapitulates I.1: Hildegard sees a figure of God enthroned in majesty and her calling is reaffirmed. The poignant novelty here is an image of newly created humanity: God "held to his breast what looked like black and filthy mire, as big as a human heart, surrounded with precious stones and pearls." The operative theological idea is an old, half-mythical opinion that humanity was created to replace a "tenth choir" of angels who fell with Lucifer. An eloquent miniature represents Hildegard's vision of these angels as shooting stars that are gradually extinguished as they fall, until only cinders remain. But their departing light is not quenched; it returns to the bosom of God, and since Satan fell "without an heir," God treasures his inheritance of light for a new creation. Unlike the angels, human beings are then fashioned with a "vile earthly nature" to preserve them from pride and consequent ruin.

The vision thus supplies one possible answer to a question that must arise among all theists who denigrate the body, namely, why a good God should have created such a "miserable form" in the first place. Despite the wretchedness of human nature, however, the Son of God has assumed it in the incarnation, so that no angel dares to despise it. Moreover, the filthy mire is held firmly to God's heart and adorned with the gems and pearls of sanctity. The vision is meant to inspire humility and gratitude as well as fear of God's justice; the commentary stresses that unlike the fallen angels, human beings can and therefore must repent of their misdeeds.

INTRODUCTION

2. The edifice of salvation. This vision sets forth a blueprint of the symbolic building that will be expounded in detail through the remainder of the book. The miniature provides an indispensable diagram, although it depicts a square building where Hildegard describes a rectangular one. Built on the mountain of God, grounded in faith and fear of the Lord, the city or edifice of salvation has a double symbolism representing, on the one hand, the course of salvation history, and on the other, the doctrines and virtues every Christian must believe and acquire to be saved.

The most important wall links the East (represented on top, as is usual in medieval maps) with the North (shown to the left). In the East lies the figurative realm of Christ, in the North that of Satan, and the luminous wall between the two therefore signifies speculativa scientia, or the knowledge of good and evil. This is not "speculative knowledge" in the sense of abstract thought, but "reflective knowledge" in the sense of moral judgment (the adjective is from speculum, a mirror); this faculty is the cognitive aspect of free will.⁵⁹ The remaining three walls are of masonry, which has several meanings: the joined stones denote human flesh and its labors, the Law and the works of justice. Thus moral knowledge must be conjoined with right action for the upbuilding of salvation.

Hildegard gives two interpretations for the points of the compass. In one reading, East and West signify the dawn of salvation and the sunset of the Law, while North and South represent the fall and restoration of Adam. Alternatively, the diagram may be read counterclockwise beginning at the right. The four cornerstones are successive covenants between God and humanity: At the South stands Adam, at the East Noah (the dawn of justice), at the North Abraham and Moses as representatives of the Law (the beginning of war against Satan), and at the West Christ (the revelation of the Trinity).⁶⁰ The proportions of the building also receive numerological meanings.

This vision assigns further theological value to the despised body. Again human beings are contrasted with angels: The latter are purer and more luminous, but humans are more valiant and meritorious soldiers of God because they have to do battle against their own nature. In ascetic struggle "they conquer themselves, chastising their bodies, and so know themselves to be in [God's] army."

3. The tower of anticipation of God's will. From now on the exploration of the building proceeds counterclockwise, beginning with the northeast wall. Hildegard first examines the "tower of anticipation" of God's perfect will, which was manifested in the incarnation and first prefigured in the Abrahamic covenant of circumcision.⁶¹ Aside from foreshadowing baptism, this covenant is taken primarily as a sign of sexual discipline: The initial

"cutting off" of unchastity leads by stages to the perfect virginity of Christ and Mary.

Within each portion of the building Hildegard sees a group of feminine Virtues appropriate to that particular moment of salvation history. The Virtues occupy an important place in her theology; they are not exclusively human qualities but "brilliant stars given by God, which shine forth in human deeds." The Latin virtus means "energy" or "power" as well as "virtue," and Hildegard plays on both senses. In effect, a virtue is a divine quality that becomes an operative force in willing souls and fully incarnates itself in right action; it is a synthesis of grace and moral effort. As Hildegard puts it, the Virtues do not work of their own accord, but with the cooperation of the person who has received them from God. They appear in feminine form in keeping with a long tradition of virtue-vice allegory that goes back to Prudentius, but also because in Hildegard's symbolic theology the feminine represents the sphere of synergy in which divinity and humanity work together for salvation.

The first three Virtues in this tower represent the initial manifestations of the ascetic life: Celestial Love, Discipline and Modesty. There follow two christological Virtues: Mercy (associated with the Virgin Mary and Christ's birth) and Victory (connected with his conquest of Satan). Standing somewhat to the side are Patience, who imitates Christ's passion, and Longing, who clings to a crucifix. Hildegard's allegorical technique further characterizes the Virtues by assigning intricate symbolism to their iconography—colors, garments and attributes.⁶² In addition, each Virtue utters a self-defining motto; similar formulas recur in the Ordo virtutum where they are set to music.

4. The pillar of the Word of God. Near the northern corner stands the pillar of the Word, signifying both the incarnate Word and the written word of Scripture. The latter has not two parts as one would expect, but three: Old Testament, New Testament and commentary, or "the profound and rich wisdom of the principal doctors." Such is the authority that Hildegard, in accord with monastic tradition, assigned to patristic exegesis. The first two sides of this triangular pillar display the saints of the old and new covenants: first, patriarchs and prophets, seen as precursors of Christ, and then apostles, martyrs and other Christian heroes. The third side, representing the exegetes, shows by its shape that wisdom arose from a small beginning, increased in the course of time, but will dwindle again in the last days. At the top of the pillar perches the dove of the Holy Spirit.

The Virtue in this vision is the Knowledge of God, more a divine than a human figure. More awesome in appearance than the other Virtues, she embodies the mystery of God's mercy and judgment in bringing sinners to grace through the scourge of calamity. Illness and other chastisements may redeem sinners by making them physically incapable of their former vices, which otherwise they would never voluntarily leave. These reluctant Christians are the wedding guests whom Christ has "compelled to come in" (Lk 14:23).

5. The jealousy of God. "The Lord is a jealous God and avenging, the Lord is avenging and wrathful; . . . The Lord is slow to anger and of great might, and will by no means clear the guilty" (Na 1:2-3). This grim vision presents the vengeance of God against evil, symbolized by a wrathful crimson face and three silently beating wings. Naturally the head faces north, directing its vigilance against Satan and his kingdom.

In the face of God's jealousy no sin goes unpunished. If it is not avenged by voluntary penance it will exact its price either in earthly suffering or in the torments of purgatory or hell. Though vengeance may appear to strike without warning, God is always just, for human beings have been granted judgment to discern good from evil; ignorance of the Law is no excuse. Hildegard's ethical stance is one of uncompromising self-denial; the choice of good is associated with struggle and anxiety, and that of evil with self-will, desire and pleasure. Certain sins, such as desecration or robbery of a church, simony and withholding of tithes, are singled out as special objects of God's vengeance because they defile the honor of his house.

6. The stone wall of the old Law. The northwest wall of the building signifies the Old Testament Law, the period of history between Abraham and Christ, and the political order. Most of the commentary in this vision asserts and defends the principles on which Christian feudal society was based.

The human race, Hildegard maintains, is divided into two unequal orders, the spiritual and the secular, and each of these classes has its proper hierarchy. Among the secular people there are the higher and lower nobility, free men and women and serfs; among the spiritual there are "the excellent and the superior, the obeyers and the enforcers." Hildegard has no doubt that these distinctions were ordained by providence; they "were and are and always will be." Two ideological justifications for hierarchy are set forth: (a) it prevents anarchy, because without rulers people would "kill each other off and perish"; and (b) it teaches by the example of earthly authority how divine authority should be loved and feared. Though the spiritual power is more exalted than the secular, princes as well as prelates represent God's justice and mercy. The "greater" deserve to rule the "lesser" because God has chosen them for their superior abilities—intelligence, integrity, eloquence—just as he chose Jacob to rule over Esau. But usurpation of power, whether through bribery or simony, violence or black magic, is harshly condemned—despite the same Jacob's example! Subjects ought of course to be obedient; if they suffer persecution from rulers, they can imitate Christ's passion.

Eight Virtues inhabit this section of the building. The first group consists of Abstinence, Liberality and Piety: self-denial is the prerequisite for generosity toward God and neighbor. In the second group Truth, Peace and Beatitude appear, representing three stages in the victory over evil. Slightly apart stand two Virtues embodying God's temporal and eternal gifts: Discretion, associated with secular justice, and Salvation of Souls. The latter manifests herself in two phases: In her "Jewish" period she has a swarthy complexion, dark curls and a multicolored tunic, but after Christ's birth she takes on a luminous white aspect, stripping off all "diversity."

7. The pillar of the Trinity. In Scivias II.2 Hildegard presented the Trinity as an eternal living reality. Her focus in this vision is on the Trinity as a saving doctrine revealed by Christ at a particular moment of history. Hence the pillar appears at the west corner of the building, symbolizing the prophetic "end of the ages." It is triangular, like the pillar of the Word (III.4), and its three edges are sharp swords cutting off all infidels: heretics, Jews and pagans, symbolized respectively by chaff, broken wings and rotten wood. Hildegard adds a lengthy parable, which she then interprets as an allegory of the apostles' preaching, and supplies some rather cloudy similitudes for the Trinity. As if to defend their obscurity, she stresses that this divine mystery must be humbly accepted and not presumptuously scrutinized.

8. The pillar of the Savior's humanity. This important vision depicts the incarnation as the primary locus of the Virtues, that is, the context in which humanity is enabled to collaborate with God. The pillar closely resembles Jacob's ladder, but in place of the angels seen by the patriarch, Hildegard perceives "all the virtues of God ascending and descending." Her imagery is indebted to that of an earlier visionary, Hermas (third century), who in The Shepherd had described a host of celestial maidens in the guise of stonemasons working to build up the church.⁶³ Hildegard's maidens also carry stones, representing "the winged and shining deeds people do . . . to win salvation." These Virtues descend to human beings through the humanity of Christ and return to heaven through his divinity.

The miniature shows the influence of a traditional pictorial motif, the ladder of salvation, whereby Christians climb up from earth to heaven on the rungs of virtue. Based on classic texts like the Benedictine Rule and John Climacus's Ladder of Perfection, the image was particularly favored by monks and nuns. Many representations of it show demons on either side of the ladder, picking off unwary souls with their arrows;⁶⁴ Hildegard's image is more positive and depicts supportive Virtues in their place. At the top of the ladder stands the Grace of God, clothed as a bishop to admonish and exhort the faithful.

The seven principal Virtues (proceeding from top to bottom) are Humility, Charity, Fear of God and Obedience on the right, and Faith, Hope and Chastity on the left. Humility is the queen of Virtues, as in the Ordo virtutum, but Charity is the most important and has the longest speech. She wears the sapphire blue associated with the Word of God and is assimilated to him as Chastity is to the Virgin Mary. The latter is overshadowed by the dove of the Holy Spirit and appears pregnant with a child named Innocence. In several places the text echoes earlier visions: for example, Fear of the Lord first appeared in I.1, and Hope with her crucifix is very similar to Longing in III.3.

A more perplexing cross-reference points back to I.4, for Hildegard observes that the pillar of the Savior's humanity stands "in the same place" as the radiant diamond-shaped figure she had earlier seen. But that figure was independent of the allegorical building, so Hildegard must be implying that a consistent "inner geometry" persists through all her visions. In both contexts the figure in question signifies the incarnation, but in I.4 Hildegard was discussing the means by which every soul enters its body when it is formed in the womb, while here she stresses the uniqueness of Christ's birth from the Virgin.

The central teaching of the vision concerns synergy, or cooperation with God. Hildegard teaches that God's grace will not forsake even the most hardened sinner, but it is not irresistible; the human will always retains the freedom to choose or reject salvation. To the sinner grace brings first self-knowledge, then repentance, finally hope and amendment of life. The discourse of this Virtue should be compared with earlier teaching on the Knowledge and the Jealousy of God. In a lengthy digression Hildegard draws an analogy between the seven Virtues and the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit resting on Christ [Is 11:2], thus reinforcing the centrality of the God-man.

9. The tower of the church. This tower stands at the southern corner of the building and represents the whole history of the church; it is therefore unfinished. But somewhat inconsistently, the seven turrets at its summit, standing for the gifts of the Holy Spirit, are already built. This detail clearly indicates how allegorical significance prevails over the logical coherence of the image. The motifs of the heavenly ladder and the cooperation of Virtues are continued from the previous vision.

Wisdom, God's feminine co-worker in creation, stands atop the "house of seven pillars" described in Proverbs 9:1. As the first of the cardinal virtues,

INTRODUCTION

she precedes Justice, Fortitude and temperance. The last of the four, however, is given not her classical name but the more impressive title of Sanctity—an index of the importance Hildegard ascribed to sobriety and self-denial. Unique among the Virtues, Sanctity has three heads. Two are sexless, but the left one, labelled Self-Sacrifice, is significantly female.

Hildegard's doctrine of the church stresses the role of the apostles and doctors. The faithful, as always, are divided into various categories: some cherish and preserve their baptismal garment, others feel constrained by it but keep on struggling, while still others throw off the garment and return from the church into the world. Worst of all are the simoniacs with their filthy lucre. Continuing her polemic, Hildegard claims that they purchase offices "by means of [their] spiritual father, money—for in that transaction money becomes [their] bishop." But the attack on unjust authority is balanced once again by a call for obedience to the powers that be; they will perish horribly in God's judgment, but the time is not yet.

10. The Son of Man. This vision completes the circuit of the building, returning to the eastern corner where the Son of Man is seated on a throne beneath that of the Shining One (God the Father). He exhorts the people of God on self-knowledge, obedience and sexual discipline, reminding the married that coupling is only permissible out of desire for children, and the celibate that mere outer virginity does not suffice for their salvation. True continence is the gift of God and should not be promised hastily or presumptuously. A consecrated virgin should rely on divine strength alone and prepare for a lifetime of ascetic struggle.

Five more Virtues fill up the complement of the city. They are Constancy, Celestial Desire (symbolized by the thirsty hart of Psalm 41), Compunction, Contempt of the World (safely ensconced within the wheel of God's mercy) and Concord (winged like an angel because she prefigures the life of heaven). Christ appears in his human aspect in a rather understated form. Like Ecclesia, he is visible only from the navel upward because his lower parts represent ages of history yet to unfold. Some of these mysteries will be disclosed in the apocalyptic visions that follow.

11. The last days and the fall of Antichrist. This is the vision that won Hildegard her greatest celebrity as a prophet. Although she draws on earlier apocalyptic scenarios, notably that of the tenth-century monk Adso,⁶⁵ the seer adds powerful imagery of her own. Her three principal themes are (a) the "five ferocious epochs" to come; (b) the career of Antichrist; and (c) the rape and recovery of the church.

The upper left panel of the miniature depicts five beasts that symbolize future epochs of world history: a fiery dog, a yellow lion, a pale horse, a black pig and a gray wolf. Each of these animals suggests the temperament of villainous rulers to come. In the Liber divinorum operum, vision III.10, the description of these eras is considerably expanded, and ages of justice and reformation are posited in between the ages of misrule. All the beasts appear in the North, since they belong to Satan's kingdom; but no term is set to their rule. Hildegard says only that the world is now in its seventh age, "approaching the end of time." This is a conventional view, however, which has nothing to do with her symbolism of the beasts. In the sixth age of the world Christ was incarnate, just as on the sixth day Adam was created. The seventh age is a "sabbath," which may be indefinitely prolonged. One apocalyptic sign, however, is the fact that Hildegard herself prophesies. God has called her because his duly appointed authorities now languish in idleness, and the world order is showing signs of decrepitude.

INTRODUCTION

The approaching Antichrist is represented as a parodic inversion of Christ.⁶⁶ Born of a harlot who feigns that she is a virgin, he will be wholly possessed by the devil from his mother's womb and trained by her in the magical arts. Through preaching and false miracles, even the feigned resurrection of the dead, he will make many converts; finally he himself will simulate death and resurrection and promulgate his own scriptures. As Hildegard emphasizes Christ's virginity throughout the Scivias, she also stresses the Antichrist's lawless sexuality. Not only is he a child of fornication, but he himself will reject continence and all other forms of self-denial. For a time he will be opposed by the "two witnesses," Enoch and Elijah, whom God is reserving in heaven for the last times, but eventually they will suffer martyrdom for the faith.

The most daring part of the vision concerns the Antichrist's rape and bloody violation of the church, depicted in the lower panel of the miniature. Her private parts now become visible, with the monstrous head of the Antichrist appearing in place of her genitals, for he is both her son and her seducer. As Satan corrupted Eve, so will the son of perdition attempt to corrupt the virgin Ecclesia. But Christ's bride will emerge triumphant, though bruised, bloodied and in large part deceived by his wiles. After enduring persecution and martyrdom, she will be vindicated by her heavenly Bridegroom (upper right panel) and united to him in marriage. Scatology and eschatology merge as the Antichrist, self-exalted on a mountain of excrement, is struck down by a thunderbolt from on high.

12. The last judgment, the new heaven and the new earth. At an unspecified time after the fall of Antichrist, the last judgment with its terrors will come to pass and history will have ended. In Hildegard's vision there are no surprises in the judgment: Good and evil are plainly manifest in the forms of the newly awakened dead. Sentence is passed on the reprobate without appeal, and unbelievers are not even allowed to stand trial, for they are damned in advance. The saints, on the other hand, receive bliss and glory from Christ, who comes in majesty on the clouds of heaven, yet with his wounds still open from the cross.

As the Son of Man sits in judgment, all creation is "shaken by dire convulsions" in which the elements are purged of mortality. Hildegard sees a "black skin" peeled away from them, recalling her image of the newly baptized in II.3. There follows a chillingly Platonic vision of permanence: In the new heaven sun, moon and stars will stand motionless, and on the new earth shall be fire without heat, air without density, a sea without waves. The vision ends on a note of everlasting stasis: "And so there was no night, but day. And it was finished."

13. Symphony of praise. This magnificent coda is not really a vision but a concert. The songs Hildegard records in this section do indeed, as she claims, marvelously summarize all the meanings she has presented before. In the first fourteen pieces she offers praise to the Virgin Mary, the choirs of angels and five categories of saints: prophets, apostles, martyrs, confessors and virgins. Each rank of the celestial hierarchy is honored with an antiphon and a responsory, although the liturgical genres of these pieces are not specified here as they are in the Symphonia manuscripts.

Heaven is not populated only with saints, but also with repentant sinners. The second part of this section is a lament and prayer of intercession for the fallen. In the final portion a penitent soul's pilgrimage to heaven (earlier presented mythically in I.4) is set forth in dramatic form. The soul slips from well-meaning innocence to impatience when she asks the Virtues for a "kiss of the heart," and they warn instead that she must do battle by their side. At this point the devil intervenes and easily leads her into sin. In contrast to later morality plays, Hildegard is not interested in dramatizing the soul's adventures in evil; instead she presents a verbal contest between the devil and the Virtues to fill the time until the soul's repentance. In the end the Virtues receive the weeping penitent, and led by their queen Humility and celestial Victory, they conquer and bind the devil.⁶⁷

The play is followed by a brief commentary and a tribute to the power of music, anticipating the apologia Hildegard was to write at the end of her life. In liturgical song "words symbolize the body" and the humanity of Christ, she writes, "and the jubilant music indicates the spirit" and the Godhead. An allegorical reading of Psalm 150, in which the different instruments are made to symbolize the varieties of saints, leads into a final affirmation of the prophet's mission and brings the Scivias to a close.

INTRODUCTION

Hildegard's Place in the Tradition

Although Hildegard occupies a central place at the crossroads of twelfth-century culture, the question of "sources and influences" has always posed difficulties for students of her work. One reason for the problem has already been addressed: Hildegard's prophetic persona demanded that she present herself as a "simple and unlearned little woman," and her claim to direct visionary inspiration barred appeal to merely human authorities. Thus, although she was undoubtedly well-versed in theological and spiritual writers, she virtually never cited her sources in even the most conventional or formulaic way. In addition, her distinctive literary style makes it difficult to recognize quotations, except for the scriptural texts that she chose to gloss. Since the exegetical tradition in which she worked was both conservative and cumulative, any one of a dozen writers might be cited with equal plausibility as the source for a given doctrine or interpretation. Only in rare cases, such as the seer's debt to the Shepherd of Hermas in Scivias III.8, or to Adso's treatise On the Antichrist in III.11, can we point with confidence to an individual writer.

In general, the most pervasive influences in the Scivias are the Bible and its commentaries, the liturgy, the Benedictine Rule and the works of such widely read Church Fathers as Augustine, Jerome, Gregory the Great and Bede.⁶⁸ In all of these Hildegard's monastic heritage is evident. She was steeped in the Divine Office with its spirit of formal, communal praise; her idea of heaven (Scivias III.13) is a thoroughly Benedictine one, which emphasizes not the vision of God or the mystical union, but the unending liturgy of the saints. She was familiar with the moral as well as the exegetical works of the Fathers, particularly with their teachings on virginity. And if her knowledge of early Christian writings included a moderately obscure author like Hermas, it probably embraced a fair amount of apocryphal literature as well. Attempts to trace her reading in classical authors, including scientific writers, have remained highly conjectural.⁶⁹ Unfortunately we have no library catalogue for either the Rupertsberg or the monastery of St. Disibod; even if we had, a list of manuscripts would not take account of the rich oral tradition, so important even in the literate world of the monastery. Some of Hildegard's arcane lore about Adam and Eve, for instance, seems to come from Jewish tradition and may have been acquired firsthand,⁷⁰ and much of her medical knowledge was surely gained through oral transmission and experience.

Hildegard probably acquired her knowledge of the Church Fathers from florilegia and earlier medieval adaptations as well as original texts. Among late antique and Carolingian authors she would surely have known Isidore of Seville, Rabanus Maurus, Paschasius Radbertus and the hymnodist

INTRODUCTION

Notker of St. Gall. The Neoplatonic tradition, which strongly colored her cosmology—accounting for affinities with more “avant-garde” authors like Bernard Silvestris and Alan of Lille—may have reached her through John Scotus Eriugena.⁷¹ On the other hand, she might have known this author only indirectly through his twelfth-century popularizer, Honorius Augustodunensis. Among her contemporaries Hildegard stands closest to Honorius himself, a prolific author who apparently spent the latter part of his life in Regensburg,⁷² and to Rupert of Deutz, a Benedictine who wrote numerous works of theology and exegesis.⁷³ We have already noted similarities between the Scivias and the work of Hugh of St. Victor. Other reformers, such as Gerhoch of Reichersberg and Godfrey of Admont, furnish useful points of comparison and contrast for Hildegard’s ecclesiastical program.⁷⁴ And she was undoubtedly familiar with certain writings of Bernard of Clairvaux, the recipient of her first letter, although Cistercian spirituality had only a limited influence on her outlook. While she admired Bernard’s personal holiness and shared the order’s preoccupation with Caritas, or divine love, the physical and aesthetic austerities of the white monks were foreign to her. Her version of “bridal spirituality” is more indebted to traditional literature on virginity, such as the Speculum virginum,⁷⁵ than to Cistercian currents.

In sum, Hildegard’s opus presents us with a synthesis of classical Benedictine theology, exegetics and spirituality as they stood in the mid-twelfth century, touched but not yet deeply permeated by the new modes of piety that were already changing the face of the church.⁷⁶ Yet conservative as she was, nothing she ever wrote can be mistaken for the work of another author. All is charged with the urgency of her prophetic mission, shaped by her powerfully original visionary and poetic gifts, and not least, colored subtly but pervasively by her feminine self-awareness. Hildegard’s place in the tradition of women’s spirituality is a complex question.⁷⁷ While that tradition may be theoretically helpful in understanding her life and work, we must remember that it was a hidden tradition that Hildegard herself did not know; any similarities between her spirituality and that of earlier female writers must result from common solutions to common problems, not conscious or even unconscious influence. With regard to later female writers the case is very different; there we must reckon with Hildegard herself as a significant role model.

Her community at Bingen, unlike the famous convent at Helfta a century later, never became a vital center of feminine spiritual culture. It may be that Hildegard’s own presence was too overbearing, or her visionary gift too intimately bound up with her unique psychology and temperament, to inspire imitation. In any case, there was never a “school of Hildegard” as there was, so to speak, a “school of St. Bernard,” of St.-Victor, or of Eckhart. Nevertheless the seer did have one unsought “disciple,” her younger contemporary

INTRODUCTION

Elisabeth of Schönau.⁷⁸ Excited by Hildegard's growing fame, this young Benedictine began to have visions a year after the Scivias was published. She visited Hildegard, corresponded with her, honored her as a spiritual mother, named one of her books after the Scivias and even adopted the older nun's conception of an "effeminate age" to justify feminine prophecy. Like Hildegard, too, Elisabeth felt herself called to preach reform, write epistles of spiritual counsel and utter apocalyptic warnings. One contemporary chronicler saw the two visionary nuns as partners in a single divine visitation.⁷⁹

Yet a comparison between Hildegard and Elisabeth reveals precisely which elements of the older woman's spirituality belonged to the future and which to the past. As Elisha to Hildegard's Elijah, Elisabeth "inherited" her prophetic spirit along with her gift of visions, her fiery reformist zeal, her role as moral adviser to all who sought (or were subjected willy-nilly to) her advice, and her willingness to intervene in politics—though the two women were not always on the same side.⁸⁰ Like Hildegard, Elisabeth was spiritually sensitive and physically frail, prone to continual illness which often accompanied her visions. These shared traits continued to dominate the profile of women's spirituality in the later Middle Ages; we meet them again in Catherine of Siena, Birgitta of Sweden and a host of lesser-known women.

Yet there was much in Hildegard that Elisabeth found less congenial, or at any rate less imitable. The abbess of Bingen's systematic review of Christian doctrine, her Platonism, her scientific and cosmological interests, her deep learning, her idiosyncratic style and brilliant, esoteric symbology, her artistic gifts (expressed not only in her musical and dramatic creations but also in the careful, architectonic structure of her books)—all these remained foreign to the seer of Schönau. In short, it is the complexity, variety and sheer intellectual difficulty of Hildegard's opus that marks her and not Elisabeth as a woman of the twelfth-century Renaissance. Although the two nuns were contemporaries, one senses that Elisabeth would have been equally at home in a community of consecrated women a century later, while Hildegard would have been an anachronism.

What Elisabeth may have found lacking in her spiritual mother, and what she in turn supplied and passed on to later religious women, was precisely her mysticism. In her one finds ecstasies, deliberate cultivation of mystical experience, a highly developed subjectivity and deeply personal (as opposed to communal) relationships with the saints; one also finds a characteristically intimate and mutually dependent relationship with her confessor, so different from Hildegard's clearly dominant position vis-à-vis her secretary Volmar.⁸¹ Even in their approach to their common Benedictine heritage the two nuns differed remarkably. Hildegard translated her private visions into the public medium of liturgical praise, which her whole community could share; Elisabeth translated her public experience of the liturgy into private mystical conversations with the angels and saints.

My point here is not to make invidious comparisons between the two visionaries, so close and yet so fundamentally different, but rather to show how Hildegard's life and work were received by subsequent generations. In fact, the late medieval public recreated the spiritual mother in the image of her daughter, whose works were copied and read far more widely.⁸² Thus Hildegard was long remembered and celebrated as the visionary, prophet and apocalyptic preacher that she was; she was quickly forgotten as the learned writer, monastic theologian and gifted composer that she also was. The Cistercian prior Gebeno of Eberbach kept her prophetic reputation alive by publishing an extremely popular anthology of her apocalyptic prophecies, which he entitled Speculum futurorum temporum or Pentachronon (1220); this collection proved much more appealing to later medieval tastes than Hildegard's original writings.⁸³ On Gebeno's authority she was known to the Flemish mystic Hadewijch as "Hildegart die alle die Visione sach," and cited at length by Lodewijk van Velthem as an anti-fraternal prophet.⁸⁴ Somewhat later, as the generic image of a late medieval "holy woman" came to be superimposed on her dimly remembered figure, she was taken for a mystic and ecstatic.

The Christian humanists of the Renaissance took a new kind of interest in Hildegard. Trithemius, abbot of Sponheim (1462–1516), published enthusiastic if dubiously accurate reports of her career,⁸⁵ and Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples printed the first edition of the Scivias (1513). But the Reformation contributed two further distortions. Andreas Osiander claimed Hildegard as a Protestant in 1527, because of her prophecies against negligent clergy,⁸⁶ and in due time a more "virile age," which she had also prophesied, vented its misogyny by denying her the dignity of authorship altogether, ascribing her works to Volmar or some other pseudonymous male.⁸⁷

The rediscovery and authentication of Hildegard's oeuvre is the work of twentieth-century scholarship, which has gradually chipped away at the falsified, stereotypical image of the female mystic and the a priori notion that a medieval woman could not, and therefore did not, write.⁸⁸ But as Hildegard and her work become known to the public through popular as well as scholarly presentations, through concerts and recordings as well as articles and books, new stereotypes arise to replace the old. Just as the later Middle Ages and the Reformation found in Hildegard the role model they needed, so our own era has created the image of Hildegard the feminist, the liberationist, the "creation-centered mystic," the holistic health practitioner, the prophet of ecological justice.⁸⁹ This model of sanctity has proven useful and inspiring to many women and men, and it contains a grain (but only a grain) of historical truth. The image of a saint, however, is always a work of synergy. Hildegard teaches that a virtuous life is the joint creation of God and humanity. By extension, a saintly life is the joint creation of the era that produces the saint and the era that venerates him or her. Those who admire Hildegard's contemporary icon will find it lovingly painted elsewhere. For those who wish to become acquainted with Hildegard the author, this faithful and unabridged translation of the Scivias lets her speak for herself.

INTRODUCTION

INTRODUCTION

Recent writers, with the notable exception of Peter Dronke, have been more skeptical about the extent of Hildegard's classical learning.

70. According to her Vita (II.1), Hildegard disputed with Jews and tried to convert them: PL 197: 105b.

71. Heinrich Schipperges notes the affinities but does not believe that either Hildegard or the Chartrian poets were acquainted with the new Arabic learning: "Einflüsse arabischer Medizin auf die Mikrokosmosliteratur des 12. Translator's Note

Scivias, St. Hildegard's great work of religious genius, is composed of a relatively brief Prologue (Declaration) and three Books, each Book being made up of several Visions. That Hildegard saw each Book as a unit is clear both from the climactic movement of each of her three main parts and from the fact that she employs three closing sentences of a poetic character. By the first of these she concludes all six of the Visions of Book One; by the second, all seven of the Visions of Book Two; and by the third, all thirteen of the Visions of Book Three.

Every Vision contains a varying number of subdivisions, unequal in length, indicated by numbered subtitles. Certain illustrations in the twelfth-century manuscript (reproduced in colors and gold both in Böckeler's German translation and in the Brepols 1978 critical Latin text, and in black and white in this translation) show that Hildegard herself wanted the subdivisions and corresponding subtitles. My translation therefore retains both subdivisions and corresponding subtitles; to save space, I have abridged the more lengthy subtitles.

For each separate Vision Hildegard uses the following literary procedure: First she gives the reader a poetic and obscure account of what she "saw," then she goes on to repeat and develop each sentence or phrase of the preliminary account, disclosing gradually the Vision's deep significance. And yet she never says, "I have outlined all the points, and now I will repeat and develop them." Therefore, for the assistance of the reader, italics are used in each vision both for her initial account and for her repetitions of each sentence or phrase thereof in her subsequent explanation.

Because of the extreme length of Scivias, I have reduced explanations, inserted between square brackets, to a minimum. Hildegard's three poetic expressions—"chrism makers" (pigmentarii) for "bishops and priests," "living fragrance" (vivens odor) for "monk," and "vowing the way of secret regeneration" (vovens iter secretae regenerationis) for "making monastic profession"—I translated literally only in the preliminary occurrences, reverting thereafter to the commonplace terms.

Mother Columba Hart, O.S.B.

TRANSLATOR'S NOTE

Co-Translator's Note

My contribution to this translation has been in two main areas. First, while remaining faithful to the meaning of the Latin, I have rendered it somewhat less literal to make it read better in English. In Book Three, Vision Thirteen, where Hildegard breaks into poetry to express the songs sung in heaven, I have carried out Mother Columba's decision to do them in poetic rather than prose form in English: I have put them into a very loose pentameter, not because that corresponds to any discernible meter in the original but to reflect Hildegard's poetic intentions.

Second, I have tried to correct a practice in the English of the last few hundred years that is not justified by the Latin. English has tended to translate the Latin homo, "human being," by the word man, which increasingly in our time is understood to refer exclusively to males. Latin has the word homo for "person," and vir and mulier for "man" and "woman"; because its pronouns agree in gender with the nouns they modify rather than with the beings they express, it is possible to write for long stretches in Latin without any suggestion of an exclusionary "his" or "her," which is unavoidable in English. Hildegard is writing for and about both men and women most of the time in this work and writes of them as "humans"; when she represents God speaking to her, He calls her not "O mulier" but "O homo," "O human being." Consequently, with some slight loss in resonance in the English because we are used to grand rhetoric about "men" and "mankind," I have translated the various forms of homo by "person," "humans," "people" or "humanity" wherever possible. It has sometimes been necessary to use a singular, personal collective noun for Humanity, in which case I have used the capitalized "Man"; otherwise, wherever the words "man" and "woman" appear here, they reflect Hildegard's talk of the different situations of viri and mulieres in the original.

THE SEERESS

Declaration

These Are True Visions Flowing from God

And behold! In the forty-third year of my earthly course, as I was gazing with great fear and trembling attention at a heavenly vision, I saw a great splendor in which resounded a voice from Heaven, saying to me,

“O fragile human, ashes of ashes, and filth of filth! Say and write what you see and hear. But since you are timid in speaking, and simple in expounding, and untaught in writing, speak and write these things not by a human mouth, and not by the understanding of human invention, and not by the requirements of human composition, but as you see and hear them on high in the heavenly places in the wonders of God. Explain these things in such a way that the hearer, receiving the words of his instructor, may expound them in those words, according to that will, vision and instruction. Thus therefore, O human, speak these things that you see and hear. And write them not by yourself or any other human being, but by the will of Him Who knows, sees and disposes all things in the secrets of His mysteries.”

And again I heard the voice from Heaven saying to me, “Speak therefore of these wonders, and, being so taught, write them and speak.”

It happened that, in the eleven hundred and forty-first year of the Incarnation of the Son of God, Jesus Christ, when I was forty-two years and seven months old, Heaven was opened and a fiery light of exceeding brilliance came and permeated my whole brain, and inflamed my whole heart and my whole breast, not like a burning but like a warming flame, as the sun warms anything its rays touch. And immediately I knew the meaning of the exposition of the Scriptures, namely the Psalter, the Gospel and the other catholic volumes of both the Old and the New Testaments, though I did not have the interpretation of the words of their texts or the division of the syllables or the knowledge of cases or tenses. But I had sensed in myself wonderfully the power and mystery of secret and admirable visions from my childhood—that is, from the age of five—up to that time, as I do now. This, however, I showed to no one except a few religious persons who were living in the same manner as I; but meanwhile, until the time when God by His grace wished it to be manifested, I concealed it in quiet silence. But the visions I saw I did not perceive in dreams, or sleep, or delirium, or by the eyes of the body, or by the ears of the outer self, or in hidden places; but I received them while awake and seeing with a pure mind and the eyes and ears of the inner self, in open places, as God willed it. How this might be is hard for mortal flesh to understand.

But when I had passed out of childhood and had reached the age of full maturity mentioned above, I heard a voice from Heaven saying, “I am the Living Light, Who illuminates the darkness. The person [Hildegard] whom I have chosen and whom I have miraculously stricken as I willed, I have placed among great wonders, beyond the measure of the ancient people who saw in Me many secrets; but I have laid her low on the earth, that she might not set herself up in arrogance of mind. The world has had in her no joy or lewdness or use in worldly things, for I have withdrawn her from impudent boldness, and she feels fear and is timid in her works. For she suffers in her inmost being and in the veins of her flesh; she is distressed in mind and sense and endures great pain of body, because no security has dwelt in her, but in all her undertakings she has judged herself guilty. For I have closed up the cracks in her heart that her mind may not exalt itself in pride or vainglory, but may feel fear and grief rather than joy and wantonness. Hence in My love she searched in her mind as to where she could find someone who would run in the path of salvation. And she found such a one and loved him [the monk Volmar of Disibodenberg], knowing that he was a faithful man, working like herself on another part of the work that leads to Me. And, holding fast to him, she worked with him in great zeal so that My hidden miracles might be revealed. And she did not seek to exalt herself above herself but with many sighs bowed to him whom she found in the ascent of humility and the intention of good will.

But I, though I saw and heard these things, refused to write for a long time through doubt and bad opinion and the diversity of human words, not with stubbornness but in the exercise of humility, until, laid low by the scourge of God, I fell upon a bed of sickness; then, compelled at last by many illnesses, and by the witness of a certain noble maiden of good conduct [the nun Richardis of Stade] and of that man whom I had secretly sought and found, as mentioned above, I set my hand to the writing. While I was doing it, I sensed, as I mentioned before, the deep profundity of scriptural exposition; and, raising myself from illness by the strength I received, I brought this work to a close—though just barely—in ten years.

These visions took place and these words were written in the days of Henry, Archbishop of Mainz, and of Conrad, King of the Romans, and of Cuno, Abbot of Disibodenberg, under Pope Eugenius.

And I spoke and wrote these things not by the invention of my heart or that of any other person, but as by the secret mysteries of God I heard and received them in the heavenly places.

And again I heard a voice from Heaven saying to me, "Cry out therefore, and write thus!"

THE CREATOR AND CREATION

THE ONE ENTHRONED

VISION ONE

God Enthroned Shows Himself to Hildegard

I saw a great mountain the color of iron, and enthroned on it One of such great glory that it blinded my sight. On each side of him there extended a soft shadow, like a wing of wondrous breadth and length. Before him, at the foot of the mountain, stood an image full of eyes on all sides, in which, because of those eyes, I could discern no human form. In front of this image stood another, a child wearing a tunic of subdued color but white shoes, upon whose head such glory descended from the One enthroned upon that mountain that I could not look at its face. But from the One who sat enthroned upon that mountain many living sparks sprang forth, which flew very sweetly around the images. Also, I perceived in this mountain many little windows, in which appeared human heads, some of subdued colors and some white.

And behold, He Who was enthroned upon that mountain cried out in a strong, loud voice saying, "O human, who are fragile dust of the earth and ashes of ashes! Cry out and speak of the origin of pure salvation until those people are instructed, who, though they see the inmost contents of the Scriptures, do not wish to tell them or preach them, because they are lukewarm and sluggish in serving God's justice. Unlock for them the enclosure of mysteries that they, timid as they are, conceal in a hidden and fruitless field. Burst forth into a fountain of abundance and overflow with mystical knowledge, until they who now think you contemptible because of Eve's transgression are stirred up by the flood of your irrigation. For you have received your profound insight not from humans, but from the lofty and tremendous Judge on high, where this calmness will shine strongly with glorious light among the shining ones.

"Arise therefore, cry out and tell what is shown to you by the strong power of God's help, for He Who rules every creature in might and kindness floods those who fear Him and serve Him in sweet love and humility with the glory of heavenly enlightenment and leads those who persevere in the way of justice to the joys of the Eternal Vision."

I The strength and stability of God's eternal Kingdom

As you see, therefore, the great mountain the color of iron symbolizes the strength and stability of the eternal Kingdom of God, which no fluctuation of mutability can destroy; and the One enthroned upon it of such great glory that it blinds your sight is the One in the kingdom of beatitude Who rules the whole world with celestial divinity in the brilliance of unfading serenity, but is incomprehensible to human minds. But that on each side of him there extends a soft shadow like a wing of wonderful breadth and length shows that both in admonition and in punishment ineffable justice displays sweet and gentle protection and perseveres in true equity.

BOOK ONE

2 Concerning fear of the Lord

And before him at the foot of the mountain stands an image full of eyes on all sides. For the Fear of the Lord stands in God's presence with humility and gazes on the Kingdom of God, surrounded by the clarity of a good and just intention, exercising her zeal and stability among humans. And thus you can discern no human form in her on account of those eyes. For by the acute sight of her contemplation she counters all forgetfulness of God's justice, which people often feel in their mental tedium, so no inquiry by weak mortals eludes her vigilance.

3 Concerning those who are poor in spirit

And so before this image appears another image, that of a child, wearing a tunic of subdued color but white shoes. For when the Fear of the Lord leads, they who are poor in spirit follow; for the Fear of the Lord holds fast in humble devotion to the blessedness of poverty of spirit, which does not seek boasting or elation of heart, but loves simplicity and sobriety of mind, attributing its just works not to itself but to God in pale subjection, wearing, as it were, a tunic of subdued color and faithfully following the serene footsteps of the Son of God. Upon her head descends such glory from the One enthroned upon that mountain that you cannot look at her face; because He Who rules every created being imparts the power and strength of this blessedness by the great clarity of His visitation, and weak, mortal thought cannot grasp His purpose, since He Who possesses celestial riches submitted himself humbly to poverty.

4 They who fear God and love poverty of spirit are the guardians of virtues

But from the One Who is enthroned upon that mountain many living sparks go forth, which fly about those images with great sweetness. This means that many exceedingly strong virtues come forth from Almighty God, darting fire in divine glory; these ardently embrace and captivate those who truly fear God and who faithfully love poverty of spirit, surrounding them with their help and protection.

5 The aims of human acts cannot be hidden from God's knowledge

Wherefore in this mountain you see many little windows, in which appear human heads, some of subdued color and some white. For in the most high and profound and perspicuous knowledge of God the aims of human acts cannot be concealed or hidden. Most often they display both lukewarmness and purity, since people now slumber in guilt, weary in their hearts and in their deeds, and now awaken and keep watch in honor. Solomon bears witness to this for Me, saying:

6 Solomon on this subject

"The slothful hand has brought about poverty, but the hand of the industrious man prepares riches" [Proverbs 10:4]; which means, a person makes himself weak and poor when he will not work justice, or avoid wickedness, or pay a debt, remaining idle in the face of the wonders of the works of beatitude. But one who does strong works of salvation, running in the way of truth, obtains the upwelling fountain of glory, by which he prepares himself most precious riches on earth and in Heaven.

Therefore, whoever has knowledge in the Holy Spirit and wings of faith, let this one not ignore My admonition but taste it, embrace it and receive it in his soul.

MAN'S FALL

VISION TWO

Creation and the Fall

Then I saw as it were a great multitude of very bright living lamps, which received fiery brilliance and acquired an unclouded splendor. And behold! A pit of great breadth and depth appeared, with a mouth like the mouth of a well, emitting fiery smoke with great stench, from which a loathsome cloud spread out and touched a deceitful, vein-shaped form. And, in a region of brightness, it blew upon a white cloud that had come forth from a beautiful human form and contained within itself many and many stars, and so doing, cast out both the white cloud and the human form from that region. When this was done, a luminous splendor surrounded that region, and all the elements of the world, which before had existed in great calm, were turned to the greatest agitation and displayed horrible terrors. And again I heard Him Who had spoken to me before, saying:

- I No unjust impulse takes the blessed angels from the love and praise of God

No impulse of injustice makes those withdraw in terror who follow God with faithful devotion and burn with worthy love through affection for Him, from the glory of heavenly beatitude; while they who serve God merely in pretence not only fail to advance to greater things but, by just judgment, are cast out from the things they erroneously suppose they possess. This is shown by the great multitude of very bright living lamps; they are the vast army of heavenly spirits, shining in the blessed life and living in great beauty and adornment, because when they were created by God they did not grasp at proud exaltation but strongly persisted in divine love. For, receiving fiery brilliance, they acquired an unclouded splendor, because when Lucifer and his followers attempted to rebel against the supreme Creator, they, with zeal for God in his and his followers' downfall, clothed themselves in the vigilance of divine love, while the others, not wishing to know God, embraced the torpor of ignorance. In what way? At the fall of the Devil great praise burst forth from these angelic spirits who persevered in rectitude with God, because with keenest sight they knew that God continues immovable, without any change of any mutability in His power, so that no warrior can ever conquer

BOOK ONE

(Him. And thus, burning in His love and persevering in righteousness, they despised all the dust of injustice.

2 Lucifer, for pride in his beauty and power, was cast forth from Heaven

But Lucifer, who because of his pride was cast forth from celestial glory, was so great at the moment of his creation that he felt no defect either in his beauty or in his strength. Hence when he contemplated his beauty, and when he considered in himself the power of his strength, he discovered pride, which promised him that he might begin what he wished, because he could achieve what he had begun. And, seeing a place where he thought he could live, wanting to display his beauty and power there, he spoke thus within himself about God: "I wish to shine there as He does here!" And all his army assented, saying, "What you wish we also wish." And when, elated with pride, he tried to achieve what he had conceived, the jealousy of the Lord, reaching out in fiery blackness, cast him down with all his retinue, so that they were made burning instead of shining and black instead of fair. Why did this happen?

3 God would have been unjust if He had not cast them down

If God had not cast down their presumption, He would have been unjust, since He would have cherished those who wished to divide the wholeness of divinity. But He cast them down and reduced their impiety to nothing, as He removes from the sight of His glory all who try to oppose themselves to Him, as My servant Job shows when he says:

4 Words of Job on this subject

"The lamp of the wicked shall be put out and a deluge shall come upon them; and He shall distribute the sorrows of His wrath. They shall be chaff before the face of the wind, and sparks scattered by the whirlwind" [Job 21:17-18]. This means the flagrant filth of wanton wickedness that emerges from false prosperity, like a distinguishing mark on the carnal will of those who do not fear God but spurn Him in perverse rage, disdaining to know that anyone can conquer them, while in the fire of their ferocity they want to consume whatever they oppose. In the hour of God's vengeance this filth will be trodden underfoot like dirt; and by the supreme judgment these impious ones will be cast down in wrath by all who are under heaven, because they are harmful both to God and to humans. Therefore, since God does not allow them to have what they want, they are scattered everywhere among people, tormented by pain in the rage of their madness, because they burn to possess what God does not allow them to devour. And since they withdraw in this way from God, they become entirely useless, able to do nothing good for either God or humanity, cut off from the seed of life by the foreseeing eye of God's contemplation. For which reason they are given over to misery, wasting themselves in the flat taste of evil fame, since they do not receive the downpouring rain of the Holy Spirit.

5 On Hell, which in its voracity keeps souls swallowed up

But the pit of great breadth and depth that appeared to you is Hell, having within it, as you see, the breadth of vices and the depth of losses. It has a mouth indeed like the mouth of a well, emitting a fiery smoke with great stench, because in its voracity to swallow up souls, it shows them sweetness and gentleness, and with perverse deception leads them to the torments of perdition, where rises a burning fire with black smoke pouring out and a boiling, deadly stench; these dire torments were prepared for the Devil and his followers, who turned away from the Supreme Good, not wishing to know or understand it. Therefore they are outcast from all good, not because they did not know it, but because in their great pride they despised it. What does this mean?

6 In the casting down of the Devil Hell was created

In the casting down of the Devil this exterior darkness, full of all kinds of pains, was created; for these evil spirits, in contrast to the glory that had been prepared for them, were subject to the misery of many punishments, and in contrast to the brightness they had had, endured the thickest darkness. How? When the proud angel raised himself on high like a snake, he received the prison of Hell, because it could not be that anyone should prevail over God. For how could two hearts possibly exist in one breast? Likewise, there could not be two gods in Heaven. But since the Devil and his followers chose proud presumption, therefore he found the pit of Hell prepared for him. So also the people who imitate them in their actions become sharers of their pains, according to their deserts.

7 Gehenna is for the impenitent, other torments for those who can be saved

Some souls, having reached the point of damnation, are rejected from the knowledge of God, and therefore they shall have the pains of Hell without the consolation of deliverance. But some, whom God has not consigned to oblivion, experience a higher process and undergo purgation of the sins into which they have fallen, and at last feel the loosing of their bonds and are delivered into rest. How is this? Gehenna is ready for those who have impenitently forgotten God in their hearts, but other torments for those who, though they perform bad works, do not persevere in them to the end, but at last, groaning, look back to God. For this reason let the faithful flee from the Devil and love God, casting away evil works and adorning good works with the beauty of penitence; as My servant Ezekiel, inspired by Me, urges, saying:

BOOK ONE

8 Words of Ezekiel on this subject

“Be converted, and do penance for all your iniquities; and iniquity shall not be your ruin” [Ezekiel 18:30]. That is to say: O you people! who till now have wallowed in sin, remember your name of Christians, be converted to the way of salvation, and perform all your works in a gush of penitence, who previously had innumerable vices and committed many crimes. Thus as you rise from your evil habits, that iniquity by which you had been soiled will not sink you deep in the ruin of death, since you cast it off in the day of your salvation. Therefore the angels will rejoice over you, because you have abandoned the Devil and run to God, knowing Him better in your good actions than you did when you endured the mockery of the ancient seducer.

9 The Devil's fraud, which deceived Adam through the serpent

That a loathsome cloud spread out from the pit and touched a deceitful, vein-shaped form means that from the bottom of perdition the Devil's fraud came forth and invaded the serpent, who already bore within itself the crime of fraudulent intention, in order to deceive humanity. In what way? Because, when the Devil saw Man in paradise, he cried out with great aversion, saying, “Oh! who touches me in the mansion of true beatitude?” And so he knew that he had not yet perfected in any creature the malice he had within himself, but seeing Adam and Eve walk with childlike innocence in the garden of delight, with great wonder he rose up to deceive them through the serpent. Why? Because he understood that the serpent more than any other animal resembled him and was eager to accomplish by its deceitfulness what he could not do openly in his own form. So when he saw Adam and Eve turn away in soul and body from the forbidden tree, he understood that they were obeying a divine precept, and that in the first work they began he could very easily throw them down.

VISION TWO

10 Only from Eve's reply did the Devil know the tree was forbidden

For he would not have known that this tree was forbidden them unless he had proved it by guileful questioning and by their answers. Wherefore in that bright region he blew upon a white cloud, which had come forth from a beautiful human form and contained within itself many and many stars because, in that place of delight, Eve—whose soul was innocent, for she had been raised out of innocent Adam, bearing in her body the whole multitude of the human race, shining with God's preordination—was invaded by the Devil through the seduction of the serpent for her own downfall. Why was this? Because he knew that the susceptibility of the woman would be more easily conquered than the strength of the man; and he saw that Adam burned so vehemently in his holy love for Eve that if he, the Devil, conquered Eve, Adam would do whatever she said to him. Hence the Devil cast out both the cloud and the human form from that region because that ancient seducer cast out Eve and Adam by his deception from the seat of blessedness and thrust them into the darkness of destruction. How? By first misleading Eve, so that she might flatter and caress Adam and thus win his assent, since she more than any other creature could lead Adam to disobedience, having been made from his rib. Thus woman very quickly overthrows man, if he does not hate her and easily accepts her words.

11 What things are to be observed and avoided in marriage

Because a mature woman was given not to a little boy but to a mature man, namely Adam, so now a mature woman must be married to a man when he has reached the full age of fertility, just as due cultivation is given to a tree when it begins to put forth flowers. For Eve was formed from a rib by Adam's ingrafted heat and vigor, and therefore now it is by the strength and heat of a man that a woman receives the semen to bring a child into the world. For the man is the sower, but the woman is the recipient of the seed. Wherefore a wife is under the power of her husband because the strength of the man is to the susceptibility of the woman as the hardness of stone is to the softness of earth.

But the first woman's being formed from man means the joining of wife to husband. And thus it is to be understood: This union must not be vain or done in forgetfulness of God, because He Who brought forth the woman from the man instituted this union honorably and virtuously, forming flesh from flesh. Wherefore, as Adam and Eve were one flesh, so now also a man and woman become one flesh in a union of holy love for the multiplication of the human race. And therefore there should be perfect love in these two as there was in those first two. For Adam could have blamed his wife because by her advice she brought him death, but nonetheless he did not dismiss her as long as he lived in this world, because he knew she had been given to him by divine power. Therefore, because of perfect love, let a man not leave his wife except for the reason the faithful Church allows. And let them never separate, unless both with one mind want to contemplate My Son, and say with burning love for Him: "We want to renounce the world and follow Him Who suffered for our sake!" But if these two disagree as to whether they should renounce the world for one devotion, then let them by no means separate from each other, since, just as the blood cannot be separated from the flesh as long as the spirit remains in the flesh, so the husband and wife cannot be divided from each other but must walk together in one will.

But if either husband or wife breaks the law by fornication, and it is made public either by themselves or by their priests, they shall undergo the just censure of the spiritual magisterium. For the husband shall complain of the wife, or the wife of the husband, about the sin against their union before the Church and its prelates, according to the justice of God; but not so that the husband or wife can seek another marriage; either they shall stay together in righteous union, or they shall both abstain from such unions, as the discipline of church practice shows. And they shall not tear each other to pieces by viperous rending, but they shall love with pure love, since both man and woman could not exist without having been conceived in such a bond, as My friend Paul witnesses when he says:

12 Words of the apostle on this subject

"As the woman is of the man, so is the man for the woman; but all are from God" [1 Corinthians 11:12]. Which is to say: Woman was created for the sake of man, and man for the sake of woman. As she is from the man, the man is also from her, lest they dissent from each other in the unity of making their children; for they should work as one in one work, as the air and the wind intermingle in their labor. In what way? The air is moved by the wind, and the wind is mingled with the air, so that in their movement all verdant things are subject to their influence. What does this mean? The wife must cooperate with the husband and the husband with the wife in making children. Therefore the greatest crime and wickedest act is to make by fornication a division in the days of creating children, since the husband and wife cut off their own blood from its rightful place, sending it to an alien place. They will certainly incur the deceit of the Devil and the wrath of God, because they have transgressed that bond God ordained for them. Woe to them, therefore, if their sins are not forgiven! But although, as has been shown, the husband and wife work together in their children, nevertheless the husband and the wife and all other creatures come from the divine disposition and ordination, since God made them according to His will.

VISION TWO

13 Why before the Incarnation some men had several wives

Before the Incarnation of My Son, however, certain men among the ancient people had several wives at once, as they wished; they had not yet heard the open prohibition of My Son, Who when He came into the world showed that the right fruit of this union of husband and wife as long as they live is the fruit manifest in the union of Adam and Eve, a union to be exercised not by the will of Man but by the fear of God. For it is better to have this right union, by the arrangement of the prudence of the Church, than to crave fornication; but you humans ignore this, and pursue your lusts not only like humans but like beasts.

But let there be right faith and pure love of the knowledge of God between husband and wife lest their seed be polluted by the Devil's art and divine vengeance strike them because they are biting and tearing each other to pieces and sowing their seed inhumanly with the wantonness of beasts. In such a case jealousy will torture them like a viper, and without the fear of God and without human discipline a defiled excess of seed will be stored up in them, and often, by the just judgment of God, this perversity of theirs will be chastised by having those born of them deprived of limbs and of health in their lives; unless I receive their penitence and show Myself propitious to them. For if any shall call upon Me in penitence for their sins, I will accept their penitence for the love of My Son; for if anyone lifts a finger to Me in penitence, that is, reaches out to Me in penitence and groaning in his heart, saying, "I have sinned, Lord, before You!" My Son, Who is the Priest of priests, will show Me that penitence; for penitence which is offered to priests for the love of My Son obtains the purgation of the sinners. Therefore, people who worthily do penance escape from the jaws of the Devil, who, trying to swallow the hook of divine power, has grievously wounded his jaw; and now, therefore, faithful souls pass out of perdition and arrive at salvation. How?

Because the priests at the altar, invoking My name, will receive the confession of the peoples and show them the remedy of salvation. So, in order to find God propitious, let them not contaminate their seed by various vices, since those who emit their semen in fornication or adultery render their children, born of them thus, unsound. How? Can he who mixes mud or ordure with pure clay make a lasting vessel? Likewise, will he who contaminates his semen in fornication or adultery ever beget strong sons? But many work in different ways in their inmost being, and many of these become prudent toward the world and toward God. And with these the heavenly Jerusalem is filled; deserting vice and loving virtue, they imitate My Son in chastity and in great works, carrying in their bodies, as much as they are able, His martyrdom.

But when I do not wish a person to have children, I take away the virile power of the semen, that it may not coagulate in the mother's womb; so also I deny the earth the power to bear fruit when by My just judgment I will to do so. But do you wonder, O human, why I let children be born in adultery and similar crimes? My judgment is just. For, since the fall of Adam, I have not found in human seed the justice that should have been in it, for the Devil drove out this justice by the taste of the fruit. Therefore I sent My Son into the world born of a virgin, so that by His blood, in which there was no carnal pollution, He might take away from the Devil those spoils that he had carried off from humanity.

14 No human or angel but only the Son of God could deliver Man

For neither a human being, conceived in sin, nor an angel, who has no covering of flesh, could save Man, wallowing in sins and laboring under the heaviness of the flesh, from the power of the Devil; but only He Who, coming without sin, with a pure and sinless body, delivered him by His Passion. Therefore, though human beings are born in sin, I nevertheless gather them into My heavenly kingdom when they faithfully seek it. For no wickedness can take My elect from me, as Wisdom testifies, saying:

15 Words of Wisdom on this subject

"The souls of the just are in the hand of God; and the torment of death shall not touch them" [Wisdom 3:1]. Which is to say: The souls of those who embrace the path of rectitude with devout affection are aided by the celestial Helper; so that, because of the good works by which in the height of justice they strive for Heaven, the torment of perdition does not break them, for the true Light strengthens them in the fear and love of God. But after Adam and Eve were driven out of the place of delight, they knew in themselves the work of conceiving and bearing children. And falling thus from disobedience into death, when they knew they could sin, they discovered sin's sweetness. And in this way, turning My rightful institution into sinful lust, although they should have known that the commotion in their veins was not for the sweetness of sin but for the love of children, by the Devil's suggestion they changed it to lechery; and, losing the innocence of the act of begetting, they yielded it to sin. This was not accomplished without the Devil's persuasion; for that purpose he sent forth his darts, and it did not come to pass without his suggestion; as he said, "My strength is in human conception, and therefore humanity is mine!" And, seeing that if Man consented to him he would become a sharer in his punishment, he said again within himself: "All iniquities are against Most Powerful God, since He is certainly not unjust." And that deceiver put this as a great seal on his heart, that Man, who had consented to him of his own accord, could not be taken away from him.

Therefore I took secret counsel within Myself, to send My Son for the redemption of humanity, that Man might be restored to the heavenly Jerusalem. And no iniquity could withstand this counsel, for My Son, coming into the world, gathered unto himself all who, forsaking sin, chose to hear and imitate Him. I am just and righteous, not willing the iniquity that you, O human, embrace when you know you can do evil. For Lucifer and Man each tried at the beginning of their creation to rebel against Me and could not stand firm, but fell away from good and chose evil. But Lucifer laid hold of total evil and rejected all good, and did not taste the good at all, but fell into death. Adam, however, tasted the good when he accepted obedience, but he longed for evil, and in his desire accomplished it by his disobedience to God. Why this happened is not for you, O human, to investigate; mortal cannot know what there was before the creation of the world or what may happen after the last day, but God alone knows this, except insofar as He permits His elect to know it.

But that fornication, which is commonly done by people, is abominable in My sight, for I created male and female from the beginning in integrity and not in wickedness. Therefore those hypocrites who say it is lawful for them to commit fornication, with animal appetites, with whomever they wish, are unworthy of My eyes, because, despising the honor and loftiness of their rationality, they look to the beasts and make themselves like them. Woe to those who live so and persevere in this wickedness!

16 Blood relatives may not be united in marriage

I also do not wish the blood of relatives to be mingled in marriage, where the ardor of family love is not yet weakened, lest there arise shameless love in the relation of consanguinity; but let the blood of different families flow together, which feels no blood relationship burning within it, so that human custom may work there.

17 Example of milk

Milk that is cooked once or twice has not yet lost its flavor, but by the time it is coagulated and cooked the seventh or eighth time, it loses its qualities and does not have a pleasant taste except in case of necessity. And as one must not have sexual relations with a relative who is one's own spouse, so also one must abhor a sexual relationship with a relative related not to one but to one's spouse; let no human being join in such a coupling, which the Church by its Doctors, who established it in great responsibility and honor, has forbidden.

BOOK ONE

18 Blood relatives could marry in the Old, but not in the New Testament

Under the Old Testament people married their blood relatives by the precept of the Law, but that was allowed because of their hardheartedness, so that they might be at peace among themselves and charity be strengthened in them; so that these tribes would not break My Covenant by dividing and mixing with the pagans in marriage, until the time came when My Son brought the fullness of charity, changing the joining of relatives in carnal bonds into marriages with different people in bashful modesty. Thus, since the Bride of My Son [the Church] now possesses in holy baptism a bond of My fear and righteous justice, let such joinings of relatives be far from her; for the embraces of a man and woman related by blood would be wickedly enkindled into shameless fornication and ceaseless lust much more than those of unrelated people. I am explaining this by this person [Hildegard], to whom this human operation is unknown; she is receiving this explanation not from human knowledge, but from God. What next?

19 A man should be adult to marry and take only a wife of marriageable age

When a male is at the age of strength, so that his veins are full of blood, then he is fertile in his semen; then let him take in lawfully instituted marriage a woman who is also at the age of heat, that she may modestly receive his seed and bear him children in the path of rectitude.

20 On the avoidance of illicit and lustful pollution

But let not a man emit his semen in excessive lust before the years of his strength; for if he tries to sow his seed in the eagerness of lust before that seed has enough heat to coagulate properly, it is proof that he is sinning at the Devil's suggestion. And when a man is already strong in his desire, let him not exercise his strength in that work as much as he can; because if he thus pays attention to the Devil, he is doing a devilish work, making his body contemptible, which is entirely unlawful. But let the man do as human nature teaches him, and seek the right way with his wife in the strength of his heat and the vigor of his seed; and let him do this with human knowledge, out of desire for children.

But I do not want this work done during the wife's menses, when she is already suffering the flow of her blood, the opening of the hidden parts of her womb, lest the flow of her blood carry with it the mature seed after its reception, and the seed, thus carried forth, perish; at this time the woman is in pain and in prison, suffering a small portion of the pain of childbirth. I do not remit this time of pain for women, because I gave it to Eve when she conceived sin in the taste of the fruit; but therefore the woman should be cherished in this time with a great and healing tenderness. Let her contain herself in hidden knowledge; she should not, however, restrain herself from going into My temple, but faith allows her to enter in the service of humility for her salvation. But because the Bride of My Son is always whole, a man who has open wounds because the wholeness of his members has been divided by the impact of a blow shall not enter My Temple, except under the fear of great necessity, lest it be violated, as the intact members of Abel, who was a temple of God, were cruelly broken by his brother Cain.

21 A woman shall not enter the temple after birth or defloration by a man

So a woman, too, when she bears offspring, may not enter My Temple except in accordance with the law I give her, because her hidden members have been broken, that the holy sacraments of My Temple may be unviolated by any masculine or feminine pain or pollution; because the most pure Virgin bore My Son, and she was whole without any wound of sin. For the place that is consecrated in honor of my Only-Begotten should be untouched by any corruption of bruise or wound, because My Only-Begotten knew in himself the integrity of the Virgin Birth. Therefore, let a woman who breaks the wholeness of her virginity with a man also refrain from entering My Temple while injured by the bruise of her corruption, until the injury of that wound is healed, in accordance with the sure instruction of church teaching. For when His Bride was wedded to My Son on the wood of the cross, she kept herself hidden until My Son commanded His disciples to teach the truth of the Gospel throughout the whole world; but afterward she arose openly and publicly preached the glory of her Bridegroom in the regeneration of the Spirit and water. So let a virgin who is joined to a husband do the same, namely remain hidden with modest shame until the time which church opinion appoints for her; and when she has given herself over to the love of her husband in her concealment, let her come forth openly.

BOOK ONE

22 Those who have intercourse with the pregnant are murderers

I do not want that work of man and woman to take place from the time when the root of a little child has already been placed in the woman, lest the development of that little child be polluted by excessive and wasted semen, until her purification after childbirth. After that it may be done again, in rectitude and not in wantonness, for the love of children. Thus the human race may procreate by honest human custom, and not as foolish people babble when they claim it is lawful to satisfy their lust at will, saying, "How can we contain ourselves so cruelly?" O humans, if you pay attention to the Devil, he will incite you to evil and destroy you with his deadly poison; but if you raise your eyes to God, He will help you and make you chaste. Do you not desire chastity in your works rather than lust? The woman is subject to the man in that he sows his seed in her, as he works the earth to make it bear fruit. Does a man work the earth that it may bring forth thorns and thistles? Never, but that it may give worthy fruit. So also this endeavor should be for the love of children and not for the wantonness of lust.

Therefore, O humans, weep and howl to your God, Whom you so often despise in your sinning, when you sow your seed in the worst fornication and thereby become not only fornicators but murderers; for you cast aside the mirror of God and sate your lust at will. Therefore the Devil always incites you to this work, knowing that you desire your lustfulness more than the joy of children. Hear, then, you who are among the towers of the Church! In your fornication do not accuse Me, but consider yourselves; for when you despise Me and run to the Devil you do unlawful things, and therefore you do not wish to be chaste; as My servant Hosea says, speaking of the corrupted people:

23 Hosea on this subject

"They will not set their thoughts to return to their God; for the spirit of fornication is in the midst of them, and they have not known God" [Hosea 5:4]. Which is to say: Evil people who do not know God hide the countenance of their heart, and do not do the various things that would bring it back to true brightness; that is, they do not see with clear eyes the things that are of God, but nurture evil in themselves; for, by the Devil's persuasion, the breath of wanton impurity weakens the virile strength they should have, and they cannot put good faith in God because the Devil turns them away from the life of felicity.

VISION TWO

24 Commendation of chastity

But now I will turn to My most loving sheep who are securely placed in My heart, the seed of chastity. Virginité was made by Me, for My Son was born of a virgin. And therefore virginité is the most beautiful fruit of all the fruits of the valleys, and the greatest of all the persons in the palace of the unfailing King; for it was not subject to the precept of the law, since it brought My Only-Begotten into the world. Therefore, listen, all those who wish to follow My Son, in the innocence of free chastity or in the solitude of mourning widowhood: Virginité unspotted from the beginning is nobler than widowhood oppressed under the yoke of a husband, even though widowhood, after the grief of the loss of a husband, would imitate virginité.

For My Son bore many pains in His body and underwent the death of the cross; therefore you also, in His love, will suffer much anguish when you conquer in yourselves what was sown in the lust of sin by the taste of the fruit. But though you will endure in your seed flowing rivulets from the conflagration of lust, since you cannot be so chaste as to prevent human weakness from appearing in you secretly, you should in that labor imitate the Passion of My Son and resist yourselves; that is, extinguish within yourselves the burning flame of lust and other things of this world, casting out anger, pride, wantonness and other vices of that sort and attaining this victory by a great struggle. These battles are to Me full of great beauty and much fruit, brighter than the sun and sweeter than the love of spices; for when you trample under foot the burning lust within you, you imitate My Only-Begotten in His pains. And when you persevere in this, you will attain much glory for it in the celestial kingdom.

O sweetest flowers! My angels marvel at your struggle, for you escape from death, so as not to be polluted by the poisonous mud of the world; you have a carnal body, but you tread it under foot, and so you will be glorious in their company since you will appear unpolluted in their likeness. Therefore rejoice that you thus persevere, for I am with you when you receive Me faithfully and with joy in your hearts receive My voice; as I show in a secret vision of My beloved John, saying:

25 John on this subject

“Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any shall hear My voice and open the door, I will come in to him and will sup with him, and he with Me” [Apocalypse 3:20]. That is to say: O you who faithfully love Me, your Savior, look and see how, wishing to aid you, I wait at the tabernacle of your heart, seeing what you have in the self-knowledge of your conscience, and with the breath of your memory I knock at your spirit, that its goodwill may open and grant admission. And if then the faithful heart, which fears Me, hears My knock, I join Myself to him, embracing him and taking with him the unfailing food, since he offers Me that sweet taste, himself, in his good works; therefore he too shall have that food of life in Me, because he loves what brings life to those who desire justice.

BOOK ONE

26 After Adam was expelled, God closed Paradise in

But, as you see, after Adam and Eve were expelled from Paradise, a luminous splendor surrounded that region, since when they went forth from the place of delight because of their transgression, the Power of the Divine Majesty took away every stain of contagion from the place and fortified it with His Glory, so that from then on it would be touched by no encroachment; which also showed that the transgression which had taken place there would one day be abolished by His clemency and mercy.

27 Creation opposed Man because he rebelled against God

And so all the elements of the world, which before had existed in great calm, were turned to the greatest agitation and displayed horrible terrors, because when Man chose disobedience, rebelling against God and forsaking tranquillity for disquiet, that Creation, which had been created for the service of humanity, turned against humans in great and various ways so that Man, having lowered himself, might be held in check by it. What does this mean? That Man showed himself a rebel against God in the place of delights, and therefore that Creation, which had been subjected to him in service, now opposed itself to him.

28 On the delightfulness of Paradise

But Paradise is the place of delight, which blooms with the freshness of flowers and grass and the charms of spices, full of fine odors and dowered with the joy of blessed souls, giving invigorating moisture to the dry ground; it supplies strong force to the earth, as the soul gives strength to the body, for Paradise is not darkened by shadow or the perdition of sinners.

29 Why God made Man such that he could sin

Therefore listen and understand me, you who say in your hearts, "What are these things and why?" Oh, why are you so foolish in your hearts, you who have been made in the image and likeness of God? How can such great glory and honor, which is given to you, exist without testing, as if it were an empty case of nothing? Gold must be tested in the fire, and precious stones, to smooth them, must be polished, and all things of this kind must be diligently scrutinized. Hence, O foolish humans, how can that which was made in the image and likeness of God exist without testing? For Man must be examined more than any other creature, and therefore he must be tested through every other creature. How?

Spirit is to be tested by spirit, flesh by flesh, earth by water, fire by cold, fight by resistance, good by evil, beauty by deformity, poverty by riches, sweetness by bitterness, health by sickness, long by short, hard by soft, height by depth, light by darkness, life by death, Paradise by punishments, the Heavenly Kingdom by Gehenna, earthly things by earthly things and heavenly things by heavenly things. Hence Man is tested by every creature, in Paradise, on earth and in Hell; and then he is placed in Heaven. You see clearly only a few things among many that are hidden from your eyes. So why do you deride what is right, plain and just, and good among all good things in the sight of God? Why do you think these things unjust? God is just, but the human race is unjust in transgressing God's precepts when it claims to be wiser than God.

30 Man should not examine the highest things since he cannot the lowest ones

Now tell me, O human: What do you think you were when you were not yet in soul and body? Truly you do not know how you were created. But now, O human, you wish to investigate Heaven and earth, and to judge of their justice in God's disposition, and to know the highest things though you are not able to examine the lowest; for you do not know how you live in the body, or how you may be divested of the body. He Who created you in the first human foresaw all these things; but that same most gentle Father sent His Only-Begotten to die for the people, to deliver humanity from the power of the Devil.

31 Man now shines brighter in Heaven than before

And thus Man, having been delivered, shines in God, and God in Man; Man, having community in God, has in Heaven more radiant brightness than he had before. This would not have been so if the Son of God had not put on flesh, for if Man had remained in Paradise, the Son of God would not have suffered on the cross. But when Man was deceived by the wily serpent, God was touched by true mercy and ordained that His Only-Begotten would become incarnate in the most pure Virgin. And thus after Man's ruin many shining virtues were lifted up in Heaven, like humility, the queen of virtues, which flowered in the virgin birth, and other virtues, which lead God's elect to the heavenly places. For when a field with great labor is cultivated, it brings forth much fruit, and the same is shown in the human race, for after humanity's ruin many virtues arose to raise it up again. But you, O humans, oppressed by the heaviness of the flesh, do not see that great glory God's full justice has prepared for you, without stain or unworthiness, so that no one can throw it down. For before the structure of the world was made, God in true justice had foreseen all these things. Therefore, O human, consider this comparison:

BOOK ONE

32 Man's condition symbolized by a garden, a sheep and a pearl

The master who seeks to set out a garden without being wearied first chooses a suitable site, and then, deciding on a place for each planting, reflects on the fruit of good trees and the utility, taste, fragrance and high esteem of various spices. And so this master, if he is a great philosopher and expert contriver, lays out each of the plantings where he sees that it will be most useful; and then he thinks of enclosing it with great walls, so that none of his enemies can destroy his planting. Then he appoints his experts, who know how to water the garden and who collect its fruit and make from it many fragrant things. Therefore consider well, O human: If that master foresaw that his garden, bringing forth no fruit or any kind of use, was to be destroyed, why would so great a philosopher and contriver have made, planted, watered and fortified it so eagerly and with so much labor?

Hear, therefore, and understand! God, Who is the Sun of Justice, made His splendor rise over the filth that is Man's wickedness; and that splendor shone with great brightness, as that filth stank exceedingly. The sun gleamed forth in its brightness, and the filth putrefied in its foulness; and therefore the sun was embraced by those beholding it with much greater love than if the filth had not been there opposite it. But as foul as the filth is compared to the sun, so evil is Man's wickedness compared to God's justice. Hence justice, being beautiful, must be loved, and iniquity, being foul, must be rejected.

Into this foulness fell a sheep belonging to the master who had planted this garden. But this sheep was separated from its master by its own consent, not by his negligence; afterward the master sought it again with great zeal and justice. Therefore the choir of angels shone with great honor, for the angels saw a human in Heaven. What does this mean?

When the innocent Lamb was suspended on the cross, the elements trembled, because the most noble Son of the Virgin was slain in the body by the hands of murderers; by His death the lost sheep was brought back to the pastures of life. For the ancient persecutor saw that because of the blood of the innocent Lamb, which the Lamb had poured out in remission of the sins of humanity, he must lose that sheep, and only then first recognized who that Lamb was; previously he had not been able to understand how the Celestial Bread, without a man's semen and without any desire for sin, had become incarnate of the Virgin by the overshadowing of the Holy Spirit.

For that persecutor, when first he was created, raised himself up in the haughtiness of pride, throwing himself into death and expelling Man from the glory of Paradise; but God did not will to resist him by His power, but conquered him by humility through His Son. And because Lucifer derided God's justice, by God's just judgment he was unable to know the incarnation of God's Only-Begotten. For by this hidden decision the lost sheep was brought back to life. Therefore, O rebellious humans, why are you so hard-hearted? God did not will to forsake humanity, but sent His Son for its salvation; thus God crushed the head of pride in the ancient serpent. For when Man was snatched from death, Hell opened its gates, and Satan cried, "Alas, alas, who will help me?" And the Devil's whole band was torn with great agitation, marvelling that there was a power so great they and their prince could not resist it, since they saw the souls of the faithful being taken away from them. Thus Man was lifted up above the heavens because through the Son of God God appeared in Man and Man in God. Likewise, that master who lost the sheep but brought it so gloriously back to life had, like that sheep, a precious pearl that slipped from him and fell into the mud. But he, not allowing it to lie in the dirt, mercifully drew it forth and purified it of the filth in which it had lain, as gold is purified in the furnace, and restored it to its former honor with even greater glory. For God created Man, but the latter at the Devil's instigation fell into death, from which the Son of God saved him by His blood and brought him gloriously to the glory of Heaven. And how? By humility and charity.

33 Commendation of humility and charity above all other virtues

For humility caused the Son of God to be born of the Virgin, in whom was found humility, not eager embraces or beauty of flesh or earthly riches or gold ornaments or earthly honors. But the Son of God lay in a manger, because His Mother was a poor maiden. Humility always groans, weeps and destroys all offenses, for this is its work. So let anyone who wishes to conquer the Devil arm himself with humility, since Lucifer fervently flees it and hides in its presence like a snake in a hole; for wherever it finds him, it quickly snaps him like a fragile thread.

And charity took the Only-Begotten of God, who was in the bosom of the Father in Heaven, and placed Him in the womb of a mother on earth, for it does not spurn sinners or publicans but seeks to save all. Therefore it often brings forth a fountain of tears from the eyes of the faithful, thus softening hardness of heart. In this, humility and charity are brighter than the other virtues, since humility and charity are like a soul and body that possess stronger powers than the other powers of soul and bodily members. How? Humility is like the soul and charity like the body, and they cannot be separated from each other but work together, just as soul and body cannot be disjoined but work together as long as a person lives in the body. And as the various members of the body are subject, according to their powers, to the soul and to the body, so also the other virtues cooperate, according to their justice, with humility and charity. And therefore, O humans, for the glory of God and for your salvation, pursue humility and charity; armed with them, you shall not fear the Devil's snares but shall have everlasting life.

Therefore whoever has knowledge in the Holy Spirit and wings of faith, let this one not ignore My admonition, but taste it, embrace it and receive it in his soul.

THE UNIVERSE

VISION THREE

The Universe and Its Symbolism

*A*fter this I saw a vast instrument, round and shadowed, in the shape of an egg, small at the top, large in the middle and narrowed at the bottom; outside it, surrounding its circumference, there was bright fire with, as it were, a shadowy zone under it. And in that fire there was a globe of sparkling flame so great that the whole instrument was illuminated by it, over which three little torches were arranged in such a way that by their fire they held up the globe lest it fall. And that globe at times raised itself up, so that much fire flew to it and thereby its flames lasted longer; and sometimes sank downward and great cold came to it, so that its flames were more quickly subdued. But from the fire that surrounded the instrument issued a blast with whirlwinds, and from the zone beneath it rushed forth another blast with its own whirlwinds, which diffused themselves hither and thither throughout the instrument. In that zone, too, there was a dark fire of such great horror that I could not look at it, whose force shook the whole zone, full of thunder, tempest and exceedingly sharp stones both large and small. And while it made its thunders heard, the bright fire and the winds and the air were in commotion, so that lightning preceded those thunders; for the fire felt within itself the turbulence of the thunder.

But beneath that zone was purest ether, with no zone beneath it, and in it I saw a globe of white fire and great magnitude over which two little torches were placed, holding that globe so that it would not exceed the measure of its course. And in that ether were scattered many bright spheres, into which the white globe from time to time poured itself out and emitted its brightness, and then moved back under the globe of red fire and renewed its flames from it, and then again sent them out into those spheres. And from that ether too a blast came forth with its whirlwinds, which spread itself everywhere throughout the instrument.

And beneath that ether I saw watery air with a white zone beneath it, which diffused itself here and there and imparted moisture to the whole instrument. And when it suddenly contracted it sent forth sudden rain with great noise, and when it gently spread out it gave a pleasant and softly falling rain. But from it too came a blast with its whirlwinds, which spread itself throughout the aforementioned instrument.

And in the midst of these elements was a sandy globe of great magnitude, which these elements had so surrounded that it could not waver in any direction.

BOOK ONE

But as these elements and these blasts contended with each other, by their strength they made it move a little.

And I saw between the North and the East a great mountain, which to the North had great darkness and to the East had great light, but in such a way that the light could not reach the darkness, nor the darkness the light.

And again I heard the voice from Heaven, saying to me:

- 1 The visible and temporal is a manifestation of the invisible and eternal

God, Who made all things by His will, created them so that His Name would be known and glorified, showing in them not just the things that are visible and temporal, but also the things that are invisible and eternal. Which is demonstrated by this vision you are perceiving.

- 2 The firmament in the likeness of an egg and what it signifies

For this vast instrument, round and shadowy, in the shape of an egg, small at the top, large in the middle and narrowed at the bottom, faithfully shows Omnipotent God, incomprehensible in His majesty and inestimable in His mysteries and the hope of all the faithful; for humanity at first was rude and rough and simple in its actions, but later was enlarged through the Old and New Testaments, and finally at the end of the world is destined to be beset with many tribulations.

- 3 On the bright fire and the shadowy zone

Outside it, surrounding its circumference, there is bright fire with, as it were, a shadowy zone under it. This shows that God consumes by the fire of His vengeance all those who are outside the true faith, and those who remain within the Catholic faith He purifies by the fire of His consolation; thus He throws down the darkness of devilish perversity, as He did also when the Devil wanted to oppose himself to God though God had created him, and so fell defeated into perdition.

- 4 On the placement of the sun and the three stars

And in that fire there is a globe of sparkling flame, so great that the whole instrument is illuminated by it, which in the splendour of its brightness shows that within God the Father is His ineffable Only-Begotten, the sun of justice with the brilliance of burning charity, of such great glory that every creature is illumined by the brightness of His light; over which three little torches are arranged in such a way that by their fire they hold up the globe lest it fall; that is, [the Trinity] shows how by its arrangement the Son of God, leaving the angels in the heavenly places, descended to earth and showed humans, who exist in soul and body, heavenly things, so that, glorifying Him by serving Him, they reject all harmful error, and magnify Him as the true Son of God incarnate through the true Virgin, when the angel foretold Him and when humans, living in soul and body, with faithful joy received Him.

5 On the ascent of the sun and what it signifies

Therefore the globe sometimes raises itself up, so that much fire flies to it and therefore its flames last longer. This means that when the time came that the Only-Begotten of God was to become incarnate for the redemption and uplifting of the human race by the will of the Father, the Holy Spirit by the power of the Father brought celestial mysteries wonderfully to pass in the Blessed Virgin; so that when the Son of God too in virginal chastity showed marvellous splendor and made virginity fruitful, virginity became glorious; for the longed-for Incarnation was brought to pass in the noble Virgin.

6 On the descent of the sun and what it signifies

So, indeed, sometimes it sinks downwards and great cold comes to it, so that its flames are more quickly subdued. This shows that the Only-Begotten of God, born of a virgin and hence inclined to be merciful to human poverty, incurred many miseries and sustained great physical anguish; but after He had shown Himself to the world in a bodily shape, He passed from the world and returned to the Father, while His disciples stood by, as it is written:

7 Words from the Acts of the Apostles

“While they looked on He was lifted up, and a cloud received Him” [Acts 1:19]. Which is to say: When the children of the Church had received the Son of God in the interior knowledge of their hearts, the sanctity of His body was lifted up into the power of His Divinity, and in a mystical miracle the cloud of secret mystery received Him, hiding Him from mortal eyes, and the blasts of the winds showed themselves His servants.

8 On the first wind and its whirlwinds

But, as you see, from the fire that surrounds the instrument issues a blast with whirlwinds, which shows that from Almighty God, Who fills the whole world with His power, truth rushes forth and spreads with words of justice, which truly demonstrate to humanity the same living and true God.

BOOK ONE

9 On the second wind and its whirlwinds

But from the zone beneath it rushes forth another blast with its own whirlwinds because the rage of the Devil, knowing God and fearing Him, sends out the worst dishonor and the most evil utterances, which diffuse themselves hither and thither throughout the instrument, since in the world useful and useless rumors spread themselves abroad in many ways among the peoples.

10 On the dark fire and the thunder and the sharp stones

In this zone also there is a dark fire of such horror that you cannot look at it. This means that the ancient betrayer's most evil and most vile snares vomit forth blackest murder with such great passion that the human intellect cannot fathom its insanity; whose force shakes the whole zone, because murder includes in its horror all diabolical malignities. In the first man born hatred boiled up out of anger and led to fratricide, full of thunder, tempest and exceedingly sharp stones large and small, for murder is full of avarice, and drunkenness and extreme hardness of heart, which run riot relentlessly both in great murders and in minor vices. While it makes its thunders heard, the bright fire and the winds and the air are all in commotion, because when murder cries out in its eagerness to shed blood, it arouses the justice of Heaven and an outburst of flying rumors and an increased disposition to vengeance on the part of right judgment; so that lightning precedes those thunders, for the fire feels in itself the turbulence of the thunder, for the manifestation of divine scrutiny exceeds and suppresses evil, since the Divine Majesty, before the sound of that insanity manifests itself in public, foresees it with that watchful eye to which all things are naked.

11 The purest ether and the placement of the moon and two stars

But beneath that zone is purest ether, with no zone beneath it; for beneath the snares of the ancient betrayer shines most serene faith, with no uncertainty or infidelity hiding in it, since it is not founded by itself but dependent on Christ; and in it you see a globe of white fire and great magnitude, which is a true symbol of the unconquered Church, which, as you can see, asserts in faith innocent brightness and great honor; over which two little torches are placed, holding that globe so that it does not exceed the measure of its course, which signifies that the two Testaments given from Heaven, the Old and the

VISION THREE

New, connect it to the divine rules of the celestial mysteries, holding the Church back from rushing into a variety of different practices, for both the Old and the New Testaments show it the blessedness of the supernal heritage.

12 The placement of the other stars and what it signifies

And therefore in that ether are scattered many bright spheres, into which the white globe from time to time pours itself out and emits its brightness; for in the purity of faith many splendid works of piety are done by which the Church, though it may suffer words of disdain, passes on the beauty of its miracles. Though plunged in sorrow, it still marvels at the brightness of the works done by the perfected through others; and therefore, it moves back under the globe of red fire and renews its flames from it, and then again sends them out into those spheres; for, moving in contrition back under the protection of the Only-Begotten of God, and receiving from Him the pardon of divine consolation, it again shows the love of heavenly things in blessed works.

13 The third wind and its whirlwinds and what they signify

Therefore also from the ether a blast comes forth with its whirlwinds, which spreads itself everywhere throughout the instrument; for from the unity of faith there comes forth to help humanity a strong tradition of true and perfect statements, which swiftly penetrate to the ends of the earth.

14 The watery air and the white zone and what they signify

And beneath that ether you see watery air with a white zone beneath it, which diffuses itself here and there and imparts moisture to the whole instrument; for thus, under the faith possessed by the ancient and the modern fathers, baptism in the Church for the salvation of believers is truly shown to you, which, founded on blessed innocence and stability, propagates itself everywhere by divine inspiration and brings to the whole world the overflowing waters of salvation for believers. When this zone suddenly contracts, it sends forth sudden rain with great noise, and when it gently spreads out it gives a pleasant and softly falling rain; for sometimes baptism is presented by the apostles of truth with all their enthusiasm of preaching and depth of mind, and so manifests itself to the astonishment of humans with a rapid abundance of words and a flood of preaching; and sometimes that same baptism is presented by those preachers with sweet moderation, so that it reaches the people for whom it is meant discreetly by a gentle watering.

BOOK ONE

15 On the fourth wind and its whirlwinds

Therefore from that air too comes a blast with its whirlwinds that spreads itself throughout the aforementioned instrument; for when the flood of baptism brings salvation to believers, a true report of the words of forcible sermons goes forth and pervades the whole world with its manifest blessedness, so that the people, forsaking infidelity and seeking after the Catholic faith, openly declare it.

16 On the sandy globe of the earth and what it signifies

And in the midst of these elements is a sandy globe of great magnitude, which these elements have so surrounded that it cannot waver in any direction. This openly shows that, of all the strengths of God's creation, Man's is most profound, made in a wondrous way with great glory from the dust of the earth and so entangled with the strengths of the rest of creation that he can never be separated from them; for the elements of the world, created for Man's service, wait on him, and Man, enthroned as it were in their midst, by divine disposition presides over them, as David says, inspired by Me:

17 Words of David on this subject

"Thou hast crowned him with glory and worship, and given him dominion over all the works of Thy hands" [Psalms 8:6-7]. Which is to say: You, O God, Who have marvellously made all things, have crowned Man with the gold and purple crown of intellect and with the sublime garment of visible beauty, thus placing him like a prince above the height of Your perfect works, which You have distributed justly and rightly among Your creatures. Before all Your other creatures You have conferred on Man great and wonderful dignities.

18 On the movement of the earth and what it signifies

But, as you see, as these elements and these blasts contend with each other, by their strength they make the globe move a little; for at certain times the report of the Creator's miracles comes to all of God's creation, so that miracle is piled on miracle in a great thunder of words; and then Man, struck by the greatness of these miracles, feels the impact on his mind and body, and in these wondrous deeds considers with astonishment his own weakness and frailty.

VISION THREE

19 The great mountain between the North and the East

And you see between the North and the East a great mountain, which to the North has great darkness and to the East has great light. This shows Man's great choice between devilish impiety and divine goodness, evil deception giving the many miseries of damnation to the reprobate, and salvation giving the great happiness of redemption to the elect; but in such a way that the light cannot reach the darkness, nor the darkness the light; for the works of light do not come down among the works of darkness, and the works of darkness do not ascend to the works of light; though the Devil often tries to obscure the latter through evil people, like pagans, heretics and false prophets, and those whom they try to attract to themselves by fallacious deception. How? Because they want to know what it is not for them to know, imitating the one who panted to be like the Most High. And because they follow him, by their own will he shows them a lie as the truth. Hence they are not with Me, and I am not with them; for they do not walk in My ways, but love strange paths, seeking out the false things a foolish creature shows them about future events. And in their perverse seeking this is what they wish to have, despising Me and rejecting My saints, who love Me with a sincere heart.

20 Those who perversely examine the future by means of creatures

But these people who obstinately tempt Me by perverse art, examining creatures that were made for their service and asking them to show them things their wilfulness wishes to know—can they, by practicing this art, lengthen or shorten the time their Creator has given them to live? They cannot, by a day or by an hour. Or can they postpone what God has predetermined? In no way. O wretches! Do I not sometimes permit creatures to show you what will happen? They can show you these signs because they fear Me, God, as a servant can sometimes display the power of his master, and as the ox, the ass and other animals show the will of their masters when they faithfully do their bidding. O fools! When you consign Me to forgetfulness, neither looking to Me nor adoring Me, but looking to a creature subject to you for what it portends and shows, then you are obstinately casting Me aside, worshipping the frail creature instead of your Creator. Therefore I say to you: O human, why do you worship that creature, which cannot console you or help you and which cannot make you prosper in happiness, though it is affirmed that they can by astrologers, teachers of death and followers of pagan unbelief, who say the stars give life to you humans and determine all your actions? O wretches, Who made the stars?

BOOK ONE

But at times, with My permission, the stars by certain signs do manifest themselves to humanity, as My Son shows in His Gospel, where He says:

21 Words of the Gospel

“There shall be signs in the sun and the moon and the stars” [Luke 21:35]. Which is to say: By the light of these lights service is rendered to humanity, and in their revolutions the times of times are displayed. So in the latest times, by My permission lamentable and dangerous epochs will be foretold in them, so that the radiance of the sun and the splendor of the moon and the brightness of the stars will be dimmed, that human hearts may be stirred up to action. Thus also by My will the Incarnation of My Son was shown by a star. But no human being has a star of his own, which determines his life, as a foolish and erring people tries to assert; all stars are at the service of all people. That star only shone more brightly than all other stars because My Only-Begotten, unlike all other humans, was born without sin from a virgin birth. But that star gave My Son no aid, except in faithfully announcing His Incarnation to the people; for all stars and other creatures, fearing Me, fulfil My command, but do not have any knowledge of anything about any creature. For creatures fulfil My commands when it pleases Me, in the same way as when a minter, making a coin, strikes it with the requisite form; then that coin displays the form stamped on it, but has no power to know when the minter may decide to impress another form on it, for neither in the long nor in the short run does it understand the form it has. What does this mean?

O human, if a stone lay before you on which, if you looked carefully, you could read what was going to happen to you, then in your mistaken thoughts, saddened by your misfortune or elated by your prosperity, you would say, “Alas, [ach] I shall die!” or “O joy, [wach] I shall live!” or “Alas, what misfortune,” or “O joy, what prosperity is mine!” Now what would that stone have conferred on you? Would it have taken away or given you anything? It could not be either against you or for you.

And likewise neither stars nor fire nor birds nor any other creatures of this kind can either harm you or help you by your examining them. But if, rejecting Me, you trust in a creature made for your service, I also in My just judgment will cast you out of My sight, taking from you the felicity of My kingdom. For I do not want you to scrutinize stars or fire or birds or other creatures for signs of future events; and if you persist in scrutinizing them, your eyes are obnoxious to Me, and I will cast you out like the lost angel, who deserted the truth and threw himself into damnation.

O human! When the stars and the other creatures were made, where were you? Did you give God advice about their arrangement? But the presumption of such scrutiny arose in the first of all dissensions, when Man forgot God to such an extent that he arrogantly inspected one kind of creature after another and sought in them signs of future events. And thus, indeed, the error arose about Baal, because people who were deceived worshipped the creature of God instead of God, to which the Devil's mockery incited them, because they were mindful of the creature rather than the Creator and desired to know what they were not meant to know.

VISION THREE

22 How the Devil mocks humanity by the art of magic

Therefore, worse things than this appeared, for humans through the Devil began to be crazy for magic arts, so that now they see and hear the Devil, and he speaks to them deceitfully and shows them one sort of creature in their scrutiny as if it were another. It is not My will to say how the first seducers were taught by the Devil, so that now those who seek him see and hear him; but they are very guilty in this wickedness of theirs, for they deny Me, their God, and imitate the ancient seducer. O human! I have sought you by the blood of My Son, not in malicious iniquity but in great justice; but you forsake Me, the true God, and imitate him who is a liar. I am justice and truth; and therefore I admonish you by faith and exhort you by love and recapture you by penitence, so that, though you are bloody in the pollutions of sinners, you may yet rise from your fall into ruin. But if you despise Me, understand the comparison in this parable; which says:

23 Parable on this subject

A certain lord who had many servants under him gave each of them a full set of warlike arms, saying, "Be upright and useful, and renounce tardiness and indolence." But while they were marching with him, these servants saw beside the road a certain impostor, inventor of evil arts; and some of them, being deceived, said, "We wish to learn this man's arts!" And, casting away their arms, they ran to him. The others said to them, "What are you doing, imitating this impostor and provoking our lord to anger?" And they answered, "How does this harm our lord?" But their lord said to them, "O wicked servants! Why have you thrown away the arms I gave you? And why is it dearer to you to love this vanity than to serve me, your lord, whose servants you are? Go, then, follow this impostor as you desire, for you do not wish to serve me, and see how his folly will profit you." And he cast them out. Which is to say:

This lord is Almighty God, ruling all peoples with His power, Who has armed every person with intellect, commanding him to be active and vigilant in the exercise of virtue, and rid himself of perverseness and negligence. But as people are going along the way of truth, disposed to walk in the divine commands, they are met by many temptations; for the Devil, the seducer of the whole world and the wicked contriver of many vices, waits for them not in the way of truth but in deceptive ambushes. Therefore, certain of them, who love injustice more than right, are seduced by the Devil and are more eager to imitate the vices of the ancient seducer than to embrace the virtues of God. And that intellect, which they ought to have used for the divine commandments, they twist to the vices of earthly iniquity and submit themselves to the Devil. The Doctors, as their companions, cite to them often the sacred Scriptures, reproaching them for their deeds and loudly asking why they follow the Devil's illusions and bring down divine vengeance on themselves. But they almost always deride these admonitions, claiming that they sin in few things and do not offend God by pride at all. Therefore, when they persevere in that obduracy, they receive the divine sentence; for these servants of iniquity are asked why they suffocated their God-given intellect and why they preferred the deceptions of the ancient seducer to loving their Creator, Whom they should actively have served. Thus they too are despised for devilish illusions according to their works, since they refused to serve God, and they are forced to consider what their wicked seduction has profited them since, thus cast out, they incur damnation, because they have disregarded the divine precepts and tried to follow the Devil rather than God.

For I do not will that humans should despise Me, when they ought to know Me in faith; for if they reject Me to examine a creature subject to them, thus imitating the ancient seducer, then I permit them to achieve the desires of their hearts both as to the creature and as to the Devil; and thus they learn by experience how much the creature they have adored will profit them, and what the Devil whom they have followed will give them.

24 Humans go out of the world whenever their salvation and use is complete

And, O foolish humans, why do you scrutinize a creature about the length of your life? For none of you can either know or avoid or get through the period of his life except as I decide he will live; for, O human, when your salvation is complete in both worldly and spiritual matters, you will leave the present world and pass on to that which has no end. For when a person has such fortitude that he burns for Me more ardently than other people, and, aware of the earthly dregs of stinking sin, is active in avoiding the snares of the ancient serpent, I do not take his spirit from his body before his fruits have fully ripened with sweetest fragrance. But if I find one who is of such frailty that in pain of his body and terror of the evil lurker he is too delicate to bear My yoke, I take him away from this world before his soul, wasting away in weakness, begins to dry up. For I know all things. But I want to caution the human race with all possible justice, so that no person can excuse himself: When I strike them with a sentence of death as if they were about to die, when in fact they are to live for a long time yet, I warn and exhort people to do justice. For no one can have or make for himself any time unless I see usefulness in him and by My will allow him to live; as indeed Job testifies, when he says:

VISION THREE

25 Words of Job on this subject

“You have appointed his bounds, which cannot be passed” [Job 14:5]. Which is to say: You Who are above all and foresee all before it comes to pass have indeed established in the secret of Your majesty the bounds of human life, so that they cannot be exceeded by humans either by knowledge, by prudence or by understanding, for any reason, in infancy, youth or old age, except according to Your secret providence, which willed to make Man for the glory of Your Name.

26 Words of God on this subject

I, O human, knew you before the foundation of the world. Nevertheless, I will to consider your days in your works and judge of their usefulness, and diligently and sharply examine your deeds. But if I suddenly withdraw anyone from this life, the usefulness of his life is complete; and if his life were extended longer, it would not keep on in freshness bearing good fruits but, tainted by the faith of the flesh, would only give off smoke like the empty sound of words and not attain to Me in the inmost depth of its heart. Therefore I do not grant him a prolongation of this life, but withdraw him from this world before he falls into the apathy of this infertility. But to you, O human, I say: Why do you despise Me? Did I not send My prophets to you, and give My Son on the wood of the cross for your salvation, and choose My apostles to show you the way of truth through the Gospel? So, having all good things through Me, you cannot excuse yourself. And why then do you put Me off?

27 God will no longer tolerate auguries from creatures

But I will no longer tolerate this perverse error, your seeking signs for your actions in the stars or fire or birds or any other creatures; all those who by the Devil's persuasion first fell into this error despised God and threw down His precepts, for which they themselves are despised. But I shine above every creature in the glory of My Divinity, and My miracles are manifested to you in My saints; so I wish you not to practice this error of augury any more, but to look toward Me.

28 Concerning human foolishness and stubbornness

O fool! Who am I? None other than the Supreme Good. Therefore I grant you all good things when you diligently seek Me. And whom do you believe Me to be? I am God, above all things and in all things, but you want to treat Me as a serf who fears his lord. How? You want Me to do your will, while you despise My precepts. God is not thus. What does this mean? He does not remember a beginning nor fear an end. The heavens contemplate Me and resound with My praises and obey Me in that justice by which I established them. The sun, moon and stars appear among the clouds of heaven on their proper course, and the blasts of the wind and the rain move through the air as is appointed for them, and all do the bidding of their Creator. But you, O human, do not fulfil My precepts, but follow your own will, as if for you the law's justice were neither established nor manifested. And although you are but ashes, you are in such a state of contumacy that the justice of My law does not suffice for you, though it is plowed and cultivated in the body and blood of My Son and well trodden out by My saints of the Old and New Testaments alike.

29 Analogy of the goat, the hart and the wolf

But in your great foolishness you wish to lay hold of Me, threatening Me and saying, "If God wants me to be just and good, why does He not make me righteous?" Wishing to catch Me like this is as if a wanton goat wished to catch a hart; it would be thrown back and pierced by the hart's strong horns. So, when you try to behave wantonly and play with Me, I too will crush you in My just judgment by the precepts of the law as if by My horns. These trumpets resound in your ears, but you do not follow them; you run off after the wolf, which you think you have so mastered that it cannot hurt you. But the wolf will devour you, saying, "This sheep strayed from the road and did not want to follow its shepherd but ran after me; therefore I will have it, for it chose me and forsook its shepherd." O human, God is just; so everything He does in heaven and earth is justly ordained.

30 Analogy of the physician

I am the great Physician of all diseases and act like a doctor who sees a sick man who longs to be cured. What does this mean? If the illness is slight, he cures it easily, but if it is serious, he says to the sick person, "I require silver and gold from you. If you will give them to me, I will help you." I too, O human, do this. Lesser sins I wipe away in people's groans and tears and good resolutions, but for graver faults I say, O human, apply yourself to penitence and amendment, and I will show you My mercy, and give you eternal life. You shall not scrutinize the stars and other creatures about future events, or adore the Devil, or invoke him or ask him anything. For if you seek to know more than you ought to know, you will be deceived by the ancient seducer. The first man sought more than he should have sought, and was deceived by him and went to perdition. But the Devil did not foresee the redemption of Man, when the Son of Man slew death and broke Hell asunder. The Devil at first conquered Man through the woman; but God at last crushed the Devil through the woman who bore the Son of God, who wondrously brought the works of the Devil to naught; as My beloved John testifies, saying:

VISION THREE

31 Words of John

"For this reason the Son of God appeared, that He might destroy the works of the Devil" [1 John 3:8]. What does this mean? The great brightness, the Son of God, appeared for the health and salvation of humanity, taking on the poverty of a human body, but shining like a burning star amid shadowy clouds. He was placed on the wine-press, where wine was to be pressed out without the dregs of fermentation, because He the cornerstone fell upon the press and made such wine that it gave forth the greatest odor of sweetness. He, shining as a glorious human being amid the human race, without any admixture of polluted blood, trod with His warlike foot upon the head of the ancient serpent; He destroyed all the darts of his iniquity, full of rage and lust as they were, and made him utterly contemptible.

Therefore, whoever has knowledge in the Holy Spirit and wings of faith, let this one not ignore My admonition, but taste it, embrace it and receive it in his soul.

BODY AND SOUL

THE SOUL AND HER TABERNACLE

VISION FOUR

Soul and Body

Then I saw a most great and serene splendor, flaming, as it were, with many eyes, with four corners pointing toward the four parts of the world, which was manifest to me in the greatest mystery to show me the secret of the Supernal Creator; and in it appeared another splendor like the dawn, containing in itself a brightness of purple lightning. And behold! I saw on the earth people carrying milk in earthen vessels and making cheeses from it; and one part was thick, and from it strong cheeses were made; and one part was thin, and from it weak cheeses were curdled; and one part was mixed with corruption, and from it bitter cheeses were formed. And I saw the image of a woman who had a perfect human form in her womb. And behold! By the secret design of the Supernal Creator that form moved with vital motion, so that a fiery globe that had no human lineaments possessed the heart of that form and touched its brain and spread itself through all its members.

But then this human form, in this way vivified, came forth from the woman's womb and changed its color according to the movement the globe made in that form.

And I saw that many whirlwinds assailed one of these globes in a body and bowed it down to the ground; but, gaining back its strength and bravely raising itself up, it resisted them boldly and said with a groan:

I Lament of the soul returning by God's grace from the path of error to Zion

"A pilgrim, where am I? In the shadow of death. And in what path am I journeying? In the path of error. And what consolation do I have? That which pilgrims have. For I should have had a tabernacle adorned with five square gems more brilliant than the sun and stars, for the sun and stars that set would not have shone in it, but the glory of angels; the topaz would have been its foundation and all the gems its structure, its staircases made of crystal and its courtyards paved with gold. For I should have been a companion of the angels, for I am a living breath, which God placed in dry mud; thus I should have known and felt God. But alas! When my tabernacle saw that it could turn its eyes into all the ways, it turned its attention toward the North; ach, ach! and there I was captured and robbed of my sight and the joy of knowledge, and my garment all torn. And so, driven from my inheritance, I was led into a strange place without beauty or honor, and there subjected to the worst slavery. Those who had taken me struck me and made me eat with swine and, sending me into a desert place, gave me bitter herbs dipped in honey to eat. Then, placing me on the rack, they afflicted me with many tortures. And stripping me of my garments and dealing me many wounds, they sent me out to be hunted, and got the worst poisonous creatures, scorpions and asps and other vermin, to hunt and capture me; and these spewed out their poison all over me so that I was made helpless. Therefore they mocked me, saying, 'Where is your honor now?' Ach, and I trembled all over and with a great groan of woe said silently to myself, 'Oh, where am I? Ach, from whence did I come here? And what comforter shall I seek in this captivity? How shall I break these chains? Oh, what eye can look on my wounds? and what nose can bear their noisome stench? and what hands will anoint them with oil? Ach, who will have mercy on my affliction?'

BOOK ONE

" 'May Heaven graciously hear my cry, and earth tremble at my grief, and every living thing incline with pity toward my captivity. For the bitterest sorrow oppresses me, who am a pilgrim without comfort and without help. Oh, who will console me, since even my mother has abandoned me when I strayed from the path of salvation? Who will help me but God? But when I remember you, O mother Zion, in whom I should have dwelt, I see the bitter slavery to which I am subjected. And when I have called to memory the music of all sorts that dwells in you, I feel my wounds. And when I remember the joy and gladness of your glory, I am horrified by the poisons that pollute them. Oh, where shall I turn? and where shall I flee? My sorrows are without number; for if I continue in these evils, I shall become the companion of those whom I knew to my shame in the land of Babylon. And where are you, O mother Zion? Woe is me that I so unluckily drew back from you; if I had not known you, I would sorrow more lightly! But now I will flee from these evil comrades, for wicked Babylon has put me in a leaden dish and crushed me with heavy bludgeons so that I hardly breathe. And when I pour out my tears and groans to you, O my mother, wicked Babylon sends forth such a noise and roar of sounding waters that you cannot hear my voice. So with great care I will seek the narrow ways by which to escape my evil comrades and my unhappy captivity.'

"And when I had said these things, I went away by a narrow path and hid myself from sight of the North in a small cave, bitterly weeping for the loss of my mother, and also for all my sorrows and all my wounds. And so many tears did I shed, weeping and weeping, that my tears soaked all the pain and all the bruises of my wounds.

VISION FOUR

“And behold! A most sweet fragrance touched my nostrils, like a gentle breath exhaled by my mother. Oh, what groans and tears I poured forth then, when I felt the presence of that small consolation! And in my joy I uttered such cries and shed such tears that the very mountain in whose cave I had hidden myself was shaken by it. And I said, ‘O mother, O mother Zion, what will become of me? And where is your noble daughter now? Oh, how long, how long have I been deprived of your maternal sweetness, in which with many delights you gently brought me up!’ And I delighted in these tears as if I saw my mother.

“But my enemies, hearing these cries of mine, said, ‘Where is she, whom up to now we kept with us as we liked, so that she completely carried out our will? Look how she is calling upon the dwellers in Heaven. Let us therefore use all our arts and guard her with such great zeal and care that she cannot escape us, for before she was completely subject to us. If we do this, she will follow us again.’

“But I came secretly out of the cave in which I had hidden and tried to go up to such a height that my enemies would be unable to find me. They, however, set in my way a sea of such raging heat that I could not pass over it. There was, indeed, a bridge, but so small and narrow a one that I could not cross by it. And on the shore of that sea appeared a mountain range so high that I could not make my way across it. And I said, ‘Oh, wretched woman that I am, what shall I do now? For a little while just now I felt the sweetness of my mother’s presence, and I thought she was trying to call me to her; but ach! is she now leaving me again? Ach! where shall I turn? For if I return to my former captivity, my enemies will deride me more than before, because I tearfully cried out to my mother and for a little while felt her gentle sweetness, but now I am forsaken by her again.’

“But because of that sweetness which my mother had lately sent me, I was for the first time filled with such strength that I turned to the East and resumed my way along the narrow path. But the paths were so hedged in by thorns and thistles and such obstacles that I could scarcely take a step. However, with great labor and sweat I struggled through them at last, so worn out by my travail that I could scarcely breathe.

“Thus, at last, I attained with the utmost fatigue to the summit of the mountain in which I had hidden before and turned downward to the valley into which I had to descend; and behold! there in my way were asps, scorpions, serpents and other like crawling things, all hissing at me. Terrified I uttered the loudest of shrieks, crying, ‘O mother, where are you? I would suffer less if I had not lately felt the sweetness of your presence; for I am falling again into the captivity in which I lay just now. Where now is your help?’ And then I heard my mother’s voice, saying to me:

BOOK ONE

2 On the wings of the soul

“ ‘O daughter, run! For the Most Powerful Giver whom no one can resist has given you wings to fly with. Therefore fly swiftly over all these obstacles!’ And I, comforted with great consolation, took wing and passed swiftly over all those poisonous and deadly things.

3 On the tabernacle it entered

“And I came to a tabernacle, whose interior was all of the strongest steel. And, going in, I did works of brightness where I had previously done works of darkness. And in that tabernacle I placed at the north a column of unpolished steel, on which I hung fans made of diverse feathers, which moved to and fro. And, finding manna, I ate it. At the east I built a bulwark of square stones and, lighting a fire within it, drank wine mixed with myrrh and unfermented grape juice. At the south I built a tower of square stones, in which I hung up red shields and placed trumpets of ivory in its windows. And in the middle of this tower I poured out honey and mixed it with other spices to make a precious unguent, from which a great fragrance poured forth to fill the whole tabernacle. But at the west I built nothing, for that side was turned toward the world.

“And while I was absorbed in this work, my enemies seized their quivers and attacked my tabernacle with their arrows, but I was so absorbed in the work I was doing that I did not notice their madness until the gates of the tabernacle were full of arrows. But none of the arrows could penetrate the door or the steel lining of the tabernacle, so that I also could not be injured by them. When they saw this, they sent a tremendous flood of water to wash away both me and my tabernacle, but their malice accomplished nothing. Wherefore I boldly mocked them, saying, ‘The architect who built this tabernacle was wiser and stronger than you. Collect your arrows and put them down, for from now on they cannot make your will triumph over me. See, what wounds have they given me? With great pain and labor I have waged many wars against you, and you tried to put me to death, but you could not; for I was protected by the strongest armor and brandished sharp swords against you and thus vigorously defended myself from you. Retreat, therefore, retreat, for you will have me no longer.’ ”

4 Lament of the soul while resisting the Devil's whirlwinds with God's help

But I, fragile and untaught, saw that many whirlwinds rushed upon another of these globes and tried to throw it down, but could not; for it resisted strongly and gave them no room to rage. It nonetheless spoke with lamentation, saying: "I am a poor little thing, but I have a great duty. Oh, what am I? and what is the theme of my outcry? I am the living breath in a human being, placed in a tabernacle of marrow, veins, bones and flesh, giving it vitality and supporting its every movement. But alas! Its sensibility gives rise to filth, licentiousness and wantonness of conduct and every kind of vice. Ach! Oh, how great is the groaning of my complaint! For when the works of my tabernacle prosper, the Devil's persuasion meets me and ensnares me, and uplifts me in haughty pride, so that I say, 'I want to act according to the joys of earthly fertility.' For inside my tabernacle I understand all works, but I am so impeded by its ardent desires that before I can discern my proper work I see dire wounds in me. Oh, what a cry I let out! and I say, 'O God, did You not create me? Look how vile earth oppresses me!' And I start to run away. How is this? When my tabernacle knows carnal desire, then, because I take pleasure in its carnal acts, I myself fulfill those acts. But reason, which along with knowledge lives in me, shows me that I was created by God. And by reason I remember that Adam, when he had transgressed God's command, was afraid and hid himself. So I too am afraid and hide myself from the face of God when I sense that my works in my tabernacle are contrary to God. But when I think above all of the leaden scale of sin, I condemn all those works that burn with carnal desire.

VISION FOUR

5 On the whirlwinds engendered by the Devil's persuasion

"Alas for me, a pilgrim! How can I survive among these dangers? And what happens when the Devil's persuasion invades me, saying, 'Is a thing good which you do not know and cannot see and cannot do?' and again, 'Why forsake what you do know and do understand and can do?' What shall I do then? Full of sorrow, I will answer, 'Ach miserable me! for harmful poisons were instilled into me through Adam, when he disobeyed God and was cast out into the world and joined his tabernacle to carnal things. For in the taste of the fruit he knew by disobedience, a harmful sweetness poured itself into his blood and flesh, producing the corruption of vice. And therefore I feel the sin of the flesh in me, and intoxicated by this sin, I neglect the Most Pure God. But I must not follow the taste my tabernacle has in it. For since Adam was pure and honest when God created him and he first appeared, I fear God, knowing that I too was created pure and honest. But now, through the evil habits of vice, I dwell in disquietude. Oh, in all these ways I am a pilgrim!

"Therefore the whirlwinds tell me lies in many voices, which rise up within me, saying, 'Who are you? and what are you doing? and what are these battles you are fighting? You are indeed unhappy, for you do not know whether your work is good or bad. Where will you go? and who will save you? and what are these errors that are driving you to madness? Are you doing what delights you? Are you escaping what distresses you? Oh, what will you do when you know this and are ignorant of that? For what delights you is not lawful for you, and what distresses you God's precept compels you to do. And how do you know whether these things are so? It would be better for you if you did not exist!' And after these whirlwinds have risen up thus within me, I begin to tread another path that is hard for my flesh to bear, for I begin to practice righteousness. But then I doubt as to whether or not the Holy Spirit has given this to me, and I say, 'This is useless.' And I wish to fly above the clouds. How? I wish to fly above my faculties and start things I cannot finish. But when I try to do these things, I only stir up great sadness in myself, so that I do no works, either on the heights of sanctity or on the plains of good will; but I bear within me the disquietude of doubt, desperation, sadness and oppression in all things. And when the Devil's persuasion disturbs me then, oh, how great a calamity overtakes me! For I am overcome in my unhappiness by all the evils that are or can be in blame, malediction, mortification of body and soul and shameful words against the purity, healing and loftiness that are in God. And then wickedness suggests to me that all the felicity and all the good which is in Man as well as God will be to me harmful and oppressive, offering me death rather than life. Ach! How unhappy is this struggle, which forces me from labor to labor, from sorrow to sorrow, from discord to discord, depriving me of all happiness.

6 From what cause these errors come into being

"But from whence does the evil of these errors come into being? From this: that the ancient serpent has within himself astuteness and deceptive cunning and the deadly poison of iniquity. For by his astuteness he infuses me with stubbornness in sinning and withdraws my intellect from the fear of God, so that I am not afraid to sin, and say, 'Who is God? I do not know who God is.' And by his deceptive cunning he instils obduracy into me, so that I am hardened in evil. And by the deadly poison of iniquity he takes spiritual joy away from me, so that I can rejoice neither in Man nor in God, and thus incites me to despairing doubt, so that I do not know whether or not I can be saved. Oh, what are these tabernacles that they should suffer so much danger from the deception of the Devil?

"But when, by God's gift, I remember that God created me, then in the midst of these oppressions I give this answer to the Devil's tempting: 'I will not yield to the frail clay, but furiously wage war!' How? When my tabernacle tries to do works of unrighteousness, I will tread upon marrow, blood and flesh in the wisdom of patience, the way the strong lion defends itself and the serpent fleeing a mortal blow hides itself in its hole. For I must not let myself be struck by the Devil's arrows or practice the pleasures of the flesh. How?

7 How anger, hatred and pride are restrained

"When anger tries to burn up my tabernacle, I will look to the goodness of God, Whom anger never touched; and thus I will be sweeter than the air, which in its gentleness moistens the earth, and have spiritual joy because virtues are beginning to show themselves in me. And thus I will feel God's goodness.

"And when hatred tries to darken me, I will look to the mercy and the martyrdom of the Son of God, and so restrain my flesh, and in faithful memory receive the sweet fragrance of the roses that spring from thorns. And so I will acknowledge my Redeemer.

"And when pride tries to build in me a tower of vanity without foundation on the rock, and to erect in me the loftiness that wants no one to be like itself but always to be taller than the rest—oh, who will help me then, when the ancient serpent who fell into death by wishing to be above everyone is trying to cast me down? Then I say with grief, 'Where is my King and my God? What good can I do without God? None.' But then I look to God Who gave me life, and I run to the Most Blessed Virgin who trod underfoot the pride of the ancient abyss, and thus I am made a strong stone of God's edifice; and that rapacious wolf, who choked on the divine hook, from now on cannot conquer me. And thus in God's sublimity I know the sweetest good, which is humility, and feel the sweetness of the unfailing balsam and rejoice in the delightfulness of God as if I were amid the fragrance of all perfumes. And thus I ward off the other vices by the impregnable shield of humility."

8 Lament of a soul that with fear goes forth from its tabernacle

But then I, poor creature, saw that another of the globes freed itself from the lineaments of the form it was in and untied all its bonds, and with a groan drew itself out of them, and broke away lamenting from its abode. And it said, "I will go forth from my tabernacle. But, miserable and full of grief as I am, where shall I go? I shall go through dreadful and fearsome paths to the judgment where I shall be judged! There I will show the works that I have performed in my tabernacle, and there I will be requited according to my merits. Oh, what great fear, and oh, how much anguish will be there for me!" And when it had thus freed itself, there came certain spirits, some of light and some of darkness, who had been its life's companions according to its behavior in its abode, and who waited for its release so that they could lead it away with them. And I heard a living voice saying to them, "Let her be led from place to place according to her works."

BOOK ONE

And again I heard a voice from Heaven saying to me, "The Blessed and Ineffable Trinity showed itself to the world when the Father sent into the world his Only-Begotten, conceived by the Holy Spirit and born of the Virgin, so that humans, born so diversely and bound by so many sins, should be brought back by Him to the way of truth; and thus those who, when released from their ties to the heavy body, carry good and holy works with them might gain the joys of the celestial inheritance."

9 God's knowledge is clouded by no obscurity

That you, O human, may grasp this more profoundly and show it more clearly, you see a most great and serene splendor, flaming, as it were, with many eyes, with four corners pointing toward the four parts of the world. This signifies the knowledge of God, great in its mysteries and pure in its manifestations, radiant with the most profound clarity, which extends its all-piercing gaze in fourfold firmness to the four corners of the earth. There this knowledge most clearly foresees those who will be rejected as well as those who will be gathered in; this shows the mystery of the Celestial Majesty, which, as you see, is presented to you in this image of great loftiness and profundity. In it appears another splendor like the dawn, containing in itself a brightness of purple lightning; for the knowledge of God also indicates that the Only-Begotten of the Father, taking flesh from the Virgin, hastened to shed His blood in the purity of faith for the salvation of humanity, while in the same knowledge of God the good and the evil are made known, for it is clouded by no obscurity of any kind. But you, O human, are saying, "What is Man to do, when God knows in advance everything Man is going to do?" And I, O human, say this to you:

10 In the beauty of God's justice no injustice can be found

O fool! In the wickedness of your heart you are imitating the one who first refused the way of truth and opposed it with a lie, because he wished to make himself like the Supreme Goodness. Who can obscure the Beginning and the End, Who is, was and will remain? And what are you, who are a spark among ashes? And what did you know when you were nothing? But you, with your lamentable beginning and miserable end, speak against the thing you do not know and should not know, the indescribable beauty of God's justice, in which no suspicion of injustice is found, or has been found, or will be found. O fool, for whom do you take the father of wickedness whom you imitate? What does this mean? When pride swells up within you,

VISION FOUR

✓ you want to be raised above the stars and the other creatures and the angels, who fulfil God's precepts in all things. But you shall fall, as the one fell who opposed a lie to the truth. For he loved the lie, and therefore, entangled in death, he fell into the abyss. Therefore, O human, pay attention. If you do not contemplate the charity with which God freed you, and if you pay no heed to the number of good things God constantly gives you, and if you do not consider how, when you fall into many sins and love death rather than life, He calls you back from death; nonetheless, when you finally remember the Scriptures and the doctrines the faithful fathers of antiquity set before you, telling you to avoid evil and do good, then if you say from your inmost heart, "I have sinned gravely, wherefore I must return with due penitence to my Father who created me," your Father will receive you lovingly and place you in His bosom and clasp you in sweet embraces. But now you disdain to know that blessedness, which God sets before you, and you refuse to hear or to do God's justice. If it were possible to do, would you not reprimand God's justice as unjust rather than true? For that reason, if you had not been redeemed by the blood of the Son of God, you would be lying lost in perdition. But God's judgment is true and just. Wherefore, O human, what advantage will it give you if in My judgment you destroy yourself? In the choir of the angels and in My chosen vineyard resounds the praise of those who laud Me and say, "Glory to You, Lord!"; and, because they are just, they do not contradict My judgment. But what did it profit the Devil to oppose Me? He, seeing that his brightness was great, tried to exalt himself above all, so that a countless band of proud spirits joined with him; all of whom the Divine Power cast down with him in the zeal of Its rectitude. And so also are cast down all who persevere in evil and seek to avert God's justice, laboring to pervert the Supreme Good into perverse wickedness. So God never established anything unjust, but in the equity of His goodness He ordained all that is right.

II On idols, and that they must be forsaken

But when the race of people to whom Adam and Eve had narrated how they were made by God and how they had been expelled from Paradise passed away, those people arose in the wantonness of vanity who in their unfaithfulness abandoned God, making themselves idols into which the Devil entered and mocked them. Others who followed them in perversity worshipped God's creature rather than the Creator Himself, and thought things that were not alive could determine their lives. So let all who are still foul with this infidelity forsake their stupidity and be converted in faith to Him Who broke the Devil's snares, laying aside old ignorance and embracing new life, as My servant Ezekiel exhorts, saying,

BOOK ONE

12 The prophet Ezekiel on this subject

“Cast away from you all your transgressions in which you have transgressed, and make for yourselves a new heart and a new spirit” [Ezekiel 18:31]. Which is to say: O you who want to persevere in rectitude under the Sun in Whose paths go the blessed sheep, cast out of your heart’s knowledge inquiry into those secret things that in the highest wisdom are useless. By them you sought to fly to a vain height but were plunged into a deep pit, in which dwells no honor but only that horrible desire that does not know God. And when you do this, for your salvation go in the way of truth, where you will find in your heart the newness of the sparkling heavens, and where you will have in your spirit the newness of living breath.

13 On the inequality of human seed and the diversity of people made from it

You see also on the earth people carrying milk in earthen vessels and making cheese from it; these are the people in the world, both men and women, who have in their bodies human seed, from which the various races of people are procreated. One part is thick, and from it strong cheeses are made; for that strong semen, which is usefully and well matured and tempered, produces energetic people, to whom brilliant spiritual and bodily gifts are given by their great and noble ancestors, making them flourish in prudence, discretion and usefulness in their works before God and Man, and the Devil finds no place in them. And one part is thin, and from it weak cheeses are curdled; for this semen, imperfectly matured and tempered in a weak season, produces weak people, who are for the most part foolish, languid and useless in their works in the sight of God and the world, not actively seeking God. But also one part is mixed with corruption, and from it bitter cheeses are formed; for that semen is basely emitted in weakness and confusion and mixed uselessly, and it produces misshapen people, who often have bitterness, adversity and oppression of heart and are thus unable to raise their minds to higher things. Many of them nonetheless become useful; though they suffer many tempests and troubles in their hearts and in their actions, they come out victors. For if they were left in peace and quiet, they would become languid and useless, and therefore God forces them and leads them to the path of salvation, as it is written:

14 Words of Moses on this subject

“I will kill, and I will make live; I will strike, and I will heal; and there is none who can deliver out of My hand” [Deuteronomy 32:39]. Which is to say: I Who Am, having neither beginning nor end, slay in their deeds wicked people who, steeped in vice by the Devil's filth, are deceived by the diabolic pits into sowing unhappy births. Oh, how crafty is the bite of the viper, which so poisons them that death tries to enter into them! Therefore I deprive them of prosperity in this world, where they are slain by many calamities that they cannot overcome but which by just judgment are always with them. But I, Who am thrown down by no darkness, also cause these people to live wonderfully elsewhere, when I draw the spirit that lives in them upward from the earth, so that it may not perish within them. I also afflict with wounds of weakness in their life's labor those who try in their pride of mind to rise to an absurd height, thinking that no one can cast them down; but I Who am present everywhere also sometimes raise them to true health, so that they will not be destroyed by vanity amid deceitful dangers. And in all these things there is no human or other creature who can subvert these works of Mine by any cunning or fierceness of his, for there is no one who can resist My will and justice.

15 Why stunted and deformed infants are born

And often, as you see, when male and female unite in forgetfulness of Me and in the mockery of the Devil, those who are born are found to be stunted so that their parents, who transgressed My precepts, may feel anguish at having these children and so return to Me in penitence. Often also I let these strange births take place among people for My glory and that of My saints, so that when those who are thus deformed are restored to health by the help of My elect, My name may be more ardently glorified among people. But those who bind themselves by an agreement to seek the glory of virginity ascend like the dawn to the secret places of Heaven, since for the sake of My Son's love they deprive themselves of the delights of the body.

16 An infant is vivified in the womb and confirmed by a soul on leaving it

And you see the image of a woman who has a perfect human form in her womb. This means that after a woman has conceived by human semen, an infant with all its members whole is formed in the secret chamber of her womb. And behold! By the secret design of the Supernal Creator that form moves with vital motion; for, by God's secret and hidden command and will, fitly and rightly at the divinely appointed time the infant in the maternal womb receives a spirit, and shows by the movements of its body that it lives, just as the earth opens and brings forth the flowers of its use when the dew falls on it. So that a fiery globe which has no human lineaments possesses the heart of that form; that is, the soul, burning with a fire of profound knowledge, which discerns whatever is within the circle of its understanding, and, without the form of human members, since it is not corporeal or transitory like a human body, gives strength to the heart and rules the whole body as its foundation, as the firmament of Heaven contains the lower regions and touches the higher. And it also touches the person's brain; for in its powers it knows not only earthly but also heavenly things, since it wisely knows God; and it spreads itself through all the person's members; for it gives vitality to the marrow and veins and members of the whole body, as the tree from its root gives sap and greenness to all the branches. But then this human form, in this way vivified, comes forth from the woman's womb, and changes its color according to the movement the globe makes in that form; which is to say that after the person has received the vital spirit in the maternal womb and is born and begins his actions, his merits will be according to the works his soul does with the body, for he will put on brightness from the good ones and darkness from the evil ones.

BOOK ONE

17 How the soul shows its powers according to the powers of the body

The soul now shows its powers according to the powers of the body, so that in a person's infancy it produces simplicity, in his youth strength, and in adulthood, when all the person's veins are full, it shows its strongest powers in wisdom; as the tree in its first shoots is tender and then shows that it can bear fruit, and finally, in its full utility, bears it. But then in human old age, when the marrow and veins start to incline to weakness, the soul's powers are gentler, as if from a weariness at human knowledge; as when winter approaches the sap of the tree diminishes in the branches and the leaves, and the tree in its old age begins to bend.

18 A person has three paths within himself

But a person has within himself three paths. What are they? The soul, the body and the senses; and all human life is led in these. How? The soul vivifies the body and conveys the breath of life to the senses; the body draws the soul to itself and opens the senses; and the senses touch the soul and draw the body. For the soul gives life to the body as fire gives light to darkness, with two principal powers like two arms, intellect and will; the soul has arms not so as to move itself, but so as to show itself in these powers as the sun shows itself by its brilliance. Therefore, O human, who are not just a bundle of marrow, pay attention to scriptural knowledge!

VISION FOUR

19 On the intellect

The intellect is joined to the soul like an arm to the body. For as the arm, joined to the hand with its fingers, branches out from the body, so the intellect, working with the other powers of the soul, by which it understands human actions, most certainly proceeds from the soul. For before all the other powers of the soul it understands whatever is in human works, whether good or evil, so that through it, as through a teacher, everything is understood; for it sifts things as wheat is purified of any foreign matter, inquiring whether they are useful or useless, lovable or hateful, pertinent to life or death. Thus, as food without salt is tasteless, the other powers of the soul without intellect are insipid and undiscerning. But the intellect is also to the soul as the shoulder is to the body, the very core of the other powers of the soul; as the bodily shoulder is strong, so it understands the divinity and the humanity in God, which is the joint of the arm, and it has true faith in its work, which is the joint of the hand, with which it chooses among the various works wisely as if with fingers. But it does not work in the same way as the other powers of the soul. What does this mean?

20 On the will

The will activates the work, and the mind receives it, and the reason produces it. But the intellect understands the work, knowing good and evil, just as the angels, who have intellect, love good and despise evil. And where the heart is in the body, there the intellect is in the soul, exercising its power in that part of the soul as the will does in another part. How? Because the will has great power in the soul. How? The soul stands in a corner of the house, that is, by the prop of the heart, like a man who stands in a corner of his house, so that looking through the whole house he may command all its contents, lifting his right arm to point out what is useful in the house and turning to the East. Thus the soul should do, looking along the streets of the body toward the rising sun. Thus it puts its will, like a right arm, as the support of the veins and marrow and the movement of the whole body; for the will does every work, whether it be good or bad.

21 Analogy of fire and bread

For the will is like a fire, baking each deed as if in a furnace. Bread is baked so that people may be nourished by it and be able to live. So too the will is the strength of the whole work, for it starts by kneading it and when it is firm adds the yeast and pounds it severely; and, thus preparing the work in contemplation as if it were bread, it bakes it in perfection by the full action of its ardor, and so makes a greater food for humans in the work they do than in the bread they eat. A person stops eating from time to time, but the work of his will goes on in him till his soul leaves his body. And in whatever differing circumstances the work is performed, whether in infancy, youth, adulthood or bent old age, it always progresses in the will and in the will comes to perfection.

22 How in the will's tabernacle all powers are activated and come together

But the will has in the human breast a tabernacle, the mind, upon which the intellect and that same will and a sort of force of the soul all breathe in strength. And all these are activated and come together in the same tabernacle. How? If anger arises, gall is produced and brings the anger to its height by filling the tabernacle with smoke. If wicked delight rises up, the flame of lust touches its structure, and so the wantonness that pertains to that sin is elevated and in that tabernacle united with it. But there is another, lovely kind of joy, which is kindled in that tabernacle by the Holy Spirit, and the rejoicing soul receives it faithfully and perfects good works in the desire of Heaven. And there is a kind of sadness that engenders in the tabernacle, out of those humors that surround the gall, the sloth which produces disdain, obduracy and stubbornness in people and depresses the soul, unless the grace of God comes quickly to rescue it.

But since in that tabernacle there occur contrary conditions, it is often disturbed by hatred and other deadly emotions, which kill the soul and try to lay it waste in perdition. But when the will wills, it can move the implements in the tabernacle and in its burning ardor dispose of them, whether they are good or evil. But if these implements please the will, it bakes its food there and offers it to people to enjoy. So in that tabernacle a great throng of good and evil things arises, like an army gathered in some place of assembly; when the commander of an army arrives, if the army pleases him he accepts it, but if it displeases him he orders it to disband. The will does the same. How? If good or evil arises in the breast, the will either carries it out or ignores it.

23 On the reason

But both in the intellect and in the will reason stands forth as the loud sound of the soul, which makes known every work of God or Man. For sound carries words on high, as the wind lifts the eagle so that it can fly. Thus the soul utters the sound of reason in the hearing and the understanding of humanity, that its powers may be understood and its every work brought to perfection. But the body is the tabernacle and support of all the powers of the soul, since the soul resides in the body and works with the body, and the body with it, whether for good or for evil.

VISION FOUR

24 On the senses

It is the senses on which the interior powers of the soul depend, so that these powers are known through them by the fruits of each work. The senses are subject to these powers, since they guide them to the work, but the senses do not impose work on the powers, for they are their shadow and do what pleases them. The exterior human being awakens with senses in the womb of his mother before he is born, but the other powers of the soul still remain in hiding. What is this? The dawn announces the daylight; just so the human senses manifest the reason and all the powers of the soul. And as on the two commandments of God hang all the Law and the prophets, so also on the soul and its powers depend the human senses. What does this mean?

The Law is ordained for human salvation, and the prophets show forth the hidden things of God; so also human senses protect a person from harmful things and lay bare the soul's interior. For the soul emanates the senses. How? It vivifies a person's face and glorifies him with sight, hearing, taste, smell and touch, so that by this touch he becomes watchful in all things. For the senses are the sign of all the powers of the soul, as the body is the vessel of the soul. What does this mean? A person is recognized by his face, sees with his eyes, hears with his ears, opens his mouth to speak, feels with his hands, walks with his feet; and so the senses are to a person as precious stones and as a rich treasure sealed in a vase. But as the treasure within is known when the vase is seen, so also the powers of the soul are inferred by the senses.

25 That the soul is the mistress and the flesh the handmaid

[The soul is the mistress, the flesh the handmaid. How? The soul rules the body by vivifying it, and the body is ruled by this vivification, for if the soul did not vivify the body it would fall apart and decay. But when a person does an evil deed and the soul knows it, it is as bitter for the soul as poison is for the body when it knowingly takes it. But the soul rejoices in a sweet deed as the body delights in sweet food. And the soul flows through the body like sap through a tree. What does this mean? By the sap, the tree grows green and produces flowers and then fruit. And how is this fruit matured? By the air's tempering. How? The sun warms it, the rain waters it, and thus by the tempering of the air it is perfected. What does this mean? The mercy of God's grace, like the sun, will illumine the person, the breath of the Holy

BOOK ONE

Spirit, like the rain, will water him, and so discernment, like the tempering of the air, will lead him to the perfection of good fruits.

26 Analogy of a tree to the soul

The soul in the body is like sap in a tree, and the soul's powers are like the form of the tree. How? The intellect in the soul is like the greenery of the tree's branches and leaves, the will like its flowers, the mind like its bursting firstfruits, the reason like the perfected mature fruit, and the senses like its size and shape. And so a person's body is strengthened and sustained by the soul. Hence, O human, understand what you are in your soul, you who lay aside your good intellect and try to liken yourself to the brutes.

27 The soul inclined to sin leaves it when stung with remorse

But you, O human who are seeing these things, consider also that many whirlwinds assail one of these globes in a body and bow it down to the ground. This means that as long as a person lives in soul and body, his soul is disturbed by many invisible temptations, which incline it to sins of earthly desire through the pleasure of the flesh. But that globe, gaining back its strength and bravely raising itself up, resists them boldly; because when the faithful and careful person sins, by God's gift he is often stung with remorse and forsakes his sin; placing his hope in God, he rejects the Devil's lies and faithfully seeks his Creator, as the faithful soul truly showed when it lamented its miseries as above.

28 The soul tempted by the Devil evades his darts by celestial inspiration

And you see that many whirlwinds rush upon another of these globes and try to throw it down, but cannot. This means that the Devil assails this soul with many snares, trying to draw it into many sins and crimes, but cannot by his illusions prevail over it; for it resists strongly and gives them no room to rage; that is, fortifying itself with celestial inspiration, it drives away the darts of lying deception and hastens back to its Savior, as it declared in the words of its complaint quoted above.

29 The soul that forsakes its body awaits its sentence with great fear

And, as you see, another of the globes frees itself from the lineaments of the form it is in and unties all its bonds. This means that the soul, forsaking the members of its bodily dwelling, breaks its relationship with them when the time comes for the body's dissolution. And with a groan it draws itself out of them and breaks away lamenting from its abode; for, taking itself out of the body with anguish, it tremblingly allows its habitation to fall, dreading the imminent tribunal of the Celestial Judge, at which it will perceive by God's just judgment the merits of its works, as it too shows in its complaint already quoted. That is why, when it has thus freed itself, there come certain spirits, some of light and some of darkness, who have been its life's companions according to its behavior in its abode; because in that dissolution, when a person's soul forsakes its habitation, by God's just and true ordinance both good and evil angelic spirits are present who have observed its deeds done in the body by means of the body. They wait for its release so that they can lead it away with them; for they await the sentence of the Just Judge on that soul when it is separated from the body, so when it leaves the body they lead it where the Celestial Judge will judge it on the merits of its deeds, as has been faithfully demonstrated, O human, to you.

30 Words of God to humanity, that they should obey the divine precepts

Therefore, O My dearest children, open your eyes and ears and obey My precepts! Why do you despise your Father, Who has delivered you from death? The choirs of angels sing, "You are just, O Lord!" [Psalm 118:137], because God's justice has no flaw in it; for God delivered Man not by power but by mercy, when He sent His Son into the world to redeem him. No smear of dung soils the sun; and likewise no wickedness of injustice can touch God. But you, O human, with reflective knowledge consider good and evil. What are you when you soil yourself with many desires of the flesh? and what are you when the brightest gems of the virtues shine in you? The first angel despised good and desired evil; therefore he received it, dying into eternal perdition and being entombed in death for rejecting the good. But the good angels condemned evil and loved good, seeing the fall of the Devil, who wanted to overthrow the truth and set up a lie. Thus they burned with love of God and firmly based themselves on all that is good, so that they wanted nothing but what pleased God, never ceasing to praise Him. The first man also knew God and loved Him in simplicity and, receiving His precepts, set himself to obey; but then he inclined toward evil and committed disobedience. For when the Devil suggested evil to him, he forsook good and perpetrated evil, and hence he was cast out of Paradise. Therefore, evil must be thrown down into the perdition of death, and good embraced in love of life.

But you, O human, when you consider good and evil, are standing, as it were, where two roads branch off. If you despise the darkness of evil and want to see Him Whose creature you are, and Whom you acknowledged in holy baptism where the old sin of Adam was nullified in you; and if you say, "I want to fly from the Devil and his works and follow the true God and His precepts"; then think how you have been taught to turn away from evil and do good, and how the Heavenly Father did not spare His Only-Begotten but sent Him for your deliverance; and pray to God to help you. And He, hearing you, will say, "These eyes are pleasing to me!" And if you then cast off weariness and run courageously in God's commands, He will always hear the cry of your prayers. Therefore you should subdue your flesh and subjugate it to the rule of the soul. But you say, "I have in my flesh so many great burdens that I cannot conquer myself; but since God is good, He will make me good. How can I subdue my flesh, being human? God is good; He will perfect all good things in me. For when it pleases Him, He can make me good."

But I say to you: If God is good, why do you put such little value on knowing His goodness, which gave His Son over to deliver you by many sorrows and labors from death? When you say that you cannot do good works, you speak in unjust wickedness. For you have eyes to see with, ears to hear with, a heart to think with, hands to work with and feet to walk with, so that with your body you can stand up and lie down, sleep and wake, eat and fast. Thus God created you. Therefore, resist the desires of your flesh, and God will help you. For when you set yourself against the Devil like a strong warrior against his enemy, God delights in your struggle, wanting you to invoke Him in every hour, in all your troubles, constantly. But when you do not try to subdue your flesh, you make it feast with vice and sin, for you free it from the bridle of the fear of the Lord, with which you should be curbing it lest it go to perdition.

At such a time you are looking to the Devil, as he himself looked to wickedness when he fell into death. And, rejoicing in your perdition, he says, "Here is a person who is like us!" And then he falls on you and instils into you at his will his death-shadowed ways. But God knows what good you are capable of. For the Law is laid down for you according to what you can perform. God wishes from the beginning to the end of the world to take pleasure in His elect, that they may be faithfully crowned, adorned with the brightness of virtue. How shall this be? Let Man resist the pleasure of the flesh, lest he be caught up in the delights of the world; and let him not live securely, as if he could remain in the house he inhabits; for he is a pilgrim, whose Father awaits him if he chooses to return to Him in the place where he knows He is. Therefore, O human, if you turn your eyes to the two roads, good and evil, then you will learn, for you will understand both great things and small. How? Through faith you know the One God, in His divinity and humanity; and in evil you see the Devil's works. And when you know the just and the unjust roads, I will question you: "Which road do you wish to travel on?" If you wish to travel in good paths, and if you faithfully hear My words, pray to God assiduously and sincerely to help you and not abandon you, since your flesh is fragile; and bow your head in humility, and shake off and quickly cast away from you such of your works as are evil.

God requires this of you. For what if someone were to offer you gold and lead, and say "Stretch out your hand for whichever you want"? You would eagerly seize the gold and leave the lead, for you love gold better than lead. So too you should prefer the country of Heaven to the downward slope of sin. But if you have fallen into sin, quickly rise by confession and pure penitence, before death lays claim to you. For your Father wants you to cry out, weep and ask for help so as not to remain in the squalor of sin. For if you have been wounded, you seek a physician lest you die. Does not God often send people troubles, so that they will more intently invoke Him? But you, O human, say "I cannot do good works!" I say you can. And you say "How?" And I say, "By thought and action." And you answer, "I lack decision." And I answer, "Learn to fight against yourself!" And you say, "I cannot fight against myself unless God helps me." Hear then how you can fight against yourself. When evil rises up in you and you do not know how to get rid of it, then, touched by My grace, which reaches you in the paths of your inner vision, at once cry out, pray, confess and weep so that God will help you, and remove evil from you, and grant you strength in good. For this good is yours by the knowledge that lets you understand God by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. If you were someone's workman, oh, how often you would have to do what your body found difficult! Would you not bear many trials for the sake of your earthly wages? Then why do you not serve God, Who gave you both soul and body, for the sake of heavenly wages? For if you wanted to possess a temporal object, oh, how you would labor that you might have it quickly!

But now it wearies you to seek what has no end. As the ox is roused by the goad, so you should exert yourself in body for fear of the Lord; if you do, God will not cast you out. If some tyrant were to capture you, you would at once turn to anyone who could help you, and beg him, pray him and promise him your property if he would come to your aid. Do this also, O human, when iniquity captures you; turn to God, beg, pray and promise Him your reformation, and He will help you. But you, O human, are blind when you need to see, deaf when you need to hear and senseless when you need to defend yourself, since the intellect and the five bodily senses God gave you are no more to you than filth and emptiness. Do you not have intellect and knowledge? The Kingdom of God can be bought, but not acquired in jest. Hear therefore, O humanity, and do not despise entry into the heavenly Jerusalem, or touch death, or deny God and acknowledge the Devil, or increase in sins and diminish in good deeds. You do not wish to hear God, when you refuse to walk in His precepts, and you run to the Devil, when you seek to gratify the pleasure of your flesh. Recover therefore and be strengthened, for it is necessary for you.

BOOK ONE

So let the faithful person recognize his pain and seek a physician before he falls dead. If he considers his pain and seeks a physician, the latter when found will show him the bitter medicine that can save him; that is, the bitter words by which he must be tested to see whether his penitence comes from the root of his heart or only from his unstable breath. And when he has tested this, he will give him the wine of penitence, with which to wash away the pus from his wounds, and the oil of mercy, with which to anoint the wounds to heal them. Then he will enjoin him to be careful of his health, saying, "See that you keep taking this medicine carefully and regularly, and do not tire of it, for your wounds are serious." There are many who accept penance for their sins only with difficulty; but, though with much effort, they nonetheless carry it out for fear of death. But I give them My hand, and change their bitterness into sweetness, so that they may fulfil tranquilly that penance they began with such difficulty. But he who neglects repentance for his sins, saying it is hard for him to chastise his body, will be wretched, for he does not want to look at himself, or seek a physician, or have his wounds healed, but hides the dreadful wound in himself and covers over death with false appearances to conceal it. Thus he is averse to tasting penance, unwilling to look to the oil of mercy or seek the consolation of redemption; and so he will go into death, since he has loved death and not sought the Kingdom of God.

Therefore, O ye faithful, run in God's precepts lest the damnation of death seize upon you. Imitate the new Adam and cast off the old. For to him who runs, the Kingdom of God is open, but to him who lies on the ground it is closed. But miserable are they who worship the Devil, not knowing God. How? Because they do not adore one God in Trinity and do not seek to know the Trinity in Unity. So let the one who wishes to be saved be unwavering in the true Catholic faith. What is this?

31 On the Catholic faith

He who denies the Son does not worship the Father, and he who does not know the Father does not love the Son, and he who rejects the Holy Spirit has neither the Father nor the Son, and he who does not adore the Father and the Son does not receive the Holy Spirit. Therefore the Unity must be understood in the Trinity, and the Trinity in the Unity. O human, can you be alive without a heart and without blood? Even so it must not be believed that the Father is without the Son or the Holy Spirit, or the Son without the Father and the Holy Spirit, or the Holy Spirit without Them. For the redemption of humanity the Father sent the Son into the world and then took Him back to Himself, the way a person sends out the thoughts of his heart and then recalls them to himself. Wherefore Isaiah speaks of the salvific mission of God's Only-Begotten by the will of the Celestial Majesty, saying:

VISION FOUR

32 Words of Isaiah

"The Lord sent a word unto Jacob, and it has lighted upon Israel" [Isaiah 9:8]. Which is to say: The Lord, that is the Supernal Father, sent the Word by Whom all things were made, that is God's Only-Begotten, Who was in divinity in the Father's heart forever without any beginning, into Jacob through the mouths of the prophets; and they faithfully foretold that the same Son of God would come into the world for human salvation, so that people forewarned and strengthened by them could overthrow the Devil and wisely reject his crafty deceptions. And the same Word lighted upon Israel when the Only-Begotten of God came into the high fecundity of the Virgin, into which no man had penetrated but which had inviolably kept its flower, so that He, born of the Virgin, might lead back those who were erroneously blind to the light of truth into the true way.

Therefore whoever has knowledge in the Holy Spirit and wings of faith, let this one not ignore My admonition, but taste it, embrace it and receive it in his soul.

EVADING THE DEVIL'S DARTS

THE SYNAGOGUE

VISION FIVE

The Synagogue

After this, I saw the image of a woman, pale from her head to her navel and black from her navel to her feet; her feet were red, and around her feet was a cloud of purest whiteness. She had no eyes, and had put her hands in her armpits; she stood next to the altar that is before the eyes of God, but she did not touch it. And in her heart stood Abraham, and in her breast Moses, and in her womb the rest of the prophets, each displaying his symbols and admiring the beauty of the Church. She was of great size, like the tower of a city, and had on her head a circlet like the dawn. And again I heard the voice from Heaven saying to me: "On the people of the Old Testament God placed the austerity of the Law in enjoining circumcision on Abraham; which He then turned into sweet Grace when He gave His Son to those who believed in the truth of the Gospel, and anointed with the oil of mercy those who had been wounded by the yoke of the Law."

1 The Synagogue is the mother of the Incarnation of the Son of God

Therefore you see the image of a woman, pale from her head to her navel; she is the Synagogue, which is the mother of the Incarnation of the Son of God. From the time her children began to be born until their full strength she foresaw in the shadows the secrets of God, but did not fully reveal them. For she was not the glowing dawn who speaks openly, but gazed on the latter from afar with great admiration and alluded to her thus in the Song of Songs:

2 Words of Solomon

"Who is this who comes up from the desert, flowing with delights and leaning upon her beloved?" [Song of Solomon 3:6, 8:5]. Which is to say: "Who is this new Bride, who with many good works comes up through the deserts of the pagans, who reject God's lawful precepts and adore idols, and ascends to heavenly desires, abounding in the delights of the gifts of the Holy Spirit, panting with great zeal and leaning on her spouse, the Son of God?" For it is she who blooms with the resplendent virtues given her by the Son of

BOOK ONE

God and flows with brooks of Scripture. And the same Synagogue, lost in admiration of the children of this new Bride, speaks thus by My servant the prophet Isaiah:

3 Words of Isaiah the prophet

“Who are these who fly like clouds, and like doves to their windows?” [Isaiah 60:8] That is to say: Who are these who, withdrawing themselves in mind from earthly and fleshly desires, fly full of desire and devotion to heavenly things, and with the simplicity of doves and without the bitterness of gall fortify their senses and with the great ardor of virtue seek the protection of that firm rock that is the Only-Begotten of God? For these are they who in supernal love tread underfoot earthly kingdoms and seek heavenly ones. The Synagogue therefore was marvelling at the Church, for she knew herself not to be adorned with those virtues she foresaw in her; for the Church is surrounded by angelic guardians to keep the Devil from harming her and casting her down, while the Synagogue, deserted by God, lies in vice.

4 On the varying color of the Synagogue

That is why you see her black from her navel to her feet, for from the time of her fullest strength to the end of her time she was soiled by deviation from the Law and by transgression of the heritage of her fathers, for she disregarded the divine precepts in many ways and followed the pleasures of the flesh. Her feet are red, and around her feet is a cloud of purest whiteness; for at the end of her time she killed the Prophet of Prophets and therefore slipped and fell down herself, while at the same time a most clear and acute faith arose in the minds of believers; for as the Synagogue ended, the Church arose, when after the death of the Son of God the apostolic doctrine spread throughout the world.

5 Her blindness, and why the prophets stand within her

That image has no eyes, and has put her hands in her armpits; for the Synagogue did not look on the true light, since she held the Only-Begotten of God in despite, and she conceals the works of justice under the apathy of her laziness, remaining in her torpor and negligently hiding them as if they did not exist. She stands next to the altar that is before the eyes of God, but she does not touch it; for she did in fact know superficially the Law of God, which she received by divine precept and divine visitation, but she did not plumb its depths, for she shrank from it rather than loved it, neglecting the sacrifice and the incense of devout prayers to God.

VISION FIVE

And in her heart stands Abraham; for he was the beginning of circumcision in the Synagogue; and in her breast Moses; for he brought the divine Law into human hearts; and in her womb the rest of the prophets; that is, they stand in that tradition that was given them by God as observers of the divine precepts; each displaying his symbols and admiring the beauty of the Church; for they displayed the miracles of their prophecies by marvelous symbols and with great wonder waited for the noble beauty of the new Bride.

6 That she is as great as a tower and has a circlet like the dawn

The Synagogue is of great size like the tower of a city, because she received the greatness of the divine laws and so foreshadowed the bulwarks and defenses of the noble and chosen City. And she has on her head a circlet like the dawn, because she prefigured in her rising the miracle of God's Only-Begotten and foreshadowed the bright virtues and mysteries that followed. For she was crowned, as it were, early in the morning, when she received the divine precepts, following Adam, who at first accepted God's commands, but afterward by his transgressions fell into death. So also did the Jews, who originally submitted to the divine Law, but then in their unbelief rejected the Son of God. But as humanity in the last days will be snatched from the perdition of death by the death of God's Only-Begotten, so too the Synagogue, stirred up by divine clemency, will before the last day abandon her unbelief and truly attain to the knowledge of God. How is this? Does not the dawn rise before the sun? But the dawn recedes, and the sun's brightness remains. How is this? The Old Testament receded, and the truth of the Gospel remains; for what the early people observed in the flesh in legal rites, the new people of the New Testament practice in the spirit, and what the former showed in the flesh, the latter perfect in the spirit. For circumcision has not passed away, because it has been transformed into baptism; as the older race was marked in one member, the newer race is marked in all its members. Hence the old precepts have not passed away but are transformed into better ones; and in the last times the Synagogue will also transform itself faithfully into the Church. For, O Synagogue, when you were wandering in many iniquities, polluting yourself with Baal and the others, shamefully breaking the custom of the Law and lying naked in your sins, I did what My servant Ezekiel tells of, when he says:

7 Words of Ezekiel

"I spread my garment over you and covered your shame; and I swore to you, and I entered into a covenant with you" [Ezekiel 16:8]. Which is to say: I, the Son of the Most High, in the will of My Father have spread My

BOOK ONE

Incarnation over you, O Synagogue, to save you, taking away your sins, which you have committed in many times of forgetfulness; I have promised you the remedy of salvation, showing you the ways of My covenant for it when I made known to you by apostolic doctrine the true faith, so that you might obey my precepts as a wife ought to submit to the power of her husband. For I have taken from you the harshness of the exterior Law and given you the sweetness of spiritual doctrine and in it shown you all My mysteries in Myself; but you have deserted Me, Who am just, and allied with the Devil.

8 Analogy of Samson, Saul and David

But, O human, understand that Samson's wife left him, and so he was deprived of his eyesight, and the Synagogue likewise forsook the Son of God, spurning Him stubbornly and rejecting His doctrine. But later, when his hair grew again, as the Church of God was strengthened the Son of God in His might overthrew the Synagogue and deprived her children, who were crushed by God's jealousy by means of pagans who did not know God. For she had undergone many errors of confusion and discord, and polluted herself by wicked transgressions. But as David at last called back the wife he had first married, but who had polluted herself with another man, so also the Son of God at the end of time will call back the Synagogue, which had first been joined to Him in His Incarnation but had rejected the grace of baptism and followed the Devil, and she will forsake the errors of unbelief and return to the light of truth. For the Devil drew the Synagogue away in her blindness, and gave her over to error and unbelief; and he will not cease to do this until the coming of the son of perdition. But the latter will fall in the exaltation of his pride as Saul fell, slain on Mount Gilboa, after driving David out of his land; as the son of iniquity will try to drive out My Son in His elect. But My Son, when the Antichrist has been cast out, will call back the Synagogue to the true faith, as David took back his first wife after the death of Saul; for at the end of time the people will see the one who deceived them conquered and run back with great haste to the way of salvation. For it was not fitting for the truth of the Gospel to precede the shadow of the Law, as it is fitting that fleshly things should precede and spiritual things should follow; the servant announces his master's coming, and the master does not go before the servant to serve him. So too the Synagogue went before as a foreshadowing sign, and the Church came after in the light of truth.

Therefore whoever has knowledge in the Holy Spirit and wings of faith, let this one not ignore My admonition, but taste it, embrace it and receive it in his soul.

THE CHOIRS OF ANGELS

VISION SIX

The Choirs of Angels

Then I saw in the secret places in the heights of Heaven two armies of heavenly spirits who shone with great brightness. Those in one of the armies had on their breasts wings, with forms like human forms in front of them, on which human features showed as if in clear water. Those in the second army also had wings on their breasts, which displayed forms like human forms, in which the image of the Son of Man shone as if in a mirror. And I could see no other form either in these or in the others. These armies were arrayed in the shape of a crown around five other armies. Those in the first of these five armies seemed as if they had human forms that shone with great splendor from the shoulders down. Those in the second shone with such great brightness that I could not look at them. Those in the third had the appearance of white marble and heads like human heads, over which torches were burning, and from the shoulders down they were surrounded by an iron-gray cloud. Those in the fourth had forms like human forms and feet like human feet, and wore helmets on their heads, and marble tunics. And those in the fifth had nothing human in their appearance, and shone red like the dawn. And I saw no other form in them.

But these armies were also arrayed like a crown around two others. Those in the first of these other armies seemed to be full of eyes and wings, and in each eye appeared a mirror and in each mirror a human form, and they raised their wings to a celestial height. And those in the second burned like fire, and had many wings, in which they showed as if in a mirror all the Church ranks arrayed in order. And I saw no other shape either in these or in the others. And all these armies were singing with marvellous voices all kinds of music about the wonders that God works in blessed souls, and by this God was magnificently glorified.

And I heard the voice from Heaven, saying to me:

I God wonderfully formed and ordered His creation

Almighty and Ineffable God, Who was before all ages and had no beginning and will not cease to be when all ages are ended, marvellously by His will created every creature and marvellously by His will set it in its place. How? He destined some creatures to stay on the earth, but others to inhabit the celestial regions. He also set in place the blessed angels, both for human salvation and for the honor of His name. How? By assigning some to help humans in their need, and others to manifest to people the judgements of His secrets.

Therefore you see in the secret places in the heights of Heaven two armies of heavenly spirits who shine with great brightness; thus, as is shown to you in the height of secret places that the bodily eye cannot penetrate but the inner sight can see, these two armies indicate that the human body and soul should serve God, since they are going to have the brightness of eternal blessedness with the citizens of Heaven.

2 On the appearance of the angels and its meaning

And those in one of the armies have on their breasts wings, with forms like human forms in front of them, on which human features show as if in clear water. These are the angels, who spread the desires in the depths of their minds like wings; not that they have wings like birds, but that in their desires they are quick to accomplish God's will, the way a person's thoughts speed swiftly; and by their forms they display in themselves the beauty of reason, by which God closely examines human deeds; for as a servant who hears his master's words carries them out according to his will, so the angels pay attention to God's will for humans and show Him human actions in themselves.

3 On the appearance of the archangels and its meaning

And so those in the second army also have wings on their breasts, which display forms like human forms, in which the image of the Son of Man shines as if in a mirror. These are the archangels, who contemplate God's will in the desires of their intellect and display in themselves the beauty of reason; they magnify the Incarnate Word of God in the purest way, because, knowing God's secret decrees, they have often prefigured the mysteries of the Incarnation of the Son of God. And you can see no other form either in these or in the others; for in both the angels and the archangels there are many secret mysteries that the human intellect, weighed down by the mortal body, cannot understand. But these armies are arrayed in the shape of a crown around five other armies. This shows that the human body and soul must, by virtue of their strength, contain the five human senses, purify them by the five wounds of My Son, and lead them to the righteousness of governance from within.

4 On the appearance of the Virtues and its meaning

And so those in the first of these five armies seem as if they have human forms that shine with great splendor from the shoulders down. These are the Virtues, which spring up in the hearts of believers and in ardent charity build in them a lofty tower, which is their works; so that in their reason they show the deeds of the elect, and in their strength bring them to a good end with a great glory of blessedness. How? The elect, whose inner understanding is clear, cast away all their wickedness of evil, being enlightened by these Virtues in the enlightenment of My will, and fight vigorously against the snares of the Devil; and these Virtues unceasingly show to Me their Creator these struggles against the Devil's throng. For people have within themselves struggles of confession and of denial. How? Because this one confesses Me, and that one denies Me. And in this struggle the question is: Is there a God or not? And the answer comes from the Holy Spirit Who dwells in the person: God is, and created you, and also redeemed you.

VISION SIX

But as long as this question and answer are in a person, the power of God will not be absent from him, for this question and answer carries with it penitence. But when this question is not in a person, neither is the answer of the Holy Spirit, for such a person drives out God's gift from himself and, without the question that leads to penitence, throws himself upon death. And the Virtues display to God the battles of these wars, for they are the seal that shows God the intention that worships or denies Him.

5 On the appearance of the Powers and its meaning

Those in the second army shine with such great brightness that you cannot look at them. These are the Powers, and this means that no weak, mortal sinner can understand the serenity and beauty of the power of God or attain a likeness to it, for God's power is unfailing.

6 On the appearance of the Principalities and its meaning

Those in the third have the appearance of white marble and heads like human heads, over which torches are burning, and from the shoulders down they are surrounded by an iron-gray cloud. These are the Principalities, and they show that those who by God's gift are rulers of people in this world must assume the true strength of justice, lest they fall into the weakness of instability. They should contemplate their Head, Who is Christ the Son of God, and direct their government according to His will for human needs, and seek the grace of the Holy Spirit in the ardor of truth, that until their end they may continue firm and unshaken in the strength of equity.

7 On the appearance of the Dominations and its meaning

Those in the fourth have forms like human forms and feet like human feet, and wear helmets on their heads, and marble tunics. These are the Domina-

BOOK ONE

tions; they show that He Who is the Lord of all has raised human reason, which had lain polluted in the dust of humanity, from earth to Heaven, when He sent to earth His Son and His Son in His righteousness trod underfoot the ancient seducer; and thus the faithful should faithfully imitate Him, Who is their Head, placing their hope in Heaven and fortifying themselves with the strong desire of good works.

8 On the appearance of the Thrones and its meaning

And those in the fifth have nothing human in their appearance and shine red like the dawn. These are the Thrones, showing that when for human salvation the Only-Begotten of God, He Who was uninfected by human sin, put on a human body, Divinity bent down to humanity; for He, being conceived by the Holy Spirit in the dawn, which is to say in the Blessed Virgin, received flesh with no spot of uncleanness whatsoever. And you see no other form in them, for there are many mysteries of the celestial secrets that human frailty cannot understand. But these armies are also arrayed like a crown around two others. This means that the faithful who direct their body's five senses to celestial things, knowing that they have been redeemed through the five wounds of the Son of God, attain with every turn and working of their mind, because they ignore the heart's pleasure and put their hope in inward things, to love of God and their neighbor.

9 On the appearance of the Cherubim and its meaning

Therefore, those in the first of these other armies seem to be full of eyes and wings, and in each eye appears a mirror and in each mirror a human form, and they raise their wings to a celestial height. These are the Cherubim, who signify knowledge of God, by which they see the mysteries of the celestial secrets and fulfil their desires according to God's will. Thus, possessing in the depth of their knowledge the purest clarity, they miraculously foresee all those who know the true God and direct their hearts' desires, like wings on which nobly and justly to arise, to Him Who is above all; and, instead of lusting after the transitory, love the eternal, as they show by the high-mindedness of their desires.

10 On the appearance of the Seraphim and its meaning

And those in the second army burn like fire, and have many wings, in which they show as if in a mirror all the Church ranks arrayed in order. These are the Seraphim, and this means that just as they burn for love of God and have the greatest desire to contemplate Him, they also by their desires display with shining purity the ranks, both secular and spiritual, which flourish in the mysteries of the Church, for the secrets of God show wondrously in them. Therefore all who, loving sincerity with a pure heart, seek eternal life, should ardently love God and embrace Him with all their will, that they may attain to the joys of those they faithfully imitate.

But you see no other shape either in these or in the others. This is to say that there are many secrets of the blessed spirits that are not to be shown to humans, for as long as they are mortal they cannot discern perfectly the things that are eternal.

11 All these armies sing of the miracles God does in blessed souls

But all these armies, as you hear, are singing with marvellous voices all kinds of music about the wonders that God works in blessed souls, by which God is magnificently glorified. For spirits blessed in the power of God make known in the heavenly places by indescribable sounds their great joy in the works of wonder that God perfects in His saints; by which the latter gloriously magnify God, seeking Him in the depth of sanctity and rejoicing in the joy of salvation; as My servant David, the observer of celestial secrets, testifies when he says:

12 The Psalmist on this subject

“The voice of rejoicing and of salvation in the tabernacles of the just” [Psalm 117:15]. Which is to say: The song of the gladness and joy of those who tread the flesh underfoot and lift up the spirit is known, with unfailing salvation, in the dwellings of those who reject injustice and do the works of justice; they might do evil at the Devil’s temptation, but by divine inspiration they do good. What does this mean? Man often has inappropriate exultation at committing an improperly desired sin; but in that state he does not have salvation, for he has gone against the divine command. He, however, who strongly does the good he ardently desires shall dance in the true exultation of the joy of salvation, for while in the body he yet loves the mansion of those who run in the way of truth and turn aside from lying error.

Therefore, whoever has knowledge in the Holy Spirit and wings of faith, let this one not ignore My admonition, but taste it, embrace it and receive it in his soul.

Book Two

THE REDEEMER AND REDEMPTION

VISION ONE

The Redeemer

And I, a person not glowing with the strength of strong lions or taught by their inspiration, but a tender and fragile rib imbued with a mystical breath, saw a blazing fire, incomprehensible, inextinguishable, wholly living and wholly Life, with a flame in it the color of the sky, which burned ardently with a gentle breath, and which was as inseparably within the blazing fire as the viscera are within a human being. And I saw that the flame sparked and blazed up. And behold! The atmosphere suddenly rose up in a dark sphere of great magnitude, and that flame hovered over it and gave it one blow after another, which struck sparks from it, until that atmosphere was perfected and so Heaven and earth stood fully formed and resplendent. Then the same flame was in that fire, and that burning extended itself to a little clod of mud which lay at the bottom of the atmosphere, and warmed it so that it was made flesh and blood, and blew upon it until it rose up a living human. When this was done, the blazing fire, by means of that flame which burned ardently with a gentle breath, offered to the human a white flower, which hung in that flame as dew hangs on the grass. Its scent came to the human's nostrils, but he did not taste it with his mouth or touch it with his hands, and thus he turned away and fell into the thickest darkness, out of which he could not pull himself. And that darkness grew and expanded more and more in the atmosphere. But then three great stars, crowding together in their brilliance, appeared in the darkness, and then many others, both small and large, shining with great splendor, and then a gigantic star, radiant with wonderful brightness, which shot its rays toward the flame. And in the earth too appeared a radiance like the dawn, into which the flame was miraculously absorbed without being separated from the blazing fire. And thus in the radiance of that dawn the Supreme Will was enkindled.

And as I was trying to ponder this enkindling of the Will more carefully, I was stopped by a secret seal on this vision, and I heard the voice from on high saying to me, "You may not see anything further regarding this mystery unless it is granted you by a miracle of faith."

And I saw a serene Man coming forth from this radiant dawn, Who poured out His brightness into the darkness; and it drove Him back with great force, so that He poured out the redness of blood and the whiteness of pallor into it, and struck the darkness such a strong blow that the person who was lying in it was touched by Him, took on a shining appearance and walked out of it upright. And so the serene Man Who had come out of that dawn shone more brightly than human tongue can tell, and made His way into the greatest height of inestimable glory, where He radiated in the plenitude of wonderful fruitfulness and fragrance. And I heard the voice saying to me from the aforementioned living fire: "O you who are wretched earth and, as a woman, untaught in all learning of earthly teachers and unable to read literature with philosophical understanding, you are nonetheless touched by My light, which kindles in you an inner fire like a burning sun; cry out and relate and write these My mysteries that you see and hear in mystical visions. So do not be timid, but say those things you understand in the Spirit as I speak them through you; so that those who should have shown My people righteousness, but who in their perversity refuse to speak openly of the justice they know, unwilling to abstain from the evil desires that cling to them like their masters and make them fly from the face of the Lord and blush to speak the truth, may be ashamed. Therefore, O diffident mind, who are taught inwardly by mystical inspiration, though because of Eve's transgression you are trodden on by the masculine sex, speak of that fiery work this sure vision has shown you."

The Living God, then, Who created all things through His Word, by the Word's Incarnation brought back the miserable human who had sunk himself in darkness to certain salvation. What does this mean?

1 On God's omnipotence

This blazing fire that you see symbolizes the Omnipotent and Living God, Who in His most glorious serenity was never darkened by any iniquity; incomprehensible, because He cannot be divided by any division or known as He is by any part of any of His creatures' knowledge; inextinguishable, because He is that Fullness that no limit ever touched; wholly living, for there is nothing that is hidden from Him or that He does not know; and wholly Life, for everything that lives takes its life from Him, as Job shows, inspired by Me, when he says:

2 Words of Job on this subject

"Who is ignorant that the hand of the Lord has made all these things? In His hand is the soul of every living thing and the spirit of all human flesh" [Job 12:9-10]. What does this mean? No creature is so dull of nature as not to know what changes in the things that make it fruitful cause it to attain its full growth. The sky holds light, light air, and air the birds; the earth nourishes plants, plants fruit and fruit animals; which all testify that they were put there by a strong hand, the supreme power of the Ruler of All, Who in His strength has provided so for them all that nothing is lacking to them for their use. And in the omnipotence of the same Maker is the motion of all living things that seek the earth for earthly things like the animals and are not inspired by God with reason, as well as the awakening of those who dwell in human flesh and have reason, discernment and wisdom. How?

The soul goes about in earthly affairs, laboring through many changes as fleshly behavior demands. But the spirit raises itself in two ways: sighing, groaning and desiring God; and choosing among options in various matters as if by some rule, for the soul has discernment in reason. Hence Man contains in himself the likeness of heaven and earth. In what way? He has a circle, which contains his clarity, breath and reason, as the sky has its lights, air and birds; and he has a receptacle containing humidity, germination and birth, as the earth contains fertility, fruition and animals. What is this? O human, you are wholly in every creature, and you forget your Creator; you are subject to Him as was ordained, and you go against His commands?

3 That the Word was and is indivisibly and eternally in the Father

You see that that fire has a flame in it the color of the sky, which burns ardently with a gentle breath, and which is as inseparably within the blazing fire as the viscera are within a human being; which is to say that before any creatures were made the Infinite Word was indivisibly in the Father; Which in course of time was to become incarnate in the ardor of charity, miraculously and without the stain or weight of sin, by the Holy Spirit's sweet freshness in the dawn of blessed virginity. But after He assumed flesh, the Word also remained inseparably in the Father; for as a person does not exist without the vital movements within his viscera, so the only Word of the Father could in no way be separated from Him.

4 Why the Son of God is called the Word

And why is He called the Word? Because, just as a word of command uttered by an instructor among local and transitory human dust is understood by people who know and foresee the reason he gave it, so also the power of the Father is known among the creatures of the world, who perceive and understand in Him the source of their creation, through the Word Who is independent of place and imperishable in His inextinguishable eternal life; and as the power and honor of a human being are known by his official words, so the holiness and goodness of the Father shines through the Supreme Word.

BOOK TWO

5 By the power of the Word of God every creature was raised up

And you see that the flame sparks and blazes up. This is to say that when every creature was raised through Him, the Word of God showed His power like a flash of flame; and when He became incarnate in the dawn and purity of virginity, it was as if He blazed up, so that from Him trickled every virtue of the knowledge of God, and Man lived again in the salvation of his soul.

6 God's incomprehensible power made the world and the different species

And the atmosphere suddenly rises up in a dark sphere of great magnitude. This is the material of Creation while still formless and imperfect, not yet full of creatures; it is a sphere, for it is under the incomprehensible power of God, which is never absent from it, and by the Supernal Will it rises up in God's great power in the twinkling of an eye. And that flame hovers over it like a workman and gives it one blow after another, which strike sparks from it, until that atmosphere is perfected and so Heaven and earth stand fully formed and resplendent. For the Supernal Word, Who excels every creature, showed that they all are subject to Him and draw their strength from His power, when He brought forth from the universe the different kinds of creatures, shining in their miraculous awakening, as a smith makes forms out of bronze; until each creature was radiant with the loveliness of perfection, beautiful in the fullness of their arrangement in higher and lower ranks, the higher made radiant by the lower and the lower by the higher.

7 After the other creatures Man was created from earthly mud

But then the same flame that is in that fire and that burning extends itself to a little clod of mud, which lies at the bottom of the atmosphere; this is to say that after the other creatures were created, the Word of God, in the strong will of the Father and supernal love, considered the poor fragile matter from which the weak frailty of the human race, both bad and good, was to be produced, now lying in heavy unconsciousness and not yet roused by the breath of life; and warms it so that it is made flesh and blood, that is, poured fresh warmth into it, for the earth is the fleshly material of humans, and nourished it with moisture, as a mother gives milk to her children; and blows upon it until it rises up a living human, for He aroused it by supernal power and miraculously raised up a human being with intelligence of body and mind.

VISION ONE

- 8 Adam accepted obedience, but by the Devil's counsel did not obey

When this is done, the blazing fire, by means of that flame which burns ardently with a gentle breath, offers to the human a white flower, which hangs in that flame as dew hangs on the grass. For, after Adam was created, the Father in His lucid serenity gave to Adam through His Word in the Holy Spirit the sweet precept of obedience, which in fresh fruitfulness hung upon the Word; for the sweet odor of sanctity trickled from the Father in the Holy Spirit through the Word and brought forth fruit in greatest abundance, as the dew falling on the grass makes it grow. Its scent comes to the human's nostrils, but he does not taste it with his mouth or touch it with his hands; for he tried to know the wisdom of the Law with his intelligence, as if with his nose, but did not perfectly digest it by putting it in his mouth, or fulfil it in full blessedness by the work of his hands. And thus he turns away and falls into the thickest darkness, out of which he cannot pull himself. For, by the Devil's counsel, he turned his back on the divine command and sank into the gaping mouth of death, so that he did not seek God either by faith or by works; and therefore, weighed down by sin, he could not rise to true knowledge of God, until He came Who obeyed His Father sinlessly and fully.

And that darkness grows and expands more and more in the atmosphere; for the power of death in the world was constantly increased by the spread of wickedness, and human knowledge entangled itself in many vices in the horror of bursting and stinking sin.

- 9 Abraham and Isaac and Jacob and the other prophets drove back the darkness

But then three great stars, crowding together in their brilliance, appear in the darkness, and then many others, both small and large, shining with great splendor. These are the three great luminaries Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, symbolizing the Heavenly Trinity, embracing one another both by their works of faith and by their relationship in the flesh, and by their signs driving back the darkness in the world; and, following them, the many other prophets both minor and major, radiant with many wonders.

- 10 The prophet John, glittering with miracles, foretold the Son of God

And then a gigantic star appears, radiant with wonderful brightness, which shoots its rays toward the flame. This is the greatest prophet, John the Baptist, who glittered with miracles in his faithful and serene deeds, and pointed out by their means the true Word, the true Son of God; for he did not yield to wickedness, but vigorously and forcefully cast it out by works of justice.

BOOK TWO

11 At the Incarnation of the Word of God the great counsel was seen

And in the earth too appears a radiance like the dawn, into which the flame is miraculously absorbed, without being separated from the blazing fire. This is to say that God set a great splendor of light in the place where He would bring forth His Word and, fully willing it, sent Him there, yet not so as to be divided from Him; but He gave that profitable fruit and brought Him forth as a great fountain, so that every faithful throat could drink and never more be dry. And thus in the radiance of that dawn the Supreme Will is enkindled; for in the bright and roseate serenity was seen the fruitfulness of the great and venerable counsel, so that all the forerunners marvelled at it with bright joy.

12 Humans must not scrutinize God's secrets beyond what He wishes to show

But you, O human, who seek in the way of humans to know more fully the loftiness of this counsel, are opposed by a concealing barrier; for you must not search into the secrets of God beyond those things the Divine Majesty wills to be revealed for love of those who trust in Him.

13 Christ by His death brought back His elect to their inheritance

And you see a serene Man coming forth from this radiant dawn, Who pours out His brightness into the darkness; and it drives Him back with great force, so that He pours out the redness of blood and the whiteness of pallor into it, and strikes the darkness such a strong blow that the person who is lying in it is touched by Him, takes on a shining appearance and walks out of it upright. This is the Word of God, imperishably incarnate in the purity of unstained virginity and born without pain, and yet not separated from the Father. How? While the Son of God was being born in the world from a mother, He was still in Heaven in the Father; and at this the angels suddenly trembled and sang the sweetest praises of rejoicing. And, living in the world without stain of sin, He sent out into the darkness of unbelief His clear and blessed teachings and salvation; but, rejected by the unbelieving people and led to His Passion, He poured out His beautiful blood and knew in His body the darkness of death. And thus conquering the Devil, he delivered from Hell his elect, who were held prostrate there, and by His redeeming touch brought them back to the inheritance they had lost in Adam. As they were returning to their inheritance timbrels and harps and all kinds of music burst forth, because Man, who had lain in perdition but now stood upright in blessedness, had been freed by heavenly power and escaped from death, as through My servant Hosea I have stated thus:

VISION ONE

14 Words of Hosea on this subject

“The iniquity of Ephraim is bound up; ~~his sin is hidden~~. The sorrows of a woman in labor shall come upon him; he is an unwise son; for now he shall not stand in the contrition of the sons. I will deliver them out of the hand of death, from death I will redeem them. I will be your death, O Death; I will be your destruction, O Hell!” [Hosea 13:12-14]. What does this mean? The Devil’s perverse iniquity is bound by heavy fetters, since he does not deserve that God’s zeal should release him; for he has never rightfully acknowledged Him as do those who faithfully fear Him. For the Devil always raises himself against God, saying, “I am God!”; and he always goes astray over the Blessed One of the Lord, opposing the name of Christians because of Him. Thus his malice is so ingrained that his sin, cruelly committed in filthy pride, can never deserve by any reparation to be covered by salvation. Therefore he will be in perpetual pain, as a woman in labor is afflicted by despair when she doubts she can survive the opening of her womb. For this misery will remain with him, that he is forsaken by beatitude because the wisdom of the sons flees from him, and he does not come to himself, as that man came to himself who returned to his father from his wickedness.

Thus he will never stand trusting in that action by which the children of salvation in the Heavenly Son crush death in its hardened iniquity, which the cunning serpent brought forth when he suggested deceit to the guileless first man. But since those children despise the poison of that unclean advice and look to their salvation, I will deliver them from slavery to idols; for idols are by their deceptiveness in the power of perdition, and for them the unfaithful forsake the honor of their Creator, entangling themselves in the Devil’s snare and doing his works at his will.

And so I will redeem the souls of those who love and worship Me, the Holy and the Just, from the pain of Hell; for no one can be released from the Devil’s fetters, which bind him with bitterest death by his transgression of God’s precepts, except by the redemption of Him Who will redeem His elect with His own blood. This is how I will slay you, O Death, with utter destruction, for I will take from you the thing you think to live by, and you will be called a useless corpse; at the height of your strength you will lie prostrate, as a corpse without the soul lies prostrate awaiting decay. For when the happy souls are mercifully raised up to celestial bliss through the new Man, Who will not be a party to poisonous deception, the fountain of living water will drown you. Thus also to your confusion I will be your destruction, O Hell!, when My strong power will take from you your ill-gotten spoils, so that you too, justly despoiled, will never again appear whole and laden with riches, but will lie prostrate and confounded forever, bearing wounds and decay.

15 The Son of God rising from the dead showed Man the way from death to life

And, as you see, the serene Man Who has come out of that dawn shines more brightly than human tongue can tell, which shows that the noble body of the Son of God, born of the sweet Virgin and three days in the tomb (to confirm that there are three Persons in one Divinity), was touched by the glory of the Father, received the Spirit and rose again to serene immortality, which no one can explain by thought or word. And the Father showed Him with His open wounds to the celestial choirs, saying, "This is My beloved Son, Whom I sent to die for the people." And so joy unmeasurable by the human mind arose in them, for criminal forgetfulness of God was brought low, and human reason, which had lain prostrate under the Devil's persuasion, was uplifted to the knowledge of God; for the way to truth was shown to Man by the Supreme Beatitude, and in it he was led from death to life.

16 The risen Christ appeared frequently to His disciples

But just as the children of Israel, after being liberated from Egypt, wandered in the desert for forty years before coming into the land flowing with milk and honey, so too the Son of God, rising from the dead, showed Himself for forty days to His disciples and the blessed women who wept and had a great desire to see Him. This He did to encourage them, lest they should waver in faith and say, "We did not see Him, so we cannot believe that He is our salvation!" He showed Himself to them frequently, to strengthen them that they might not fall.

17 When Christ ascended to the Father His Bride was given many ornaments

And He makes His way into the greatest height of inestimable glory, where he radiates in the plenitude of wonderful fruitfulness and fragrance. This is to say that the Son of God ascended to the Father, Who with the Son and the Holy Spirit is the height of lofty and excelling joy and gladness unspeakable; where that same Son gloriously appears to His faithful in the abundance of sanctity and blessedness, so that they believe with pure and simple hearts that He is true God and Man. And then indeed the new Bride of the Lamb was set up with many ornaments, for she had to be ornamented with every kind of virtue for the mighty struggle of all the faithful people, who are to fight against the crafty serpent.

VISION ONE

But let the one who sees with watchful eyes and hears with attentive ears welcome with a kiss My mystical words, which proceed from Me Who am life.

THE TRINITY IN THE UNITY

VISION TWO

The Trinity

Then I saw a bright light, and in this light the figure of a man the color of a sapphire, which was all blazing with a gentle glowing fire. And that bright light bathed the whole of the glowing fire, and the glowing fire bathed the bright light; and the bright light and the glowing fire poured over the whole human figure, so that the three were one light in one power of potential. And again I heard the living Light, saying to me:

1 On the perception of God's mysteries

This is the perception of God's mysteries, whereby it can be distinctly perceived and understood what is that Fullness, Whose origin was never seen, and in Which that lofty strength never fails that founded all the sources of strength. For if the Lord were empty of His own vitality, what then would have been His deeds? And therefore in the whole work it is perceived Who the Maker is.

2 On the Three Persons

Therefore you see a bright light, which without any flaw of illusion, deficiency or deception designates the Father; and in this light the figure of a man the color of a sapphire, which without any flaw of obstinacy, envy or iniquity designates the Son, Who was begotten of the Father in Divinity before time began, and then within time was incarnate in the world in Humanity; which is all blazing with a gentle glowing fire, which fire without any flaw of aridity, mortality or darkness designates the Holy Spirit, by Whom the Only-Begotten of God was conceived in the flesh and born of the Virgin within time and poured the true light into the world. And that bright light bathes the whole of the glowing fire, and the glowing fire bathes the bright light; and the bright light and the glowing fire pour over the whole human figure, so that the three are one light in one power of potential. And this means that the Father, Who is Justice, is not without the Son or the Holy Spirit; and the Holy Spirit, Who kindles the hearts of the faithful, is not without the Father or the Son; and the Son, Who is the plenitude of fruition, is not without the Father or the Holy Spirit. They are inseparable in Divine Majesty, for the Father is not without the Son, nor the Son without the Father, nor the Father and the Son without the Holy Spirit, nor the Holy Spirit without Them. Thus these three Persons are one God in the one and perfect divinity of majesty, and the unity of Their divinity is unbreakable; the Divinity cannot be rent asunder, for it remains inviolable without change. But the Father is declared through the Son, the Son through Creation, and the Holy Spirit through the Son incarnate. How? It is the Father Who begot the Son before the ages; the Son through Whom all things were made by the Father when creatures were created; and the Holy Spirit Who, in the likeness of a dove, appeared at the baptism of the Son of God before the end of time.

BOOK TWO

3 People must not forget to invoke the One God in Three Persons

Hence let no person ever forget to invoke Me, the sole God, in these Three Persons, because for this reason I have made Them known to Man, that he may burn more ardently in My love; since it was for love of him that I sent My Son into the world, as My beloved John testifies, saying:

4 John on the charity of God

“By this the charity of God has appeared toward us: that God has sent His Only-Begotten Son into the world, that we may live by Him. In this is charity, not that we have loved God, but that He has loved us, and sent His Son to be a propitiation for our sins” [1 John 4:9-10]. What does this mean? That because God loved us, another salvation arose than that we had had in the beginning, when we were heirs of innocence and holiness; for the Supernal Father showed His charity in our dangers, though we deserved punishment, in sending by supernal power His Holy Word alone into the darkness of the world for the people’s sake. There the Word perfected all good things, and by His gentleness brought back to life those who had been cast out because of their unclean sins and could not return to their lost holiness. What does this mean?

That through this fountain of life came the embrace of God’s maternal love, which has nourished us unto life and is our help in perils, and is the deepest and sweetest charity and prepares us for penitence. How?

God has mercifully remembered His great work and His precious pearl, Man, whom He formed from the mud of the earth and into whom He breathed the breath of life. How? By devising the life of penitence, which will never fail in efficacy. For through his proud suasion the cunning serpent deceived Man, but God cast him into penitence, which calls for the humility the Devil did not know and could not practise; for he knew not how to rise up to the right way.

VISION TWO

Hence this salvation of charity did not spring from us, and we were ignorant and incapable of loving God for our salvation; but He Himself, the Creator and Lord of all, so loved His people that for their salvation He sent His Son, the Prince and Savior of the faithful, Who washed and dried our wounds. And He exuded the sweetest balm, from which flow all good things for salvation. Therefore, O human, you must understand that no misfortune or change can touch God. For the Father is the Father, the Son is the Son, and the Holy Spirit is the Holy Spirit, and these Three Persons are indivisible in the Unity of the Divinity. How?

5 On the three qualities of a stone

There are three qualities in a stone and three in a flame and three in a word. How? In the stone is cool dampness and solidity to the touch and sparkling fire. It has cool dampness that it may not be dissolved or broken; solidity to the touch that it may make up habitations and defenses; and sparkling fire that it may be heated and consolidated into hardness. Now this cool dampness signifies the Father, Who never withers and Whose power never ends; and this solidity of touch designates the Son, Who was born of the Virgin and could be touched and known; and the sparkling fire signifies the Holy Spirit, Who enkindles and enlightens the hearts of the faithful. What does this mean?

As a person who in the body often touches the cool dampness of stone falls sick and grows weak, so one who in his unsteady thoughts rashly tries to contemplate the Father loses his faith. And as people build their dwellings and defend themselves against their enemies by handling the solidity of stone, so too the Son of God, Who is the true cornerstone, is the dwelling of the faithful people and their protector from evil spirits. And as sparkling fire gives light to dark places by burning what it touches, so also the Holy Spirit drives out unbelief and consumes the blight of iniquity.

And as these three qualities are in one stone, so the true Trinity is in the true Unity.

6 On the three qualities in a flame

Again, as the flame of a fire has three qualities, so there is one God in three Persons. How? A flame is made up of brilliant light and red power and fiery heat. It has brilliant light that it may shine, and red power that it may endure, and fiery heat that it may burn. Therefore, by the brilliant light understand the Father, Who with paternal love opens His brightness to His faithful; and by the red power, which is in the flame that it may be strong, understand the Son, Who took on a body born from a Virgin, in which His divine wonders were shown; and by the fiery heat understand the Holy Spirit, Who burns ardently in the minds of the faithful. But there is no flame seen where there is neither brilliant light nor red power nor fiery heat; and thus also where neither the Father nor the Son nor the Holy Spirit is known God is not properly worshipped.

BOOK TWO

Therefore as these three qualities are found in one flame, so Three Persons must be understood in the Unity of the Divinity.

7 On the three causes of human words

And as three causes for the production of words are seen, so the Trinity in the Unity of the Divinity is to be inferred. How? In a word there is sound, force and breath. It has sound that it may be heard, meaning that it may be understood, and breath that it may be pronounced. In the sound, then, observe the Father, Who manifests all things with ineffable power; in the meaning, the Son, Who was miraculously begotten of the Father; and in the breath, the Holy Spirit, Who sweetly burns in Them. But where no sound is heard, no meaning is used and no breath is lifted, there no word will be understood; so also the Father, Son and Holy Spirit are not divided from one another, but do Their works together.

So as there are these three causes for one word, the celestial Trinity is likewise in the celestial Unity. So as in a stone there exists and there operates no cool dampness without solidity to the touch and sparkling fire, or solidity to the touch without cool dampness and sparkling fire, or sparkling fire without cool dampness and solidity to the touch; and as in a flame there exists and there operates no brilliant light without red power and fiery heat, or red power without brilliant light and fiery heat, or fiery heat without brilliant light and red power; and as in a word there exists and there operates no sound without meaning and breath, or meaning without sound and breath, or breath without sound and meaning, but all keep indivisibly together to operate; so also these Three Persons of the true Trinity live inseparably in the majesty of the Divinity and are not divided from each other.

Thus, O human, understand the One God in Three Persons. In the foolishness of your mind you think that God is so powerless that He cannot truly live in three Persons, but only exist weakly in one. What does this mean? God is, in three Persons, the true God, the First and the Last.

8 On the unity of essence

But the Father is not without the Son, or the Son without the Father, or the Father and the Son without the Holy Spirit, or the Holy Spirit without Them; for these three Persons are inseparable in the Unity of the Divinity.

VISION TWO

How? A word sounds from a person's mouth, but the mouth does not sound without a word, nor does the word sound without life. Where does the word stay? In the person. And from whence does it go forth? From the person. And how? Because the person is living. Thus the Son is in the Father, Whom the Father sent into the dark world for human salvation, conceived in the Virgin by the Holy Spirit. As the Son is the Only-Begotten in the Divinity, He is the only-begotten in virginity; as he is the Only One of the Father, He is the only-born of the Mother; as the Father begot Him before time began, the Virgin Mother bore the same Only One within time, and after childbirth remained a virgin.

Therefore, O human, in these Three Persons recognize your God, Who created you in the power of His Divinity and redeemed you from damnation. And do not forget your Creator, as Solomon urges you when he writes:

9 Words of Solomon

"Remember your Creator in the days of your youth, before the time of affliction comes, and the years draw nigh of which you shall say: They please me not." [Ecclesiastes 12:1] What does this mean? With your mental powers remember Him Who created you when, in the days of your false confidence, you think it is possible for you to walk according to your own desires, and raise yourself on high to throw yourself into the abyss, and stand in prosperity to fall into calamity. For the force of life in you always strives to perfect itself, until the time when it is complete. How? From birth a child grows up to full stature and remains an adult, leaving the mental license that is in foolish behavior and thinking carefully about how to manage his affairs, as he did not do in the foolishness of childhood. So let the person of faith do too. Let him leave childish behavior and grow up to fullness of virtue and persevere in its strength, leaving the pride of his desire, which pants after foolish vice; but let him with anxious care meditate what may be useful for him, though before he stooped childishly to childish ways.

Therefore, O human, embrace your God in the daylight of your strength, before the hour comes for the purgation of your works, when all things will be manifest and nothing will be overlooked, when the times come that will be complete and will never end; about which times your humanity murmurs a little, saying, "These changes do not please me, for I do not understand whether they will give me good fortune or calamity." For the human mind always wavers on this subject, since when it does good works it is anxious about whether or not they will please God, and when it does bad ones it is afraid to lose forgiveness and salvation.

But let the one who sees with watchful eyes and hears with attentive ears welcome with a kiss My mystical words, which proceed from Me Who am life.

MOTHER CHURCH

VISION THREE

The Church, Bride of Christ and Mother of the Faithful

*A*fter this I saw the image of a woman as large as a great city, with a wonderful crown on her head and arms from which a splendor hung like sleeves, shining from Heaven to earth. Her womb was pierced like a net with many openings, with a huge multitude of people running in and out. She had no legs or feet, but stood balanced on her womb in front of the altar that stands before the eyes of God, embracing it with her outstretched hands and gazing sharply with her eyes throughout all of Heaven. I could not make out her attire, except that she was arrayed in great splendor and gleamed with lucid serenity, and on her breast shone a red glow like the dawn; and I heard a sound of all kinds of music singing about her, "Like the dawn, greatly sparkling."

And that image spreads out its splendor like a garment, saying, "I must conceive and give birth!" And at once, like lightning, there hastened to her a multitude of angels, making steps and seats within her for people, by whom the image was to be perfected.

Then I saw black children moving in the air near the ground like fishes in water, and they entered the womb of the image through the openings that pierced it. But she groaned, drawing them upward to her head, and they went out by her mouth, while she remained untouched. And behold, that serene light with the figure of a man in it, blazing with a glowing fire, which I had seen in my previous vision, again appeared to me, and stripped the black skin off each of them and threw it away; and it clothed each of them in a pure white garment and opened to them the serene light, saying to them one by one:

"Cast off the old injustice, and put on the new sanctity. For the gate of your inheritance is unlocked for you. Consider, therefore, how you have been taught, that you may know your Father Whom you have confessed. I have received you, and you have confessed Me. Now, therefore, behold the two paths, one to the East and the other to the North. If you will diligently contemplate Me with your inner vision, as in faith you have been taught, I will receive you into My kingdom. And if you love Me rightly, I will do whatever you shall wish. But if you despise Me and turn away from Me, looking backward and not seeking to know or understand Me, Who am recalling you by pure penitence though you are filthy with sin, and if you run back to the Devil as to your father, then perdition will take you; for you will be judged according to your works, since when I gave you the good you did not choose to know Me."

But the children who had passed through the womb of the image walked in the splendor that surrounded her. And she, benignly gazing on them, said in a sad voice, "These children of mine will return again to dust. I conceive and bear many who oppress me, their mother, by heretical, schismatic and useless battles, by robberies and murders, by adultery and fornication, and by many such errors. Many of these rise again in true penitence to eternal life, but many fall in false obduracy to eternal death."

And again I heard the voice from Heaven saying to me: "The great edifice of living souls, which is constructed in Heaven from living stones, is adorned with the immense beauty of its children's virtues, encircling them as a great city encircles its immense throngs of people, or as a wide net does a multitude of fishes; and however much the work of the faithful thrives in the Christian name, by so much does it blossom with celestial virtues."

1 The building of the Church, who redeems her children by Spirit and water

Wherefore now you see the image of a woman as large as a great city; this designates the Bride of My Son, who always bears her children by regeneration in the Spirit and in water, for the strong Warrior founded her on a wide base of virtue, that she might hold and perfect the great crowd of His elect; and no enemy can conquer or storm her. She expels unbelief and expands belief, by which it should be understood that in the mortal world each of the faithful is an example to his neighbor, and so they do great works of virtue in Heaven. And when the just, one by one, shall come to join the children of light, the good they have worked will appear in them, which cannot be seen here among mortal ashes, concealed as it is by the shadow of trouble.

2 The Church in her origin was adorned by apostles and martyrs

She has a wonderful crown on her head; for at her origin, when she was raised up by the blood of the Lamb, she was fittingly adorned with apostles and martyrs, and thus betrothed with true betrothal to My Son, since in His blood she faithfully formed herself into a firm edifice of holy souls.

3 The Church is adorned by the priesthood and almsgiving

And from her arms a splendor hangs like sleeves, shining from Heaven to earth. This is the work of power done by priests, who with purity of heart and hands and in the strength of good works offer the holiest of sacrifices upon the holy altar in the sacrament of the body and blood of their Savior. And the most glorious of their works is to show mercy, always offering generous help for every grief and distributing alms to the poor with a gentle heart while saying with their whole soul, "This is not my property, but that of Him Who created me." And this work, inspired by God, is before His eyes in Heaven, when by the teaching of the Church it is done among the faithful on earth.

4 On the maternal kindness of the Church

Her womb is pierced like a net with many openings, with a huge multitude of people running in and out; that is, she displays her maternal kindness, which is so clever at capturing faithful souls by diverse goads of virtue, and in which the trusting peoples devoutly lead their lives by the faith of their true belief. But He Who casts the net to capture the fishes is My Son, the Bridegroom of His beloved Church, whom He betrothed to Himself in His blood to repair the fall of lost humanity.

5 The Church, not yet perfected, will be brought to perfection near the end

She does not yet have legs or feet, for she has not yet been brought to the full strength of her constancy or the full purity of her fulfillment; for when the son of perdition comes to delude the world she will suffer fiery and bloody anguish in all her members from his cruel wickedness. By this calamity, with bleeding wounds, she will be brought to perfection; then let her run swiftly into the heavenly Jerusalem, where she will sweetly rise anew as a bride in the blood of My Son, entering into life with ardor in the joy of her offspring.

6 How the Church devoutly offers up her children in purity

But she stands balanced on her womb in front of the altar that stands before the eyes of God, embracing it with her outstretched hands; for she is always pregnant and procreating children of hers by the true ablution, and offering them devoutly to God by the purest prayers of the saints and the sweet fragrance of chosen virtues both hidden and manifest; which are plain to the clear understanding of the mind's eye when all stain of falsity and all noises of human praise are removed, as incense is purged of a noxious stench that corrupts its smell. This good work is in God's sight the sweetest sacrifice, at which the Church constantly labors, striving with her whole desire for heavenly things in bringing virtues to fruition, and by increase of such fruit thirtyfold, sixtyfold and a hundredfold building the high tower of the celestial walls.

BOOK TWO

7 No wickedness of devilish art can obscure the Church

And she gazes sharply with her eyes throughout all of Heaven; for her purpose, which she devoutly keeps to in the heavenly places, can be obscured by no wickedness: no persuasion of devilish art, nor error of a wavering people, nor storms over the various countries in which madmen tear themselves to pieces in the fury of their unbelief.

8 The human mind cannot fully understand the secrets of the Church

You cannot make out her attire, which is to say that the human intellect, weighed down by fragile weakness, cannot fully understand her secrets; except that she is arrayed in great splendor and gleams with lucid serenity, for the True Sun shines everywhere around her by the bright inspiration of the Holy Spirit and her most becoming adornments of virtue.

9 On the virginity of Mary

And on her breast shines a red glow like the dawn; for the virginity of the Most Blessed Virgin when she brought forth the Son of God glows with the most ardent devotion in the hearts of the faithful. And you hear a sound of all kinds of music singing about her, "Like the dawn, greatly sparkling"; for, as you are now given to understand, all believers should join with their whole wills in celebrating the virginity of that spotless Virgin in the Church.

10 On the expansion of the sacrament of the true Trinity

And that image spreads out its splendor like a garment, saying that she has to conceive and give birth, which means that in the Church the sacrament of the true Trinity will more widely expand, for it is her garment in which to shelter the faithful peoples, through whom she grows by the building up of the living stones, who are washed white in the pure font; thus she herself affirms that it is necessary to salvation that she conceive children in blessing and bring them forth in cleansing, by regeneration in the Spirit and water.

11 The ministry of angels is at hand for each of the faithful

And at once, like lightning, there hasten to her a multitude of angels, making steps and seats within her for people, by whom the image is to be perfected;

VISION THREE

because for each of the faithful there is at hand a fearsome and desirable ministry of blessed spirits; they are building stairs of faith and seats of sovereign quiet for those faithful souls, in whom that happy mother, the Church, will attain to her full beauty.

12 Those regenerated by the Church their mother in the faith of the Trinity

Then you see black children moving in the air near the ground like fishes in water, and they enter the womb of the image through the openings that pierce it. This signifies the blackness of those foolish people who are not yet washed in the bath of salvation, but love earthly things and run about doing them, building their dwelling on their unsteadiness; they come at last to the mother of holiness, contemplate the dignity of her secrets and receive her blessing, by which they are snatched from the Devil and restored to God. Thus they enter the confines of the churchly order in which the faithful person is blessed by salvation, when he says within himself, "I believe in God," and the rest of the articles of faith.

But she groans, drawing them upward to her head, and they go out by her mouth, while she remains untouched. For this blessed mother sighs inwardly when baptism is celebrated by the sacred anointing of the Holy Spirit, because the person is renewed by the true circumcision of the Spirit and water, and thus offered to the Supreme Beatitude Who is the Head of all, and made a member of Christ, regenerated unto salvation by invocation of the Holy Trinity. But in this that mother suffers no hurt, for she will remain forever in the wholeness of virginity, which is the Catholic faith; for she arose in the blood of the true Lamb, her intimate Bridegroom, Who was born of the untouched Virgin without any corruption of integrity. So too that Bride will remain untouched, so that no schism can corrupt her. ✓

She will often, however, be bothered by the wicked, but with the help of her Bridegroom she will always most strongly defend herself, like a virgin who is often assailed by the cravings of desire through the Devil's art and the arguments of men, but pours out her prayers to God and is forcibly liberated from their temptations and her virginity preserved. So also the Church resists her wicked corrupters, the heretical errors of Christians, Jews and pagans, who infest her and try to corrupt her virginity, which is the Catholic faith. She resists them strongly, lest she be corrupted, for she was and is and will remain a virgin; the true faith which is her virginity keeps its wholeness against all error, so that her honor as a chaste virgin remains uncorrupted by any touch of lust in the modesty of her body. ✓

And thus the Church is the virginal mother of all Christians, since by the mystery of the Holy Spirit she conceives and bears them, offering them to God so that they are called the children of God. And as the Holy Spirit overshadowed the Blessed Mother, so that she miraculously conceived and painlessly bore the Son of God and yet remained a virgin, so does the Holy Spirit illumine the Church, happy mother of believers, so that without any corruption she conceives and bears children naturally, yet remains a virgin. How is this?

13 Analogy of the balsam, onyx and diamond

As balsam oozes from a tree, and powerful medicines pour from an onyx vessel in which they are stored, and bright light streams without impediment from a diamond, so the Son of God, unopposed by corruption, was born of the Virgin; and so too the Church, His Bride, brings forth her children without being opposed by error, yet remains a virgin in the integrity of her faith.

14 The Trinity in baptism takes away black sins and confers a white garment

And you see how that serene light with the figure of a man in it, blazing with a glowing fire, which you saw in your previous vision, again appears to you. This means that the true Trinity in the true Unity is again shown to you to confirm your faith, as you saw it in that previous exceedingly true vision, with the serene Father and His sweet Son who was in divinity before all time in the Father, conceived within time in the flesh by the Holy Spirit and born of the Virgin. For in holy baptism Heaven opens and that Blessed Trinity appears to the baptized, so that the faithful person may receive the knowledge of how to worship the One God in the true Trinity, Which truly appeared in the first sacrament of baptism.

And it strips the black skin off each of them and throws it away; and it clothes each of them in a pure white garment and opens to them the serene light, speaking to them one by one words of blessed admonition. For the Divine Power, looking into human hearts, mercifully takes from them the crimes of their unbelief by the washing of baptism, and throws those crimes out of the Way, Which is Christ; for in Christ there is no death, but life through pure confession and the washing away of sins. Through Him each of them is clothed in the purity of salvation, and through Him the brightness of the blessed inheritance, from which the first human being was expelled, is opened to them. And each of the faithful is admonished by words of truth that he should lay aside the old ways of iniquity and accept the new gift of grace for salvation.

VISION THREE

And the children who have passed through the womb of the image walk in the splendor that surrounds her; which means that they, who through the font of sacred baptism have the Church as their happy mother, should remain in and keep to the divine law by which that mother is illuminated and adorned, for if they renounce it by infidelity they will again be stained by the sins from which they had been cleansed.

15 On the Church's lament over the error of her children

So she, benignly gazing on them, says in a sad voice that these children of hers will return again to dust. For this blessed mother, loving them with deepest love and feeling their pain in the depths of her viscera, laments that they whom she brought forth in the washing of regeneration and who were made pure in the heavenly places have longed again for earthly things and become filthy with sin. How? Because many who outwardly receive the faith inwardly oppose it by various vices and tread the way of error instead of the way of truth. Many of them recover from this falsity, but many persist in wickedness; their mother shows this by her words quoted above.

16 Two signs are given to people with which to defend themselves

Two signs of the law for those who were signed were handed down and are known to humanity: circumcision among the ancient fathers, and baptism among the new doctors. By these people are guided like an ox by its yoke; for, though the ox is corrected by the goad, it would still make a crooked furrow if it were not bound to the yoke. Likewise, people would not go forward in My ways if they were not bound to the yoke of their signs.

17 Analogy of the young man

This would be as if a young man were to start off on a journey and his father were to say to him, "Go the right way," but not give him a sword or any weapons of war with which to defend himself. What would happen then? He would flee naked, neither daring nor able to defend himself from the danger that stands in his way and hinders his journey; and he would hide himself, not being signed with the fearsome armor that would have defended him. So would My people be naked if they were not baptized; but now they are fearsome to their enemies who see them signed with the anointing of baptism, by which they resist all who try to destroy them, whether it be a human throng or a devilish army.

BOOK TWO

18 Why the twofold law was not given to Adam

But the twofold law was not given to Adam. Why? I gave him a law about the tree when he regarded Me in the innocence of his heart. But he spurned Me and agreed with the cunning serpent, and that was so dangerous that no mortal eye will be able to see Me as long as it remains in this transitory world. And because Adam transgressed My precept, he and his race were without a law until the time that prefigured the nobility of My Son.

19 The ancient serpent was fought by Noah and Abraham and bound by the Church

But the warning of the Holy Spirit appeared in Noah as the human race was on the verge of perishing, when I raised the ark above the Flood. For before the ages I foresaw that this evil race, which had completely polluted itself with black wickedness, would have to be replaced by a new stock. For after the death of Adam, his progeny went astray, not knowing that I am God, saying, "Who is God? Who is God?" And then every evil arose in their midst, so that the ancient serpent slithered among them with unhampered power, persuading them to do all his will. He was then free from bondage in fetters, for before the Flood the warning of the Holy Spirit did not strike him; but I threatened him in Noah, from whom the new stock arose, for I so instructed My people that they could never forget the teaching.

Thus the warning of the Holy Spirit first threatened him in Noah, but then circumcision in Abraham struck him in the jaw; and at last the Church bound him in the last days, until the world passes away on the final day. I permitted the Devil to exercise his power in the world before the Flood because of the ancient contest in which he conquered Adam, until he had filled his belly with the carcass of all iniquity; and I allowed this because My judgment is just. Therefore I raised up the towering mass of the Flood and slew the sinners, but in My mystery preserved Noah, whom Satan could not despoil, because by My will he stayed above the Flood. And in the Flood I symbolized the righteous offspring, My Son, announcing to the new age that He Who would silently come into the world and make known the Holy Trinity was truly to be worshipped. How?

20 On the three wings and what they signify

He displayed three wings, which symbolize the Holy Trinity; for which you, O Synagogue, shall deny Me and an alien people shall receive Me, and for which you, O Abraham, shall be magnified. O Abraham, you are encircled with circumcision, you are walled round by the ancient covenant, and you are adorned with the dawn of the Church's sun. I gave circumcision to you and your race until the coming of My Son, who openly forgave the sins of humanity; but with Him the physical circumcision of the flesh of the foreskin came to an end, and in the sanctification of the washing of My Son, the true font of baptism poured forth.

VISION THREE

- 21 Men who were uncircumcised in the time of circumcision were transgressors

But those of your race who in the time of circumcision were not circumcised when they were told to be, whether they were of lesser or greater age, transgressed the terms of My covenant; except women, on whom circumcision is not enjoined. For a woman is not to be circumcised, since the maternal tabernacle is hidden within her body and cannot be touched except as flesh embraces flesh; and also she is under the power of a husband like a servant under his master.

- 22 Adam's creation had three causes and so does a man who begets children

For a man has three causes for his act: desire, potency and zeal. His desire enkindles his potency, and thus in both the man and his work there is zeal to complete the work and burning will. In the same way there were three causes at work in the creation of Adam: God's will formed Man by means of His power and perfected Him in great loving-kindness in His own image and likeness. So in God's will note a parallel with a man's desire, and in God's power, a man's potency, and in the loving-kindness of God's will and power the zeal of the man's desire and potency.

In this way the human race is begotten by men on women, as God made humanity from the mud of the earth; and as the earth in its freshness is constituted to bring forth from seeds the fruits of the field, so women are to bring forth children in the waters of birth. What does this mean?

A woman from time to time becomes aware of moisture in her, which diffuses itself through her in the fluid of fertility with heat. Otherwise she would not willingly receive her husband, but refuse him and not consent to his will or procreate children. For if she did not have the fluid of fertility with heat, she would remain fruitless like dry ground, which does not yield itself to any fruitful use. But this fluid of fertility is not always inflamed into the ardor of desire in a woman, unless she has previously been touched by a man and so knows the passion of the ardor of desire; for desire in her is not as strong and burning as in a man, who is as strong as a lion in his desire for the deed of begetting. He, therefore, has the strength of the desire and the deed, and a woman's business is only to submit to the command of his will; she is then occupied with the procreation of her offspring until she brings them into the world.

- 23 A woman who is a virgin for the love of God is by God greatly ornamented

But she who desires My Son and wants to keep her virginity for His love is greatly ornamented in His nuptial chamber, for she sets at naught the burning she endures for the sake of His love, but perseveres in chastity, choosing not to be consumed by the fire of ardent lust; and in her spiritual marriage she despises [the idea of] a fleshly husband, and renounces the thought of one to strive with her whole desire after My Son. O dearest seeds, O flowers sweeter and more exquisite than any perfumes, whose soft fragility rises like the dawn to betrothal with My Son, loving Him dearly with chaste love; she is His bride and He is her Bridegroom, for this race of virgins loves Him dearly and is to be adorned in the Heavenly Kingdom with glorious ornaments! But what else?

- 24 A man who refuses marriage for love of God is a consort of the Son of God

And when the strength of a man refuses to lead a consort in marriage, so that the man for love of My Son controls himself in the vigor of his nature, whose fulfillment is the begetting of children, but he restrains his body so as not to fulfil the desires of the flesh; that this man conquers himself in this manner is extremely pleasing to Me. Therefore I make him too a consort of My Son and place Him like a calm mirror before his face, because he resists the Devil, who drew the human race to himself by filthy and wicked infidelity. To save humanity from this snare I sent My Son into the world, born of the sweet Virgin without any stain of sin; and that innocent Lamb brought and consecrated the font of salvation, abolishing in it the foreskin of the ancient sin. What is this?

This bitter foreskin is the crime of Adam's transgression, and My Son took it away, entering the font of salvation Himself and nobly setting apart the Christian multitude, that the ancient serpent who deceived humanity might in that same washing be drowned. How? The Son fulfilled the Father's terms, and took His inheritance. What does this mean? The race of Adam was driven for his transgression out of the place of delight, but in the baptism of salvation was recalled to life by My Son. How? He Himself spoke the words of blessing over the unbelievers who resisted My precepts, so that, terrified, they would seek pardon in a spirit of contrition, which My servant Isaiah testifies as I told him to, saying:

VISION THREE

25 Words of Isaiah the prophet

“And the children of those who afflicted you shall come and bow down to you, and all who slandered you shall worship your footsteps” [Isaiah 60:14]. What does this mean? O You Who are celestial Peace and the purest Sun! By You shall burst forth the living root, which is regeneration by the Spirit and water, and those who had lain prostrate under the heaviest curse in the filth of horrible impurity shall come eagerly to acknowledge You; and thus bowed down, they will rise at last to truth and justice. How?

They will suck the maternal sweetness of the true faith, not knowing it by sight but grasping it by faithful belief. And who are they? Those who sprang in sin from a race that never saw You in Your burning charity but persistently afflicted and oppressed You as if You were not their destined ruler; but who came to their senses and most sweetly loved You.

And so when they come to follow the true faith they will accept You as King, and adore You as Lord and run swiftly in the holy paths You have shown them; they will gaze on You always with uplifted hands and keep constant vigil before You by good works, never growing weary of seeing You by faith; and all this will be done by those who formerly tore You without shame or reverence, and divided You in hatred and envy; but now they will embrace You ardently in the mirror of faith. What does this mean?

26 Heaven was closed to Man by Adam's fault until the Son of God came

The fall of Adam closed Heaven through My wrath; for Man spurned Me and listened to the cunning serpent, and therefore all the glory of Paradise was closed to him. This closure lasted until the coming of My noble Son, Who by My will entered the flowing Jordan, where My voice resounded mercifully when I said that He was My beloved Son in Whom I was well pleased. I willed this so that at the end of time I might redeem humanity through My Son, Who cleaves to Me in brightest warmth of love as the comb to the honey; therefore I sent Him into the font, which symbolizes Me the Fountain of living water, so that He Himself Who is the fountain of salvation might raise up those souls whom the Holy Spirit by water would redeem from sin and from eternal death. Wherefore the Holy Spirit appeared there too, for through Him remission of sins is given to the faithful; that is, in the mystical secret when My Only-Begotten was pointed out by the Holy Spirit in the form of a dove, which bird is of simple and honest behavior, and likewise the Holy Spirit is simple unfailing justice and goodness above all good. And this was fitting, for My Son was born of the Virgin without any stain of sin, and in baptism a person who is born with sin from a man and a woman is splendidly and gloriously born again without sin, as My Son says to Nicodemus in the Gospel:

27 Words of the Gospel

“Truly, truly I say to you, unless a man is born again of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the Kingdom of Heaven” [John 3:5]. What does this mean? With firmest certainty and not with wavering doubt, I say to you who are born of filth that Man, risen out of burning heat and wrapped in a poisonous form, will be confounded by his apathy unless in the true joy of a new child he is born again from the water of sanctification and the spirit of illumination. How? Because Man, who overflows like water with the spirit of his enlivening, will not be able to enter into salvation as an heir to the Kingdom of his Creator unless he is purified by the true regeneration, as water cleans the dirty and spirit gives life to the inanimate; for he is guilty of the sin of the first parent, who was fraudulently deceived by the Devil. How?

As the thief who wishes to steal the King’s most noble and precious possession sneaks in furtively, so the deceptive idea crept in by the maw of the Devil, by which he wickedly stole the beloved jewel of holy innocence and chastity in which dwelt the Holy Spirit; so it must now be cleansed by the holy ablution. For the death-bearing heat, which comes out of transgression of Almighty God’s commands and is kindled by lust in the curdling of desire, must now be drowned in Him, Who never grudgingly hides His wonders, but generously shows them forth in infinite mercy.

28 Words of God in exhortation

Hear My Son, therefore, in this plan of regeneration, which is the revelation of My Kingdom; and learn from Him, that you may fulfil My precepts. Do this and so please Me, and beware lest the ancient serpent seduce you; and if you keep to your baptism, which was commanded for you in the name of the Blessed Trinity, you shall not die. And as often as you fall, rise again with greater penitence, in accordance with My mercy on your sins.

O you My dearest children, know the goodness of your Father Who by Himself has delivered you from the jaws of the Devil through pure confession and true pardon and given you all the good things with which to labor to possess the celestial Jerusalem, which you lost by crafty deception; for no one can seek out his lost inheritance except by the sweat of his labor. But you can easily receive supernal blessedness, your just inheritance, by a simple rule. For the Holy Spirit, as was said before, expels Satan's power from Man in baptism, sanctifying him as a new person in regeneration, so that he can receive his lost joys. Therefore, let anyone who desires to be saved not refuse to be regenerated for the purgation of his sins.

29 In circumcision one member was circumcised, but all members are in baptism

For to the men of the race of Abraham I gave circumcision in one member, but in My Son I commanded all men and women of all people to be circumcised in all their members. How? The circumcision of baptism sprang from the baptism of My Son, and so it shall remain till the last day, and then its sanctity will abide for eternity and know no end. And those who are thus circumcised in the washing of baptism will truly be saved, if they faithfully keep this washing by just works; for I will receive any person, whether of lesser or of greater age, who will keep My covenant, which he has made with Me, believing in Me and confessing the true Trinity either by himself or by those who speak for him, as an infant or a person unable to speak asks by another's mouth. And I will not destroy him in eternity, like one who refuses to receive this font and the works of faith, as is written in the Gospel in the teaching of My Son:

30 Words of the Gospel

"He who believes and is baptized shall be saved; but he who does not believe shall be condemned" [Mark 16:16]. What does this mean? A person who sees by his knowledge, which is his inner eye, what is hidden from his outer sight and does not doubt it, most certainly believes; and this is faith. For what a person perceives outwardly, he knows outwardly, and what he sees inwardly, he understands inwardly. Therefore, when human knowledge ardently perceives in the mirror of life the incomprehensible Divinity the outer eye cannot see, the lusts of the flesh are thrown to the ground and trampled on.

Thus the spirit of that person sighs for true loftiness and feels the regeneration brought by the Son of Man, He Who was conceived by the Holy Spirit, whose mother did not receive him from the flesh of a man, but from the mystery of the Father of all. And when He sweetly came He showed in water the pure and living mirror that makes Man live in regeneration. For as Man was born in the flesh when divine power created him in the form of Adam, so the Holy Spirit revives the life of the soul by the pouring out of water; It receives into Itself the spirit of the person, restoring him to life, as he is first brought into life on a wave of blood when he comes out of the vessel of the body. And just as a human form is then lovingly formed and called human, so now the soul of the person is vivified in water before the eyes of God, so that God knows that he is an inheritor of life.

Wherefore he who receives the font of salvation and the covenant of justice finds life in salvation, because he has faithfully believed. But he who does not will to believe is dead, for he does not have the breath of the Spirit with which to fly in the heights of Heaven, but gropes his way by touch with blinded eyes, and in the darkened knowledge of the flesh is not truly alive; for he lacks the vital teaching God has breathed into one who against the will of his flesh ascends on high. That person, then, will be condemned to the death of unbelief, because he did not have the washing of salvation. For I have not excluded any age or race from this salvation, but through My Son I have mercifully instituted this calling for all people.

31 God receives in baptism both sexes at all ages

For in whatever hour and of whatever sex or age a person may be, male or female, infant or decrepit, when he comes to baptism with loving devotion I will receive him with My merciful help. And I do not refuse the washing of baptism to an infant, as certain false deceivers declare who lyingly say I reject such an offering; as in the Old Testament I did not spurn the circumcision of an infant, though he did not request it with his own voice or receive it of his own will, but his parents supplied it for him.

So now in the new grace I do not reject the baptism of an infant, although he does not ask it by speech or by consent; his parents do this for him.

32 In honor of the Trinity there must be three present at the font

But if he wants to attain salvation, he should then in all justice fulfil the faithful promise that those who stood with him at the sacred font made for him. In honor of the Holy Trinity these ought to be three people, the priest who pours the water on him and the two who give the words of faith for him. But those who are thus joined to the baptized in the washing of baptism cannot enter into marriage relations with him, for they are joined to him by spiritual relationship. In the baptism of My Son, I the Father thundered, which the priest re-enacts when he gives the benediction for the washing; and the Holy Spirit was seen in the form of a gentle animal, whose place is held by the man who speaks to and teaches the person to be baptized in simplicity of heart; and My Son was present to be baptized in the flesh, which is symbolized by the woman who stands by in the sweetness of a nurturer in the place of the sweet Incarnation of My Only-Begotten. And what then?

VISION THREE

33 Analogy of a baby

And as a baby is nourished in its body by milk and the food another grinds up for it, so also a baptized person must observe from his inmost heart the doctrine and the faith given to him in his baptism. But if the baby does not suck at its mother's breast or take the food ground up for it, it will die at once; and so also if a baptized person does not receive the nurturing of his most loving mother, the Church, or retain the words his faithful teachers proposed to him at baptism, he will not escape a cruel death for his soul, for he has refused his soul's salvation and the sweetness of eternal life. And as, when the baby cannot chew its bodily food with its teeth, someone else grinds it up for it to swallow lest it should die, so too in baptism, since it lacks words to confess Me, of necessity there are spiritual helpers there for it, who provide it with the food of life, namely the Catholic faith, lest it fall into the snare of perpetual death. How?

A master gives his orders to his servant in a commanding voice, and the latter carries them out in anxiety and fear; likewise a mother teaches her daughter charity, and the latter fulfils her words in obedience; and in the same way, let those who have vowed the faith offer the words of salvation at the proper time to the baptized person, that he may carry them out with faithful devotion for the love of Heaven.

34 In baptism all sins are remitted

No matter how grave are the sins with which a person is burdened, if he enters into holy baptism in the name of the sacred Trinity I truly efface all the crimes of his wickedness; as in an infant, when he is washed in the bath of regeneration, I truly take away the old sin of Adam. But do not marvel, O human, that in the font of baptism a person is justified of all his sins and mercifully relieved of their weight. For the innocent Lamb, who entered the font of baptism without any stain of sin, mercifully removes the evil of human sins in baptism by the great mystery of His Incarnation. But I perceive and scrutinize all things most keenly both in this world and in eternity, where there is no bodily death and all things are manifest. What does this mean?

Gehenna is tested by the works of death and eternal life by the works that pertain to life. How? Death is tested by death, for when a man dies by God's just judgment in his sins, without penitence and without mercy because he did not ask for it, his death is received into the deathliness of Hell. And Life is tested by life, so that good works shine in Heaven, for they are ruled by eternal life.

BOOK TWO

So also they who are baptized in the font of blessing are tested by the holiness of the second regeneration. And I am invoked by the benediction of the priest, so that My ears are attentive to the words of faith, even if he who invokes me is in the grasp of sin.

35 Even if a priest is a sinner, God accepts a baptism from him

For even if a priest is a sinner, I nonetheless accept the office of baptism from him, if he performs it faithfully by the invocation of My Name. His iniquity will condemn him if he perseveres in it without penitence. But I do not refuse to receive from him the celebration of baptism when he invokes Me with the words of faith. Why is this?

36 Analogy of the rich man

If a rich man has a steward who dispenses his goods justly to his dependents and so faithfully fulfils his duties, yet that steward is guilty in another deed, his master will not disdain to accept his duties from him; but he will say to him nonetheless, "Servant wicked in your deeds!" He will be indignant at him in his mind, but he will not disdain to accept from him the duties he performs with justice. So I too, Who have many stewards, do not refuse to receive My sacrament from a priest who is duly anointed and remains faithful to his duties, though he must be blamed for his other deeds; I judge him My enemy from his other unjust acts, but I do not disdain to receive from him what is Mine.

37 In a case of necessity, any person of faith may baptize

But if some person who is scheduled to be baptized thinks his separation from the body is near and asks for baptism, and a priest cannot be found to baptize him, if anyone pours the water on him with the invocation of the Triune Majesty, he is baptized; and he will receive the remission of his sins and the grace of heavenly blessedness through this pouring, for he has been washed in the Catholic faith, and this baptism cannot be changed.

But in this invocation no Person of the Three ineffable Persons can be omitted; for if due to unbelief one of Them is not invoked, the truth is not conferred by salvation but falsehood has caused deception. The invocation of the ineffable Trinity must not be lacking, for the Trinity was not lacking at the pure baptism of My Son, but there declared Its marvels wonderfully through Itself. Therefore, let those who want to be saved receive the regeneration of life unto salvation, and not neglect to receive it lest they perish; for, as an aborted fetus is rejected and perishes without the heat of life, and does not remain in its mother's womb either to be formed or to be quickened, so they who have nothing to do with the sacraments of the Church, the mother of all sanctity, either in mind or in deeds are in danger of death without the consolation of the Holy Spirit.

This let all peoples hear and understand who wish to enter the Kingdom of God in the regeneration of the Spirit and water, according to what is given to them in the holy Scriptures through the gift of the Holy Spirit.

But let the one who sees with watchful eyes and hears with attentive ears welcome with a kiss My mystical words, which proceed from Me Who am life.

CONFIRMATION

VISION FOUR

Confirmation

And then I saw the image of an immense round tower, all made of a single white stone, with three windows in its summit from which shone so much brilliance that even the roof of the tower, which was constructed like a cone, showed very clearly in its light. These windows were adorned all round with beautiful emeralds. And the tower stood directly in back of the image of the woman described in the previous vision, just as a tower is placed in the wall of a city, so that because of its strength the image could not fall.

And I saw those children who, as mentioned before, had passed through the womb of that image, shining with great brightness; some of them were adorned with gold color from their foreheads to their feet, but others lacked that color and had only the brightness. And some of these children were looking at a pure and brilliant splendor, but the rest at a turbulent red flash located in the East. Of those who were meditating on the pure and brilliant splendor, some had clear eyes and strong feet and were marching forward vigorously in the womb of the image; but others had weak eyes and crippled feet and were blown here and there by the wind. These, however, had a staff in their hands, and they flew in front of the image and touched it at times, though languidly. Still others had calm eyes but weak feet, and they moved back and forth in the air before the image; and others had weak eyes and strong feet, but they walked before the image languidly. But of the ones who were contemplating the turbulent red flash, some were well-ornamented and advanced into the image with vigor; but others tore themselves away from her and attacked her and broke her established rules. Among these, some by the fruit of penitence humbly returned to her, but others by obstinacy and neglect remained in the elation of the way of death. And again I heard the voice from Heaven saying to me:

- i Each baptized person should be anointed and confirmed by a bishop

After the illumination of baptism, which rose with the Sun of Justice Who sanctified the world by His own washing, the new Bride of the Lamb was adorned and confirmed in the fire of the ardor of the Holy Spirit for the perfection of her beauty. So also each of the faithful who is regenerated by the Spirit and water should be decorated and confirmed by a bishop's anointing, so that he will be strengthened in all his members toward achieving beatitude and find himself most perfectly adorned with the full fruits of highest justice.

Therefore, this tower that you see represents the flaming forth of the gifts of the Holy Spirit, which the Father sent into the world for love of His Son, to enkindle the hearts of His disciples with fiery tongues and make them stronger in the name of the Holy and True Trinity. Before the coming upon them of the Holy Spirit in fire, they were sitting shut up in their house, protecting their bodies, for they were timid about speaking of God's justice and feeble in facing their enemies' persecutions. Because they had seen My Son in the flesh, their inner vision was unopened and they loved Him in the flesh, and thus did not yet see the bright teaching that afterward, when they were made strong in the Holy Spirit, they spread abroad in the world. But by Its coming they were so confirmed that they did not shrink from any penalty, but bravely endured it. And this is the strength of that tower, which strengthened the Church so much that the insane fury of the Devil can never overcome it.

2 Confirmation confers the immense sweetness of the Holy Spirit

You see the tower as immense and round, all made of a single white stone. This means that the sweetness of the Holy Spirit is boundless and swift to encompass all creatures in grace, and no corruption can take away the fullness of its just integrity. Its path is a torrent, and streams of sanctity flow from it in its bright power, with never a stain of dirt in them; for the Holy Spirit Itself is a burning and shining serenity, which cannot be nullified, and which enkindles ardent virtue so as to put all darkness to flight.

3 In confirmation the Trinity manifests itself by verdant virtues

It has three windows in its summit from which shine so much brilliance that even the roof of the tower, which is constructed like a cone, shows very clearly in its light; for the ineffable Trinity is manifested in the outpouring of the gifts of the power of the Holy Spirit. And from the blessed Trinity so much clarity of justice emanates through the teaching of the apostles that in it the great power of Divinity, which in the height of its omnipotent majesty is incomprehensible, is shown more clearly to mortal creatures, that is, humans. But it can be grasped only as much as possible for the faith of a believing and faithful person.

Hence these windows are adorned all round with beautiful emeralds; for the

VISION FOUR

Trinity is declared openly throughout the world by the verdant virtues and tribulations of the apostles, which are never greeted with arid apathy. How? Because it is known how ravening wolves sought to tear apart the apostles for their faith in the truth, and these various calamities strengthened them for the struggle, so that by fighting they constructed the Church and strengthened her with strong virtues to build up the faith and adorned her with many brilliancies. And because the Church, through the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, has been so strengthened by them, she desires and asks that her children also be adorned in this anointing by the Holy Spirit, Which penetrated the hearts of the faithful in that high and mystical mercy when by the will of God the Father It came into the world in fiery tongues. Therefore, the person who was baptized with the baptism of salvation must also be confirmed by the anointing of that excellent Teacher, as the Church is confirmed on the firm rock.

4 How the Church, fortified by the Holy Spirit, can never fall into error

Hence the tower stands directly in back of the image of the woman described in the previous vision, just as a tower is placed in the wall of a city, so that because of its strength the image cannot fall. For the Holy Spirit has worked marvels in the exceeding strength of Him Who is the true Bridegroom of the Church, and It shows the Church to be so strong in her defenses that, because of the fortitude she derives from Its fiery gift, she can never be thrown down by any error of wickedness. Under heavenly protection she will always rejoice, without spot or wrinkle, in the love of her Bridegroom, because My Only-Begotten was conceived nobly by the Holy Spirit and born without stain of the Virgin, as I said to Moses:

5 Words of Moses on this subject

“Behold, He said, there is a place with Me, and you shall stand upon the rock. And when My glory shall pass by, I will set you in a hole of the rock and protect you with My right hand, until I pass. And I will take away My hand, and you shall see My back parts” [Exodus 33:21-23]. What does this mean? The miracle is at hand that will be fulfilled in My will. But first you will fight with harsh legal precepts whose force is in their outward significance and where you will not find the sweetness and gentleness that will be revealed in My Son. And this harshness of the Law, which by My command you will write down, will stand in hard and stony hearts until you and your followers have shown all the glory that is to be rendered to Me until the coming of My Son. And when this is fulfilled in the Law you are writing, I will be glorified, and I will place you inside the pierced rock. How? I will place you in the hardness of the Law, appointing you to be over it as master of the old times, which will be pierced by My Son, when I send Him into the world at the right time and He expounds it farther than you have in His mystical words. So His strength will protect you, for He will bring words more acute than yours; and He will open the Law's commands that are now closed until He returns to Me. What does this mean?

He, taking on a body from the Virgin, will in that body give words of salvation to the world until in it He passes through death. Then I will take away My hand, when I lift Him up to Me above the stars and lay bare all His mysteries through the Holy Spirit; and thus you will see His Incarnation as a person is seen from the back and not the front, seeing Him when incarnate but not grasping His Divinity. For your children will see him when he returns to Me, more than they understood Him when He lived visibly among them.

6 The baptized are adorned when they are anointed by the bishop

And you see those children who, as mentioned before, had passed through the womb of that image, shining with great brightness. These are they who in the innocence of a clean and pure heart have gained a mother, the Church, in the font of regeneration, as was shown to you before, and are children of light, for their sins are washed away. Some of them are adorned with gold color from their foreheads to their feet; for from their beginning in good works to their end in sanctity, they are adorned with the shining gifts of the Holy Spirit by their anointing with chrism in the true faith at the hand of the bishop. How? Just as gold is adorned by having precious stones set into it, so baptism is adorned with the chrism given to those baptized in faith by the hand of the bishop, as it is written:

7 Words of the Book of Kings on this subject

“The King went over the brook of Cedron, and all the people marched toward the way of the olive trees, which led to the desert” [2 Kings 15:23]. What does this mean? The Son of the Virgin, who rules the whole world like an earthly king, left the people behind and went into the flowing waters of the blessed washing, which by the teaching of the Holy Spirit shows the way of salvation to one of strong desire. What does this mean? Christ left death and crossed over to life, revealing supreme beatitude in the regeneration by the Spirit and water, which are the great ornaments of the celestial Jerusalem, which never ends. Therefore all the people who believed in Him, by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, went by the anointing with oil to the way that had been hidden; and they looked out over the desert of Adam's sin, which bore no trace of the beauty of God's just inheritance, and considered whether or not that way led back to salvation. For the wound of the first man's sin required that he be anointed by the office of the priest; this was not required for the Son of the Virgin, since He was wholly conceived in sanctity and His mother's womb was not wounded or corrupted but remained whole.

But whatever is weakened and confounded by the wounds of the Devil's advice must be strengthened and adorned by the anointing of oil, that the gaping bloody wound of fleshly desire may be wiped clean.

8 Those baptized but not confirmed have light but not adornment

But others, as you see, lack that color and have only the brightness. For, having been cleansed only by the ablution of baptism, they lack the anointing with chrism by the bishop, which is the sign of the ardent Holy Spirit. What does this mean? The anointing with the gifts of the Holy Spirit by confirmation is the special ability of the episcopal office, which is to be done among the faithful after the regeneration of the Spirit and water, to found the believer upon a firm rock. How? My Son received baptism in His body and thus sanctified it by His flesh, which was not divided, for He alone is the Son of the Virgin, and therefore is called the Son of Man, but the Virgin did not conceive him by a man but gave birth to him with unbroken virginity. After the affliction of His Passion and the glory of His Resurrection, in that same flesh He entered Heaven and returned to Me; and then the Holy Spirit illuminated the world in fiery ardor, confirming all justice in the hearts of His disciples and revealing to them what had before been hidden. How?

The Holy Spirit enkindled their hearts as the sun, beginning to appear from around a cloud, shows its burning heat by its shining light. What does this mean? Love of My Son was secretly burning in their minds, and thus the fire of the Holy Spirit passed through them and showed the bright sunlight of their teaching. For this is the testimony the Holy Spirit gave to the Church, that death cannot resist the justice of God.

9 Confirmation should be conferred by bishops alone

Therefore, O children of Truth, hear and understand the confirmation of the Holy Spirit, which He offers you in the sweet unction of His teaching, being Himself the master of all anointing. This anointing, therefore, in honor of the Holy Spirit should be conferred only by the bishop. For every ecclesiastical order is instituted in the Holy Spirit, and therefore this anointing is of the Holy Spirit.

BOOK TWO

Therefore, a person who has received the mystery of regeneration unto life has not taken possession of the fullness of churchly ornaments unless he is anointed in this way, as the Church is adorned by the glorious Holy Spirit. And as the Church is perfected by the gifts of the Holy Spirit, a believer ought to be confirmed by the anointing of the bishop, who is the reverend master in the honor of the Holy Spirit; for the Holy Spirit by Its fire brings forth and kindles sure doctrine in the Christian people.

10 The one confirmed may not marry those who held his hands

Hence those who stood by the one anointed in this unction by the Holy Spirit may not enter into earthly conjugal relations with that person, to whom they are joined in the Holy Spirit. What does this mean? Faith brings a person to this anointing, and the one who then holds his hands symbolizes faith, which does not seek the things of the flesh but always goes toward the things of the spirit. For My eye sees a person as he will be when he comes to Me in his deeds.

11 One who returns to the Devil after baptism is condemned unless he repents

But if, O human, you forsake Me after baptism and return to the Devil, by My just judgment you shall be condemned for it, since I gave you the great gift of intellect and showed you My mercy in the font of baptism. For all who ask for My mercy in baptism will find it freely, for the sake of My Son Who came into the world and endured many labors in the body; therefore, O human, you should patiently endure the conflicts of your soul and body, and for My Son's sake I will receive you.

And no one must be turned away from the washing of baptism if he faithfully seeks it in My name, for I receive a person ardently at whatever time he seeks Me. But if his works thereafter are wicked, they condemn him to death. Therefore, O human, be cleansed in the regeneration of salvation and be anointed in the unction of holiness, and flee death and seek life. For the Church, mother of the faithful, prays constantly that her children may escape death and find life. How? God gave her a voice to supplicate for her children until the full number of them enter the tabernacle of the celestial city. And she has such a voice to tell Me Who am before all ages always to see and think of My Only-Begotten's Incarnation, so that for love of Him I may spare her children, whom she received in the regeneration of the Spirit and water. For unless they are saved they cannot enter the heavenly kingdom.

VISION FOUR

12 Three ways in which the Church resounds like a trumpet

Therefore she cries out, "Fear the Father, love the Son, burn in the Holy Spirit!" How? This cry is given to her by Me the Father in the Son through the Holy Spirit; it is the voice resounding in her like a trumpet in a city. And she speaks in her children no other way than this. Therefore, Omnipotent God is reminded by His Son to spare human sins, which by their penitence can be forgiven without their damnation, because the Son of God took on humanity without sin. Because God is just and the splendor of Heaven is not touched by any unclean stain, He was not clothed with polluted flesh conceived by the seed of sin; and how should Man, stained with immense foulness, enter the Kingdom of Heaven unless through My Son, incarnate without uncleanness? He receives sinners who are purified by penitence; and who could do this except God? Hence the Church too turns back to her children and cherishes them with maternal love.

13 On the many differences among the baptized

And you see that some of these children are looking at a pure and brilliant splendor, but the rest at a turbulent red flash located in the East. This means that among the children of the Church, whom she procreates by the power of God in the innocence of her incorruption, some direct their attention to spiritual purity and shine with serene virtue, treading earthly things underfoot for love of the true Sun; but others have bodily senses that different vices throw into disorder, yet they too burn for the true faith and aspire to eternity for the supernal reward. Of those who are meditating on the pure and brilliant splendor, some have clear eyes and strong feet and are marching forward vigorously in the womb of the image; for when they pursue celestial things they fix their just thoughts on God's commandments and direct their footsteps toward the good end, and thus walk in the close embrace of their mother's love, lessening their devotion neither in temporary nor in eternal things.

But others have weak eyes and crippled feet, for they do not hold to a clear purpose nor a strong performance in the work of perfection. Therefore they are blown here and there by the wind, for they are thrown into unstable conduct by various prideful temptations.

But these have a staff in their hands, and they fly in front of the image and touch it at times, though languidly; for they place obstinate confidence in their works, show themselves to the Church of God with empty pomp, and fatuously attend to her from time to time for reasons of worldly prudence. But when by this false pretense they appear wise in the sight of humans, before God they appear as vainglorious fools.

BOOK TWO

Still others have calm eyes but weak feet, and they move back and forth in the air before the image; the divine commands are known to them through their insight in contemplation, but they are lame in the feet of fulfillment, and thus they appear before the Bride of Christ in restless instability. Seeking wisdom in the dark, and thinking they have it before it has really taken hold on their minds, they derive no power from it.

Others have weak eyes and strong feet, but they walk before the image languidly; for they hold onto a mild inclination toward good works, when they should be advancing more vigorously in deeds of justice, but they do not go in the ways of the Church, for they fix their minds on earthly things more than heavenly. Therefore they are foolish before God, for they wish to grasp by worldly prudence what they cannot attain.

But of the ones who contemplate the turbulent red flash, some are well-ornamented and advance into the image with vigor; for these, though they possess earthly things, carry their beautiful works nonetheless into the very heart of the Church; they do not disdain to set the foot of righteousness in the divine law, but obey God's commandments, and receive strangers, clothe the naked and feed the hungry. Oh, how happy they are, since thus they receive God, and He Himself dwells with them!

But others tear themselves away from her and attack her and break her established rules. They abandon the maternal womb and the sweet nourishment of the Church and trouble her with many errors, and with different oppressions tear to pieces her laws, which God established. Among these, some by the fruit of penitence humbly return to her; for their grave offenses they inflict grave punishments on themselves by doing worthy penance for the restoration of life. But others by obstinacy and neglect remain in the elation of the way of death; for they reject life and receive the judgment of death for their hard hearts and contumacious folly. As Ezekiel says in his mystical vision:

14 Words of Ezekiel

“The King shall mourn, and the prince shall be clothed with sorrow, and the hands of the people of the land shall be troubled. I will do to them according to their way, and I will judge them according to their judgments, and they shall know that I am the Lord” [Ezekiel 7:27]. What does this mean? The soul in which Reason is king, feeling the pleasure of sin at hand, assents to it mournfully because it knows the evil of it. How? Because its reason, wisdom and knowledge are inspired by God; and thus, though the body consents, it finds the evil shameful, knowing that it is not good.

Therefore, when it is polluted with many crimes by the acts of the flesh, it heaves deep sighs and yearns for God. And when in the breath of pride the sinful deed is done, the body is clothed with confusion like an unworthy prince, having exercised its sovereignty in uncleanness; for as a person grieves when clothed in vile garments, so also he is sad when a shameful reputation originates, to his confusion, in himself. Therefore the bad deeds of those prostrate in their evils on the ground will be confounded by heavenly commands, for such do not have the garments of salvation, which is beatitude with God; and evil confusion will possess those who lack this happiness. And so I will deal with them in the road of iniquity in which they stand, honoring the path of sin and putting no justice into their hearts though warned by the Holy Spirit; I will grant them no mercy, because they do not know the good or fear Me, but disdain Me, the Creator of all, with raging wickedness, and do whatever they like.

Therefore I will judge them according to their own judgments, which are the works they desire and do; I will give them no rewards of happiness, but set the punishment of damnation in their way, since they show Me no honor; and they shall know that no one can free them from it except Me, the Lord of all.

But let the one who sees with watchful eyes and hears with attentive ears welcome with a kiss My mystical words, which proceed from Me Who am life.

THE MYSTICAL BODY

VISION FIVE

The Three Orders in the Church

*A*fter this I saw that a splendor white as snow and translucent as crystal had shone around the image of that woman from the top of her head to her throat. And from her throat to her navel another splendor, red in color, had encircled her, glowing like the dawn from her throat to her breasts and shining from her breasts to her navel mixed with purple and blue. And where it glowed like the dawn, its brightness shone forth as high as the secret places of Heaven; and in this brightness appeared a most beautiful image of a maiden, with bare head and black hair, wearing a red tunic, which flowed down about her feet.

And I heard the voice from Heaven saying, "This is the blossom of the celestial Zion, the mother and flower of roses and lilies of the valley. O blossom, when in your time you are strengthened, you shall bring forth a most renowned posterity."

And around that maiden I saw standing a great crowd of people, brighter than the sun, all wonderfully adorned with gold and gems. Some of these had their heads veiled in white, adorned with a gold circlet; and above them, as if sculpted on the veils, was the likeness of the glorious and ineffable Trinity as it was represented to me earlier, and on their foreheads the Lamb of God, and on their necks a human figure, and on the right ear cherubim, and on the left ear the other kinds of angels; and from the likeness of the glorious and supernal Trinity golden rays extended to these other images. And among these people there were some who had miters on their heads and pallia of the episcopal office around their shoulders.

And again I heard the voice from on high, saying, "These are the daughters of Zion, and with them the harps of the harpers and all sorts of musical instruments, and the voice of all gladness, and the joy of joys."

But beneath that splendor, which glowed like the dawn, I saw between Heaven and earth a thick darkness appear, the horror of which exceeded what human tongue can utter.

And again I heard the voice from Heaven saying, "If the Son of God had not suffered on the cross, this darkness would mean that no person could attain celestial glory."

And where the splendor shone, which was mixed with purple and blue, it encircled the woman's image with strong ardor. But another splendor, like a white cloud, decently enveloped that image from the navel down, to the point at which it had not yet grown further. And these three splendors around that image shone afar, showing that within her many steps and ladders were well and properly placed.

And when I saw these things, I was seized with extreme trembling; my strength failed me, and I fell to the ground, unable to speak. And behold! A great splendor touched me like a hand, and I recovered my strength and voice. And from that splendor again I heard a voice, saying;

“These are great mysteries. For consider the sun and the moon and the stars. I formed the sun to give light by day, and the moon and stars to give light by night. The sun symbolizes My Son, Who went forth from My heart and illuminated the world when in the latest times He was born of the Virgin, as the sun goes forth and lights the world when it rises at the end of the night. And the moon symbolizes the Church, betrothed to My Son in true and celestial betrothal. And as the moon is so made that it always increases and decreases, but does not burn of itself unless it is kindled by the light of the sun, so too the Church has a cycle of movement: her children sometimes rise in increase of virtues and sometimes decline by inconstant behavior or harm by outside forces. For she is often assailed in her mysteries by ravening wolves, that is to say malicious people, whether bad Christians or Jews or pagans; and she is not fired to endurance by herself, but lit up by Me through My Son to persevere in good. But the stars, which differ from each other in the brightness of their glory, symbolize the people in the differing religious orders of the Church.”

I Apostles and their followers, the priests, surround the Church with teaching

Thus you see that a splendor white as snow and translucent as crystal shines around the image of that woman from the top of her head to her throat. For the Church, who is the incorrupt Bride, is surrounded by apostolic teaching, which reveals the pure Incarnation of Him Who descended from Heaven into the Virgin's womb and Who is the strong and clear mirror of all the faithful. And this teaching, which shines so brightly around the Church, constantly surrounded her from the start, from the time she first began to be built until she attained the strength to swallow the food of life. How?

The apostolic teaching shone around the head of the Church when the apostles first began to build her up by their preaching; moving through different places, they collected workers who would strengthen her in the Catholic faith and make themselves into priests and bishops and all the ecclesiastical orders, to establish faithfully the rights of men and women who married and all other such institutions. Therefore, the chrism-makers [bishops and priests] conform to that teaching; they are like the priests of the

Testament of the Law, who were appointed to nourish the multitudes with inner food under the law of circumcision. Hence also the apostles chose those orders with which, by heavenly inspiration, they adorned the Church. What does this mean?

That their followers, who took their places, faithfully traverse streets and farms and cities and other places, regions and lands, carrying the health-giving chrisms and announcing the divine law to the people. For they are fathers and stewards, carefully chosen to make church rules known to the people by their teaching and to distribute to them the food of life; and therefore they must show themselves such in their lives that My sheep will not be offended by their works, but walk uprightly after them. For they have this office that they may openly serve the bread of life to the people, and for each one individually set in order the duties of faith; therefore they must so restrain themselves as not to desire carnal union, since they must give the spiritual food to believers and offer to God the spotless sacrifice prefigured in innocent Abel. For of him it is written:

2 Example of Abel

“Abel also offered of the firstlings of his flock, and of their fat.” [Genesis 4:4] What does this mean? That at the beginning of time there shone forth in him, who was innocent in his life, a blessed and kingly manifestation, which by God’s gift touched not earth but Heaven. How? Because Abel in his integrity offered to God the purpose and the full service of his will, resolving in his heart to offer Him the first increase of his substance and successfully doing so, thus honoring the Supreme Father and showing Him proper reverence.

So, as Abel was in charge of his flock, pasturing and guarding it and with simple devotion offering its increase and its fatty nourishment to God, let the aforementioned chrism-makers, who are set over the children of the Church, who are the sheep of Christ, pasture them according to His plan, faithfully nourish them by their words, teaching them the church rules, and protect them forcefully from the snares of the ancient waylayer, and offer gifts from some of them, with sincere reflection, to the Observer of all. How?

If they cannot make them perfect in all respects, let them nonetheless offer to God some fruit that comes from them: first, like the increase of the firstborn of the flock, their good intentions, and then, like the sweet fruit of its fatlings, the perfect work of activity in their will. But why did Abel worship God so devoutly? The fact is that the wholeness of his chastity impelled him to such great devotion.

BOOK TWO

3 The ministers of the Church must keep their chastity

Therefore let those who are appointed by consecration to offer to God the sacred sacrifice approach His altar in the sweetness of chastity. For if they themselves are authors of corruption, how can they offer to others wounded by corruption the hand of salutary healing? And so, that they may be able to give others health-giving remedies with confidence, I will them to imitate My Son most forcefully in love of chastity. But if they should fall, let them hasten to rise immediately by penitence and flee as if naked from the shamefulness of sin; let them seek the wholesome remedy and faithfully follow Abel, whose sacrifice was acceptable to God.

4 Those who live in obedience when unsupervised gain an eternal reward

But those churchmen who enclose themselves in a cloister of obedience and behave according to the ordinances of their superiors, which the latter made by My inspiration, even though they do not have bishops carefully watching over them and do not bear the burden of their anxiety, gain for themselves with those bishops the celestial reward in the city of the chosen, because they subject themselves to their superiors for the sake of eternal reward alone.

5 On the noble and joyous state of perfect virginity

But you see that from her throat to her navel another splendor, red in color, encircles her. This means that after the teaching of the apostles had so invigorated the Church that she could truly discern the saving food and make it the source of her interior strength, there arose the noblest perfection of churchly religion, which tasted heavenly sweetness with burning ardor and stringently restrained itself in order to gird itself with secret power; rejecting the union of human coupling, it avoided the division caused by the bitterness of the flesh. How?

That splendor glows like the dawn from her throat to her breasts; for this perfection arose from the taste of the excitement of miracles and extended in virginal gladness to the sweet nourishment of churchly religion. And it shines from her breasts to her navel mixed with purple and blue; for she fortified herself for the stringency of inner chastity by the noblest training, namely by imitating the Passion of My Son to gain the celestial love He guarded in His heart. Therefore, where it glows like the dawn, its brightness shines forth as high as the secret places of Heaven; for the perfection that flowers in the state of virginity directs its strength not downward toward earthly things, but miraculously upward to what is in Heaven.

6 On the image of the maiden

In this brightness appears a most beautiful image of a maiden, with bare head and black hair. This is serene Virginity, innocent of all foulness of human lust. Her mind is unbound by any shackle of corruption, but is not yet perfectly able to bar troubled and dark thoughts from the minds of her children, as long as they are in the world; but she forcefully resists and opposes such thoughts.

Therefore she wears a red tunic, which flows down about her feet; for she perseveres toward the goal of widest and most blessed perfection by the sweat of her labor in virtuous works, surrounded with the variety of virtues and imitating Him Who is the plenitude of sanctity. She is also, as is shown you in this hidden and supernal light, the noble daughter of the celestial Jerusalem, the glory and honor of those who have shed their blood for love of virginity or in radiant humility preserved their virginity for the sake of Christ and died sweetly in peace. For she was betrothed to the Son of Almighty God, the King of all, and bore Him a noble brood, the elect choir of virgins, when she was strengthened in the peace of the Church.

7 The throng that stands around that maiden

And around that maiden you see standing a great crowd of people, brighter than the sun, all wonderfully adorned with gold and gems. This is to say that noble Virginity is surrounded and ardently embraced by a wonderful crowd of virgins. They all shine before God more brightly than the sun does on the earth; for they have conquered themselves and bravely trodden death underfoot in the glorious works they have humbly performed for Christ, and so are adorned beautifully with the highest wisdom. Some of them have their heads veiled in white, adorned with a gold circlet; for, shining in the glory of virginity, they indicate that those who seek its rank should veil their minds from harmful heat all around, and grasp the purity of innocence which is adorned with the beautiful splendor of chastity.

Above them, as if sculpted on the veils, is the likeness of the glorious and ineffable Trinity as it was represented to you earlier; which shows that these people's minds firmly and strongly uphold the honor of the celestial and glorious Trinity, Which was truly shown you before in a mystery, by their knowledge of love and steadfast chastity.

On their foreheads is the Lamb of God, and on their necks a human figure, and on the right ear cherubim, and on the left ear the other kinds of angels; which declares that in their reverent chastity they will imitate the mildness of the Son of God, laying aside stiffnecked wantonness and knowing themselves to be frail humans. In prosperity they will listen to and embrace true and unfailing knowledge; at the approach of adversity they will listen for angelic aid. So from the likeness of the glorious and supernal Trinity golden rays extend to these other images, for the ineffable Trinity unceasingly works the miracles of Its profound wisdom among the faithful who seek virtue and flee the seductions of the Devil.

BOOK TWO

And among these people there are some who have miters on their heads and pallia of the episcopal office around their shoulders. For among those who flourish in the honor of virginity there are some in the celestial city who ably held the rank of the ancient fathers and the glory of higher offices in the world, yet did not lose the ornament of virginity. Hence, as you hear, all those who in their desire kept their integrity for the sake of celestial love are called "daughters of Zion" in the celestial habitations; for in their love of virginity they imitated My Son, Who is the flower of virginity. Therefore the sounding echoes of the blessed spirits and the outpouring of voices and the winged decorations of happy minds and the golden vision of shining stones and jewels are all with them. How? Because the Son of God grants them this, that a sound goes forth from the Throne in which the whole choir of virgins joins in singing with great desire and harmonizing in the new song, as John, the beloved virgin, testifies, saying:

8 Words of John

"And they sang, as it were, a new song before the throne, and before the four living creatures and the ancients" [Revelation 14:3]. What does this mean? In those faithful ones who embrace chastity for a good purpose and preserve their virginity unstained for love of God, good will bursts forth wonderfully in praise of their Creator. How? In the dawn-light of virginity, which always surrounds the Son of God, steadfast praise is hidden; no worldly office and no tie of the law can resist it, and it sings in the voice of exultation a celestial song to the glory of God. How?

That song, which was not heard before the Only-Begotten of God, the true flower of virginity, returned in the body from earth to Heaven and sat again on the right hand of the Father, has a swift course and makes itself heard wonderfully in new liberty. And, since new customs, which have not been seen before, are regarded with amazement when they are seen, this new and unheard-of mystery resounded in Heaven in honor of virginity, before the majesty of God (for God could do this) and before the four wheels that rolled into the four corners of the earth bearing the truth of justice and the humanity of the Savior like the living creatures in the new Law, and before those ancients who were imbued with the Holy Spirit and showed the path of righteousness to the people under the old Law. Why is this? Because God by the new grace softened the rigor of the old institution.

9 Virginitv offered to God must be carefully preserved

But since virginity is so glorious before God, those who have offered it to God of their own will must carefully preserve it; for this holy purpose, undertaken with great devotion to virginity, must be faithfully kept. So let those who have undertaken this mystery take care not to fall back. For when they offer themselves to God, not joined by any bond of marriage or burdened by any secular business but spurning carnal coupling and desiring to cleave to the glorious innocence of the innocent Lamb, they are beloved imitators of My Son.

So a man who decides in his mind not to join himself to any rib, but wants to persevere in the modesty of virginity for love of My Son, will become his companion, if he perseveres in the works of chastity; for he has offered these holy gifts to My Son for the glory of a heavenly reward by the vow of a most sacred pact of churchly religion.

But if he then breaks this pact because of an evil stinging of his flesh and commits adultery, he reduces his liberty to servitude, for by his shameful pleasure he has wickedly brought low his head when he ought to have chastely imitated My Son; and he has uttered a lie, vowing to live chastely and not fulfilling it. Therefore, if he perseveres in his rash fault he will undergo the strict judgment of the Just Judge, for no shame or lie can appear in celestial glory.

But if before his death the man does penance for his guilt with bitter tears, My Son's flowing blood will receive him, since he abhors his sin; but this does not place him back among his companions who shine with the glory of integrity, for he has deserted their society, casting away the liberty of his pact and reducing it to the slavery of sin.

10 She who breaks the vow of virginity will be not a lady but a handmaid

And a maiden who of her own will is betrothed in holiness to My Son is becomingly received by Him, for He wishes to have her united with Him in companionship. How? That she may embrace Him with chaste love, and He may love her in secret; for to Him she is always lovable, since she seeks Him rather than an earthly bridegroom. But if she then transgresses this pact, she is polluted in the sight of those who are in celestial joy; and if she perseveres in this rashness, by just judgment she will be deprived of heavenly glory. But if she repents, she will be received as a handmaid and not as a lady, since she has deserted her royal betrothal and loved another more than Him she should have loved. And let him who seduced and violated her, if he wants to atone for his guilt, repent as if he had broken open Heaven; only thus will he escape the condemnation of death, for he rashly violated a heavenly betrothal. What does this mean?

BOOK TWO

II Illustration of this issue

If some great ruler had a bride exceedingly dear to him, who was adulterously corrupted by a servant of his servants, what would that lord do? He would certainly send his army to destroy him in greatest wrath, since this man had struck him to the very viscera. But if this servant, fearing the army, should beg his master to intercede for him, and fall at his feet with tears to ask him to spare him, then that king would suffer him to live because of his own goodness and the other's petition, and restore him to the society of his fellow-servants. But he would not reward him like his close and familiar friends, even though he did show him the favor he deserved among his fellow-servants of the same rank. So it will be for one who seduces and violates a bride of the eternal King. For that King, issuing His judgments in righteous zeal, will send him to perdition, because in this deed he disregarded Him and held Him in scorn.

But if the wretch, looking forward in fear to that day of wrath, humbly begs God's elect to ask pardon for him from the Lord and tearfully contemplates the Humanity of his Savior until he is absolved from sin by His grace, then the King, mindful of the blood that was shed for the redemption of the human race, and for love of the citizens of Heaven, will save him from his guilt and from the power of the Devil and accord him the salvation of the blessed so that he will not go to perdition. But He will not adorn him in the dance of the royal wedding, at which the other friends of God will rejoice with those sacred virgins who in celestial betrothal are dedicated to My Son; just as He will not crown with the rank of virginity one who has lost the modesty of virginity, even though He grants him with His other elect joy in the celestial city and an inestimable reward.

12 The great difference between celestial desire and earthly lust

But beneath that splendor, which glows like the dawn, you see between Heaven and earth a thick darkness appear, the horror of which exceeds what human tongue can utter. This is to say that under the glory of virginity, the fall of our first parent openly stands between the spiritual and the carnal intellect; and that fall was the darkest shadow of unfaithfulness, so that no person could expound its terror. Why?

VISION FIVE

Because in the Incarnation of the Son of God, born of the Virgin, celestial desire was supreme and earthly lust was lacking; so Adam's transgression was miraculously remade into salvation by the blood of the Son of God; not earlier, since no other but the Only-Begotten of God, sent into the world by the Father, could cancel that transgression and permit entry into Heaven. Therefore, as you hear in this vision, unless the Son of God had shed His blood for human salvation, that transgression would have weighed Man down so much that he could not have attained to the joy of the citizens of Heaven.

13 On monks who enter into monastic profession

And where the splendor shines, which is mixed with purple and blue, it encircles the woman's image with strong ardor. This symbolizes the perfection of those who imitate the Passion of My Son in the ardor of their love and strongly adorn the Church with their self-restraint. How? Because they are the high building of the growing treasury of the divine counsel. For when the Church was invigorated and grew stronger, to increase her beauty there came forth a living fragrance [monks], vowing the way of secret regeneration [making monastic profession]. What does this mean? That there then arose the wonderful order, which attained to My Son in the beauty of His example; for as My Son came into the world separated from the common people, so this army lives in the world separated from the rest of the people. This people first arose in the desert and in hiding, as balsam sweetly oozes from the tree, and then grew into a great multitude, as the tree extends its branches. And I blessed and sanctified this people, for they are to Me the lovely flowers, roses and lilies, which grow in the fields without human labor; for no law constrains these people to desire such a narrow way, but they undertake it of their own will without any legal command, as I inspire them, and do more than they are told to. Therefore, they gain a very great reward from Me, as is written in the Gospel, where the Samaritan brought that wounded man to an inn:

14 Words of the Gospel

"And the next day he took out two pence and gave them to the innkeeper, and said, 'Take care of him, and whatever you spend over and above this, I will repay you when I return' " [Luke 10:35]. What does this mean? On the first day of salvation, that is, when the miraculously incarnate Son of God was abiding in the world in His body and until His resurrection, He performed in His Humanity many marvellous works, by which He wholesomely brought the wounded man to true remedies. But the next day, that is, after His resurrection, when all the mysteries of truth had been openly given to the Church, He figuratively offered the New and Old Testaments as a sure proof of eternal life and a sweet food for the believing people.

BOOK TWO

And He gave these writings by His grace to the pastors of the Church, who keep His flock; and He said to them with sweet admonition, "Use churchly rules to look after the company of Christians redeemed in My blood, which I have entrusted to you, taking care that they do not err or lack in what pertains to life. But whatever you may add in your goodwill to what I have ordered you to keep, doing more than is commanded of you, I your Leader and Savior, who now leave the world and ascend to the Father but will return to judge the world and establish it forever, with no wearing away through the passage of time, will then repay you for your labor and your goodwill, with added fruits. And I will say to you 'O faithful and righteous servant, who has ministered faithfully!' Whoever willingly adds more than the Law commanded him will receive a twofold reward; for I hold him glorious in My name, since he has loved Me greatly." And I say:

15 The orders of virgins and monks are not found in the precepts of the Law

Neither the race of virgins nor this singularly devoted order, nor those who imitate them, such as desert hermits, are commanded by the Law; as the prophets too were not appointed by people under the laws of the flesh, for they arose imbued only by My inspiration. But they do more than was commanded them, which priests and those pertaining to their order do not, for these things were commanded by Abraham and Moses in the Old Testament, and the apostles took them from the Law, set them up in My will by the Holy Spirit and handed them on to be kept by the Church. And the same apostolic teaching was set forth in the Gospel by My Son, when His disciples were sent out to spread abroad the words of truth to the whole world.

What then? As the apostles announced the way of salvation to the people, the bright dawn of the daughters of Zion arose in the love of My Son, that is, the dawn of those who strongly repressed their flesh and harshly mortified their evil desires. And as this chaste virginity followed My Son in ardent love, that singularly devoted order greatly pleasing to Me also imitated His Incarnation. These are My true temples, where I am worshipped as if by choirs of angels; they bear in their bodies the Passion and death and burial of my Only-Begotten, not in that they die by the sword or other human terrors, but in that they imitate My Son by renouncing the will of their own flesh, separating themselves from all worldly things and ornaments in which the world rejoices. Which is written in the Gospel about John, the lamp of the world:

16 Example of John the Baptist

“And the same John had a garment of camel’s hair and a leathern girdle about his loins” [Matthew 3:4]. What does this mean? Divine grace had woken miraculous abstinence in him, and by that grace he had a defense of his virtue, for in his mind he had despised honor and earthly riches, and in his body he had tamed the wanton urges through the restraints that, to mortify vice, he had put on the pleasures of the flesh. For, advancing through hard and rough ways and trampling down earthly lust, he built greater towers of virtue than his predecessors. How?

Because, vigorously performing many works of virtue, he ardently loved chastity and showed the way of healing to those who devotedly sought it. Therefore, all monks who make profession should follow John in his way of life, who shone by his lofty works of blessed virtue amid the great darkness of the world; they should flee from the meaningless expanse of worldly things, restrain their wandering minds and so force their bodies to renounce evil desire. Thus they will outshine by more excellent means those who before their time walked simply in the way of the Lord and made their simple habitations; they will take the steep and narrow path by firmly treading underfoot those things that are the pleasures of the world. How? Because, despising themselves and subjecting their bodies to the service of Christ in the work of the virtues, they will shun wantonness by austere behavior and so shine brightly for others by their good examples. For they faithfully imitate the angelic choir. How? By renouncing worldly things; for, as the angels do not seek or long for the things of earth, these people follow them miraculously in despising all fleeting things.

17 Monks for the needs of the Church may take Church offices

So as My Son brings the message of the healthful sacraments, and is the Priest of priests and the Prophet of prophets and the builder of blessed towers, if a necessity arises a monk who is firmly rooted and competent for it may be a messenger and priest, prophet and counselor of the Church. He is not to be kept away from these offices, as long as his sight is clear and he does not slumber at his churchly duty but attends to his teaching; he must only reject being occupied by secular business and its contagion. For neither angels nor priests nor prophets will hide God’s justice, but will make it known in truth from His precepts; as in the Gospel it is written again of John, whose austerity they follow, that he was not a reed shaken in the wind.

BOOK TWO

18 Words of the Gospel concerning John

“And all the country of Judea went out to him, and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and they were baptized by him in the river Jordan, confessing their sins” [Mark 1:5]. What does this mean? They, whose hearts had been struck by fear of death and love of life, went out with sighs and groans from the pleasures of vice to him who had the divine grace to do everything for them, by means of simple confession from their devoted wills and visions of peace. How? Because John, the forerunner of the Truth, conveyed to them both bitterness and sweetness. Therefore they entreated from his rectitude an outpouring of penance, so that, by avoiding evil deeds and doing good ones and confessing their crimes, they might deserve to reach Him Who would confer on them true salvation in the light of the New Testament instead of the remedy in the shadow of the Old. And just as John taught those who came to him and baptized them in the river after receiving their words of repentance in honor of the Savior to come, so now, in the name of the Savior Who has come and brought salvation to the faithful, let those who add shining works to the testimony of sanctification not neglect to do so. Inspired by the Holy Spirit, let them reach new heights of austerity in renouncing worldly things, following the model they adopted when they listened to that testimony and put on the new man through the regeneration of the Spirit and water, rejecting the service of the Devil. And, when necessity impels, let them offer the hand of assistance to those who ask, admonishing, uplifting and healing; and if they have worthily attained an office by churchly promotion, let them faithfully imitate their Forerunner, so as truly to complete in the new light what he showed in the shadow.

For the monks are the girdle of the Church and strongly encircle her, since they are concerned with My Son's Incarnation and also exercise the function of the angels; that is, they do not cease at any hour to sing melodiously or pray in compunction, with the freshness of remorse and not with the useless dry dust of noisy cries, and they do not seek to handle worldly things but examine themselves thoroughly with charity and humility.

Oh, these are My strong and loving people, for in them I contemplate the sufferings that My Son underwent in the flesh; and they die His death, when they forsake their own will and submit to obedience for the sake of eternal life, walking in the commands of their superiors.

19 The monks' unique garment symbolizes Christ's Incarnation and burial

Therefore their garment is unlike that of other people, for it symbolizes the incorrupt Incarnation of My Son, which is completely different from the procreation of other people. For the command of the Law concerning men and women did not touch the Incarnation, in the same way that no written law obliges these people to their strictness of life; though one who undertakes it with a vow by his own will for the love of God should persevere in it, lest he recoil and fall, like Lucifer who forsook light and went into darkness.

And this garment flies with wings of subtlety like the glitter of supernal spirits, and points to the Incarnation and burial of My Son; for one who gives himself up to strictest obedience has on his garment the sign of My Son's Incarnation, and one who renounces secular business for the works of justice has on his garment the sign of My Son's burial. Hence one who by purity of will is clothed in this garment is uplifted by a heathful remedy.

And therefore, let one who receives it with blessings and the invocation of the Holy Spirit not renounce it; for he who despises it in persistent and evil rejection will be with the one who spurned the order of angels and was entombed in death. What does this mean? These people are not spurred on by any precept of the Law to their strictness of life, but have undertaken to observe My pact of their own will and thus make My Church illustrious by the holiness of their ways. How? This order rose after the apostles' preaching as the sun rises after the first light of day. What does this mean?

20 Benedict, who is a second Moses, made this order a separate way

The first light of day designates the faithful words of the apostolic teaching; the dawn, the beginning of this way of life, which following that teaching first came about in solitude and in caves; but the sun symbolizes the separate and well-disposed way I then brought about through My servant Benedict, whom I passed by in burning fire, teaching him to honor the Incarnation of My Son in the garment of his way of life, and imitate His Passion in the abnegation of his will. For Benedict is like a second Moses, lying in the cleft of the rock and tormenting and repressing his body with great harshness for the love of life, as the first Moses wrote on the stone tablets at My command and gave the Jews a Law that was harsh and hard. But as My Son penetrated that same Law with the sweetness of the Gospel, so also My servant Benedict by the sweetness of the Holy Spirit's inspiration made the plan of this order a separate and level path, which before him was an exceedingly hard way of life. And he gathered together by it large numbers for his order, as My Son, through the sweetness of His fragrance, gathered to Himself the Christian people.

And so then the Holy Spirit spoke in the hearts of His elect who sighed for life, telling them that as in the washing of baptism the crimes of the peoples are washed away, so they themselves should renounce the pomps of the world as a sign of the Passion of My Son. How? Because in holy baptism a person is converted from the power of the Devil and rejects his old stains of sin, and thus these too should reject earthly business by the sign of their garment, which is also an angelic sign. How? Because by My will they are appointed protectors of the people.

21 For Church necessities a proven monk may receive priesthood

For this reason, those of them who are found proven in their holy way of life may be established as pastors of My Church, as the angels, who are touched by no stain from earthly affairs, are the guardians of My people. For, as the angels hold before God a twofold rank, so the people of this religious order live in a twofold life. How? The angels in the heavenly places serve God without interruption, and on earth continually protect people from the snares of the Devil. So these people imitate the angelic order when they despise earthly things and serve God daily, and also defend all other people from evil spirits day and night by their prayers. Therefore, if My Church does not have a fitting pastor, let the people of this religious order come to her aid, crying out and weeping; and let the one among them who is found proven defend her with vigorous zeal, receiving priesthood too if necessary.

22 No one should undertake this order without being very closely examined

But no one should undertake the religious life of this order suddenly and as if just waking from a dream, but let him first be tested with close examination as to the self-control of his mind, and whether he can persevere in this purpose; for if he were to undertake it by his own will in the pact of blessing and later in perverse error renounce it and impenitently mock Me, he would perish miserably in the condemnation of death. Therefore, O my dearest children, who are so scattered by opposition, rise up quickly in humility and charity, and manfully and unanimously consent to your holy purpose.

23 Secular people who keep God's laws greatly adorn the Church

But, as you see, another splendor, like a white cloud, decently envelops that image from the navel down, to the point at which it has not yet grown further. This is the secular life, which with pure and calm purpose surrounds the Church with reverence and renders her just assistance, from the fullness of her growing strength until the point past which she has not yet developed in her children. How? Because what lies closest to the navel is the womb, from which the whole human race is procreated. Therefore this refers to the secular people in the Church, through whom she must be brought to the full number of her orders, for here are gathered kings and dukes, princes and rulers, and their subjects, rich and poor, and the destitute living among the others. And by all these the Church is exceedingly adorned, for when lay-people faithfully observe the Law of God, which is laid down for them, they beautify the Church greatly; when they obey their superiors with sincere humility and devotion, and chastise their bodies for God's love by alms and vigils and continence and widowhood and other good works that are of God, they embrace God with many embraces. Therefore they who keep the law appointed for them by My will are most lovable to Me.

VISION FIVE

24 Married people cannot become monastics unless both agree to do it

If any layperson desires to renounce worldly things to bear the yoke of My liberty, let him come to Me quickly, unless he is in the bonds of a fleshly union. This tie he may not rashly loose unless his consort wills it. How? Husband may not leave wife and wife may not leave husband for this purpose unless it is the will of both, and they both decide either to remain in the world or to separate from the world; for it cannot be that a whole person can remain well if one foot remains with his body and the other is cut off from it. So it is not fitting for a husband to worship the world while his wife deserts the world, or for a wife to reside in the world while her husband flees the world, if they wish to have glory in celestial life; for if this is done indiscreetly and foolishly, it will be called a robbery rather than an offering. So let those who are legally joined in a fleshly union live together with one mind, and not foolishly separate from each other without a dispensation or declaration from Church authority, as is written again in the Gospel:

25 Words of the Gospel

"What therefore God has joined together, let not Man put asunder" [Matthew 19:6]. What does this mean? God, creating the human race, took flesh out of flesh and joined them in a union, and thus established that this connection must not hastily be broken. How? Because in the union of man and woman flesh will be united to flesh and blood to blood by a legal ceremony, so that they cannot be divided from each other in foolish haste, unless both dissolve the bond for a just cause or a rightful devotion; for God in His secret wisdom graciously formed this union of male and female for the propagation of people. And because He so rightly constituted this union, foolish human desire should not cause a breach between the two parts, and neither part should take the dowry of its blood to an alien place; for, as God commanded that people should not slay each other, He also commanded that they should not divert their blood from its rightful place by cruel fornication.

BOOK TWO

Therefore, let people repress the ardor of their longing and not transmit their flame to an alien fire. For if an ardent will takes hold of the will of another and stirs it up to fervent lust for a stronger or weaker reason, the two will coalesce into one by the first person's mental desire and the other's consent to be embraced by it. For the sight of the outer eye makes the inner heat burst into flame. And even if the one body does not sin with the other, the living will still makes them burn, so that all their viscera are shaken by their feelings. Therefore, let the outer person be guarded with such caution that the inner person may never be wounded by carelessness.

26 These orders consolidate the Church in their ranks and degrees

And you see that these three splendors around that image shine afar; which is to say that these three institutions surround and consolidate the blessed Church in a wondrous way in honor of the heavenly Trinity, causing her to burst forth with buds and spread out with blessed verdure. Therefore they show that within her many steps and ladders are well and properly placed. These are the various orders of laypeople and religious, in which the Church by good habits and the practice of virtue guides her children, educated in sweet reverence, to Heaven. How? When they spurn earthly things and love celestial ones. What does this mean? When they faithfully fulfil in divine love the precepts instituted for them.

27 Each order must avoid diversity, singularity and novelty in way of life

But as in three Persons there is one God, so in these three orders there is one Church, founded by Him Who has planted all good things. For whatever He has not planted will not be able to stand. And thus those institutions He has not instituted will fall into great errors. How? Those institutions that in haughty pride seek to ascend and do not wish to be subject to those higher than they were not planted by God. And this happens when a lesser order strives to raise itself above a greater one, which was constituted by My will on the ancient counsel of the first Fathers; and when it tries in its madness to appear more important by distinctive signs in its vestments; as if the order of angels tried to raise itself above the order of archangels. What would this mean? That they were nil and useless, since with vain ideas they tried to divide the orders duly constituted by God. But this should not be.

So it is not fitting that I should be invoked by those who, with a mania for diversity, always wish for a new purpose, and who, not knowing their own minds, leave the well-trodden path and the well-plowed ground of the early Fathers, who were inspired by the Holy Spirit. Many of these, in the greatness of their pride, forsake the established ordinances that the Church has from the early Fathers, and make schisms in their various institutions. And they wish in their wanderings to be called fruitful trees, but they cannot even be called empty reeds, as is shown by the beloved John, who writes about those who wither in apathy and are cut off:

28 Words of John

“I know your works, that you are neither cold nor hot. I would you were cold or hot! But because you are lukewarm and neither cold nor hot, I will spew you out of my mouth” [Revelation 3:15–16]. What does this mean? O fools, who are shamefully withering up inside, I Who am the Knower of Secrets see with the eye of knowledge the works of your desires; you have not fled utterly from the works of the fire of the fiery Enlightener, and yet you have not renounced the works that produce the ice of frigid stiffness. How? You are not entirely given over to works of cold evil, and you are not entirely burning for good deeds, but you waver toward each in the instability of your mind, like a lukewarm wind; and you do not think either about the deserved punishments of evil or about the worthy rewards of good. How? Because you look into such a deep abyss that you cannot find its bottom, but you also give your attention to such a high mountain that you cannot scale its summit.

Oh, how much better it would be for you to know yourself as an unprofitable servant and a sinner, rather than remaining in lukewarmness and hardly glancing at what is right. For if you were separated from good actions you would know yourself to be a sinner, and if you withdrew yourself from evil works you would have some hope of life. But now you are like a lukewarm wind, which gives neither moisture nor heat to the fruits. For you are one who begins, but not one who finishes; you touch the beginning of good, but you never feed on its perfection, like the wind that blows around a person's mouth and not the food that reaches his stomach. Which is more precious, an empty noise or a finished work? Of course a finished work is more acceptable than an empty noise.

Work, then, in the silence of humility, and do not puff yourself up with pride; for anyone who forsakes the holy society of My docile and loving servants, and undertakes with eager boasting a work he disdains to complete with sweet mildness, will be counted as nothing.

But if you begin in rectitude to try to penetrate the meaning of My words, which offer food to the faithful, but are then sluggish in them and show no sweetness of justice to those you encounter, and so fall to worse things, I will begin to cast you out by that same meaning of My words for your lukewarm negligence. For you show no savor of sweetness in doing your works and do not pant after the blessed reception of inner gifts. And, being so cast out, you will be trodden underfoot, like food that is so insipid in taste that a person spits it out of his mouth before it can reach his stomach. But what now?

The wind blows, and its noise resounds, but it puts forth no flower from its roots nor reproduces itself. For they, who should be under My yoke, are willful and undisciplined. What does this mean? They neglect the right path and make themselves useless tabernacles. For such people, who are sluggish inside and have no fervor for justice, neither burn for the laws set up for them nor follow the way of life of their fathers before them; but each of them nurtures some singularity in himself and lays down laws for himself according to his own will, and so in wavering thoughts and inflated pride raises himself up to fly. And, since they do not keep to the righteous pact of their fathers, they are always new and unskilled, and they wander here and there in great instability, following their own will.

29 Analogy of a craftsman

Therefore I compare them to stupid craftsmen who are building a large building, yet do not follow the wisdom of previous craftsmen who are well-trained in the use of their tools and knowledgeable about how to plan and raise a building; but they carelessly and foolishly trust in themselves, wanting to excel others in wisdom, and build their buildings such that they will be shaken by storms and thrown down by the winds. For they will not be built on rock, but on sand.

And thus do those who trust to themselves in their pride and seek to seem wiser than the early Fathers; they do not want to walk according to their covenant, but lay down shaky laws for themselves at their own will, and thus, leaning not on Christ but on their own unstable conduct, they are often stirred up to sin by the temptations of the Devil.

30 The institution of his predecessors suffices for one who is humble

Therefore, lest the breath of the Holy Spirit, which suffused the early Fathers, be expelled by these people's swelling pride, I desire the faithful person to be humble and content with what his predecessors instituted for him. For if he should vainly will more than he ought humbly to seek, he might later grow lukewarm and draw back from it and be shamefully confounded, as it is written in the Gospel:

31 Words of the Gospel on this subject

“When you are invited to a wedding, do not take the first place, lest one more honorable than you should be invited, and he that invited you both should come and say to you, ‘Give this man place’; and you with shame must go and take the last place” [Luke 14:8-9]. What does this mean? When you are told by divine inspiration that because of your faithful labors you are summoned to that holy tabernacle that flourishes in a bridal way of life, unceasingly rejoicing with purity and honor and holiness in the virginal branch and in the blessed Mother the Church, with no sadness of corruption or confusion or degradation of the bud or the flower, then curb your mind in humility and do not uplift it in pride. How?

When for love of God you free your body from earthly affairs, you will grow as a beautiful flower, blossoming and never withering in the heavenly Jerusalem with the Son of God, in Whom are all ornaments for souls; for the old person produces all human abominations, but the new builds all the holiness of virtue. So when you have come to such holiness, blush to imitate the ancient serpent, who cast himself out of the place of beatitude because he was hungry for vainglory. What does this mean? If you see anyone better adorned than you, do not in eagerness of mind ascend above him, saying, “I want to be above him or like him!” If you exalt yourself so, are you a faithful servant, since you are provoking the Lord to anger by opposing yourself to Him? But if you see that someone has stronger resources than you, and out of envy disparage him, you are not walking in the plain road but going by trackless ways.

So be eager to serve God in humility and do not give yourself up madly to pride; and do not exalt yourself in vain pretense over one who, if assessed justly, shines with a greater desire of eternal life than you burn with yourself, and who for his heavenly ardor is invited to the height of blessedness by Him Who loves all lovers of truth. For if you do, He Who by His inspiration summoned you to the service of humility and the other to the gift of charity may come with the eye of knowledge and judge you with His righteous judgment, saying, “You lifted yourself up in eager pride to a place for which you are not fit; leave your vainglory and submit in duty, and give this beloved one of mine the place of honor you so rashly seized!” And what will become of you then?

If you are overthrown in this way, in anguish of grief and sadness you will begin to feel extreme dejection and abhor yourself as contemptible; for the Protector of souls will take from you the honor you usurped when you opposed yourself to Him and tried to seize what was not yours to have. So what you wanted will be taken from you, and what you did not want will be given to you. And so also when a lesser order exalts itself over a greater one it will be suppressed, overthrown by My just judgment, for I do not wish that pride to be anything but thrown down and confounded. For if a handmaid exalts herself above her mistress, she will be despised the more by all who see her, for she tried to become what she should not have desired.

32 The Gospel on those who make laws after their own hearts

Therefore, those who make laws for themselves according to their own hearts, not seeking My will, fail rather than go forward, as My Son testifies in the Gospel, saying, "Every plant which My Heavenly Father has not planted will be rooted up" [Matthew 15:13]. What does this mean? That every offshoot of the knowledge of heart, mind or conduct will be destroyed if, arising out of the fecundity of human nature, it is so sown in a person that he burns to unite himself with a willful desire; and if it is then changed into mental pride or carnal wantonness or overflowing pollution or self-excuse for sin or changeful actions that rush up and down without examining whether they are useful or useless. It will be destroyed by just judgment, for truly My Father in Heaven, who dwells in justice, has not planted this plant; it will be uprooted and wither, because it thrives not on the dew of Heaven but on the moisture of the flesh. How? Because the person has done the deed in foolish knowledge, wishing not to contemplate the justice and will of his Creator but to look to the one who tirelessly spins the wheel of his body.

For what seems good to people who have not fixed their eye sharply on God will prove ruinous unless it is warmed by the breath of the Holy Spirit, for it will have changed into vainglory. For when vain people are afflicted by boredom, they will often revert to vainglory, sometimes uplifting themselves to pride, pretense and jealousy of spirit, and sometimes tearing themselves to pieces in annoyance, disdain and opposition to institutions that came from Me; and also discouraging each other from doing good things, which spring not from apathetic boredom but from the ardor of desire to make daily progress.

For what flows from Me is a sweet and delightful taste to the soul; it goes forward in perseverance and does not look back in indecision. Therefore, blessed is the one who, confiding in Me, puts his hope and the beginning and end of his works not in himself but in Me. He who does these things shall not fall; but he who tries to stand without Me will go to ruin. And who does the latter? Those who vaingloriously embrace novelty and, bored with My precepts, trust in themselves. But though an old garment is vexa-tious to human minds, I in My gifts must not be spurned, for in their simplicity they are always new, and the older they are the more precious they are.

VISION FIVE

Hence those things people devise themselves without My inspiration in the vanity of their habits will melt away amid their vain exertions. And though these things in human eyes may sometimes seem to last, I reject them from My sight and hold them as nothing, as it is written in the Gospel:

33 Further words of the Gospel

“Let them alone, for they are blind leaders of the blind. And if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch” [Matthew 15:14]. What does this mean? Allow perverse livers to dissipate themselves in perversity, for they refuse to correct themselves by righteousness of works. And because in their own estimation they call themselves just, when in their actions they are vain, they become blind from their very qualities, disdaining to walk in the way of justice and proposing to those who follow them in bad deeds the way of iniquity instead of truth. So they who have not the right vision of justice think they are just when they are unjust, and when they show the path of false justice to people ignorant of the road of true doctrine, they fall into the ditch of despair, because neither they nor their followers know where they are going.

34 God casts down some innovators and leaves others whom He will judge later

And in these cases I sometimes in My wrath cast down innovations in the sight of humanity; but in My foreseeing vision I silently tolerate others in human sight for a while, which I will nonetheless do justice on in future by the weighing of My just judgment. Therefore, let one who is faithful yearn to ascend to the height of virtue, not to descend to the depths of worldliness. How?

35 One may go from a lower to a higher degree but not from higher to lower

One who is in a lower degree can ascend to a higher, but one who is in a higher degree should not descend to a lower. What does this mean? Counts can rise to be dukes, and dukes can rise to be kings, but it is not fitting that kings should descend to be dukes or dukes stoop to be counts. For if kings subjected themselves to dukes and dukes submitted to counts, all the people would shout, “Wach!” and hold them in derision.

BOOK TWO

Thus laypeople can enter the order of priests and bishops, and these clerics can join those who have taken vows as monks; but it is not fitting that vowed monks should go over to the order of clerics, or that clerics should rush back to the laity. And if monks go to be clerics, or clerics return to the laity, the souls of the just will say of them, "Alas, alas, alas!" and they will be rejected in My sight unless they turn to fitting penance; for if a higher rank falls upon a lower one, both will be destroyed.

So will it be for those who leave the right path and go backward. For if one has put on My Son, what other son His equal could he put on? None, and truly none. But rejoice in your Father; for often I find the greater people in the lower ranks and the lesser in the higher, since pride falls and humility ascends.

36 Example of souls and angels

Therefore have peace and charity and humility among you, as the souls of the just have with the angels and the angels with the archangels. For the souls of the just do not envy the office of the angels, and the angels are not angry at the glory of the archangels. Why is this? Archangels point out the greatest things in the greatest times of necessity, and the angels announce lesser things in the normal course of events, while the faithful people humbly obey. Therefore, let each fulfil his office faithfully. How?

Let those who are vowed monks, like the archangels, renew their powerful assistance whenever there is a great occasion of necessity in the Church; and let those who have the office of clerics, like the angels, do their business in the daily life of their institution; and let people who want to attain to supreme beatitude faithfully receive their words. How?

37 Monks symbolize grain, clerics fruit and laypeople meat

Because they who are vowed monks are like grain, which is the strong, dry food of humans; so this people of Mine is bitter and harsh to the taste of the world. And the clerics are like fruits, sweet to the taste, and show themselves sweet to people by the usefulness of their office. And the common laypeople are like meat, but meat comes partly from chaste birds; thus those who live in the world according to the flesh have children, but among them are found followers of chastity, such as widows and the continent, who fly to heavenly desires by their appetite for virtue.

38 These three churchly institutions take two separate paths

But these churchly ranks live in two ways. How? Of spiritual and secular people. How? Like day and night. What does this mean? Spiritual people are like the day, and secular people are like the night, since they live in temporal human life. What does this mean? Day holds the sun's brightness and the serenity of the shining sky; this symbolizes the fact that the spiritual kind includes both the order of vowed monks and the order of clerics. Night holds the light of moon and stars and the blackness of the dark; this means that secular people include among themselves both just people, who shine in their works, and sinners weighed down by the darkness of their sins. But let one who forsakes the night of the seculars and is converted for love of life to the day of the spirituals be constant in this action; for if he goes backward, he will be compared to old Adam who transgressed the command of life and was driven out into the calamities of the world.

Therefore, let no one hasten to leave the world and boldly enter into My covenant of his own will until he is thoroughly examined and tested; for I do not want one who has seized the robe of My Son to let it go. For is it fitting that one who has clothed himself with His Incarnation and received His cross into his hands should renounce his Lord? By no means. Therefore listen to this.

39 To renounce the sign of religious life will mean harsh judgment

A person who has willingly confessed in his heart and vowed in his soul's devotion to bear My yoke and renounce worldly things, and then with ardent heart and desirous soul and just purpose received the sign of the religious life, must remain in it, for if he renounces it and scorns the resulting evil he will be strictly judged. Why is this? Because he has spurned Him Whose sign he has received and then trampled on, just as the Jews spurned Him when in the madness of unbelief they afflicted Him on the cross. And, as the Jews did not fear that wicked deed, so this one does not fear to reject that same Passion in rejecting his vow. For what a person promises he must fulfil, as David testifies, saying:

40 Words of David on this subject

"I will go into Your house with burnt offerings; I will pay You my vows, which my lips have uttered" [Psalm 65:13-14]. What does this mean? By resolving to do good and just deeds, I will go, O my God, into the order that You in Your holiness have given, leaving the couch of pleasure in ardent desire, for nothing is sweeter to me than to pursue You, the Creator of all. And therefore I will pay you my vows, which my mouth uttered together with my soul. For I wish to perfect what I promised You, the Just Judge, in my ardent desire: to direct my actions toward You, against Whom I have foolishly transgressed. And I desire to hasten back to You, to avoid evil deeds and do good ones; for the reason and the intellect that burn in me seek to aspire in true penitence toward You, the Living God, rather than to imitate the Devil by deceitful contrariety.

BOOK TWO

Therefore, O human, when you thus offer Me your heart, think on how you may wisely accomplish this. For My eye sees most sharply what human will tells me; and whatever is Mine, I will most strictly require.

Why then, O foolish and more than foolish, do you take on yourselves such great burdens, as if you thought it easy to set aside the will of the flesh? According to the law My commands have given you, you are not obliged to leave the world unless you first train yourselves by so many labors that you are able to bridle the carnal desires in you.

41 Those who take the sign of religion for the wrong reason are like Balaam

But you are like a lukewarm wind, for vainglory blows upon your minds; and so after some adversity you say, "I want not to work any more in the world, but speedily to flee it. Why should I wear myself out in vain labor like this?" And when you say these things to yourself, you think it will turn out as you expect. But many seek Me with a vacillating mind, so that they are marked only outwardly with the sign of religious life, not seeking Me with pure eyes or looking simply about them with true doctrine to see how to escape the Devil who seeks to devour them; as the dove, seeing reflected in pure water the bird that seeks to seize her, takes to flight. But these people do not flee from the Devil when they see him coming in doctrinal writings; but in sudden stupefaction, born of the blindness of their minds, they blow toward Me like a lukewarm wind.

For some undertake the religious life renouncing not their own will but only their secular clothes, because they have experienced misery and poverty instead of riches in the world; they leave the world because they cannot have it as they wish. Others are foolish and simple about the world and, being unable to guide themselves, are contemptible to people; so they flee from the world because they are mocked by it. Others labor greatly under the calamities of sickness and bodily weakness, and so leave the world not for My sake but to remedy these afflictions more easily. Yet others suffer such great anguish and oppression from the temporal lords to whom they are subject that they withdraw from the world for fear of them, not so as to obey My precepts but only so that those lords can no longer have power over them.

So all these come to the religious life not for the sake of celestial love but for the sake of the earthly troubles they have, not knowing whether I am salted with wisdom or insipid, sweet or bitter, a dweller in Heaven or on earth. What does this mean? They do not look for the spice or the sweetness of the Scriptures, or consider how I dwell in the hearts of those who seek celestial things. And since, neglecting to fear Me and advancing according to their own wills, they will not examine these things, they are alien to Me and fugitives.

Therefore I do not count them as having left the world and come to Me; but they are guilty of fearing the servant and despising the master; for they follow earthly business and do not fear Me, and thus they are counted afraid of the least important and reckless of the most important things. Therefore, they become like Balaam, who, seeing the Israelite people beautiful in their tents, longed with a false longing to join with them, saying:

42 Example of Balaam

“Let my soul die the death of the just, and my last hour be like theirs” [Numbers 23:10]. What does this mean? When a person is stirred up in his soul to begin deeds of justice, then with mounting desire he sighs and longs for them, saying, “I, a wretch entangled in many sins and bonds, yearn to have my soul reject carnal desires and leave behind all malice of wickedness, and, by that contrition which makes the just despise themselves, abide in the dwelling place of good works. How? That in my good deeds my end may be like that of the ones who do God’s justice, so that the result of My good works may equal the beginning of their just purpose.” But if the person who says these things is then, when his sighing is over, tempted by evil spirits and conquered by carnal desire so that he returns to iniquity, he does what Balaam did when he was deceived by the wickedness of his greed. How? Because at first he wanted to curse My people, and I opposed him both by My angel and by his ass; and by My zeal I led him to bless My people with the blessing of the words I placed in his mouth and to desire to be made like to My people Israel in his death. But afterward, touched by the spirit of dissension, he returned to his first separation and scattered that people for a deathly reward by the fornication of his counsel, as he promised when he said:

“But yet, going to my people, I will give counsel what your people shall do to this people in the latter days” [Numbers 24:14]. What does this mean? Just this: When I turn back to the path of desires related to the pleasures of the flesh, I will begin again those lusts I had previously known. How? Because I know what I am in my flesh and serve it fittingly; and I know well the motives that always act upon it. “So, O human, to you who burn for these delights I, the Devil, show in my secret mind incentives for your desires; and by my delightful suggestions I so enkindle your ardor that through knowledge of the ancient joys of earth, which flower in your heart, you will extinguish that burning desire which previously impelled you toward holy works, first stopping them and at last leaving them as if you had never known them."

Therefore, O human, just as Balaam stooped to wrong desires after first looking upward with righteous longing, so do those who seek Me feignedly. For when they see those who have truly renounced the world go forward sincerely and persevere laudably and truthfully in strict and blessed ways of life, they call them beautiful and sweet, and on sudden impulse undertake their life and want to be like them. But after they have joined themselves to them, as Balaam looked to the Israelite people, they are often recalled to carnal desires, by which they were dominated before, by the various villainies they had in their hearts while still in the world. And when they are thus entangled, they contaminate My chosen flock with poison and hostility, shaking them with storms and scattering them with their wicked counsel. For when they deceitfully withdrew from the world, they did not call upon Me in their prayers to help them or ask Me to test their bodies to see if they could persevere in their purpose. So I leave them to find out how much their own will can help them when they trust in themselves.

Oh, how foolish and fruitless are their lives, for they are not provided with the written Law of God or the fruitfulness of His word; and so they did not consider what to do when they entered on the strict way, as good earth considers when it brings forth useful fruit. So let them listen: O human, only today you were a fiery furnace, burning fiercely in your flesh with carnal desires; and who gave you such a great respite that you could escape the great fire of your passion?

43 One who takes the sign of religion foolishly and ends badly is ruined Truly one who wishes to undertake these things should examine with his inner eyes how to begin them through Me and by My help perfect them; for if he begins them foolishly and fails to fulfil them he may go to ruin, like the ancient enemy, who, confiding in himself, was cast out by the wrath of My zeal. So shall they also be cast out who, considering neither Me nor themselves, clothe themselves with the Passion of My Son in unthinking and hasty pride, and afterward find it too much for them and renounce it in disgust. Therefore, let those who submit themselves to the Passion take heed how they love it, as Jeremiah the prophet, inspired by the Holy Spirit, urges, saying:

VISION FIVE

44 Words of Jeremiah

“O all you that pass by the way, attend and see if there is any sorrow like to my sorrow! For He has made a vintage of me, as the Lord spoke in the day of His fierce anger” [Lamentations 1:12]. What does this mean? O all you who have deserted vices, rejecting the worldly and imitating the spiritual, and so are passing by the Way that is Life and Truth, which is I, the Son of God: Attend when you begin good works, lest when you start to imitate My Passion you forget My sorrow; and take care, for the sake of perfect justice, that the sorrow you impose on yourselves for My sake is like My sorrow. How?

By persevering unfailingly to a good end in these miseries you bear for My sake, as I also persevered in My sorrow in My purpose of dying for you; for I was oppressed and trampled in the Passion of the cross, as a grape of the vine is crushed in the winepress, that you might eat My Body and drink My Blood. The Ruler of Heaven and earth foresaw this with His all-seeing eye in the beginning, when Adam forsook life and accepted death; My Heavenly Father foresaw that in the latter days He would conquer the ancient seducer and deliver the human race with celestial aid, through Me his Son, incarnate of the Virgin to oppose the Devil with the great strength of justice. Therefore let the person, of whatever age or sex he is, who clothes himself with the Passion of Christ take care to retain it firmly, lest if he renounce it by an error of neglect he may later be unable to find it when he wants to have it.

45 Children may enter the holy way of life only with their informed consent

Therefore also, let people who want to subject their children to that Passion in humility of life not do it with imprudent and inconsiderate haste, but examine the matter with wise discretion and not force them to do without their consent what the people themselves could not bear. How?

If you offer your child to Me when discerning intellect is not in him, but all his understanding lies undeveloped, and that offering is against his will because you have not sought his consent to it, you have not acted rightly; you have offered a ram. How? If someone offers a ram at My altar without binding its horns strongly with ropes, the ram will certainly run away. So also if a father or mother offer their child, who is the ram, to My service, but do not honor his will, which is his horns, by assiduous care or supplication or entreaty or diligent exhortation, which are the ropes that bind him, since by all these the child should be brought to consent in good will; not having been proved by these tests, he will certainly run away, physically or mentally, unless God guards him by miracle.

And if you, O human, confine that child with such great strictness of bodily discipline that he cannot free himself from the pressure of his will's repugnance, he will come before Me arid and fruitless in body and soul because of the captivity unjustly inflicted on him without his consent. Then I will say to you, O human who has bound him:

46 Example of the field

I had a green field in My power. Did I give it to you, O human, that you might make it put forth whatever fruit you wished? And if you sow sand in it, can you make it grow into fruit? No. For you do not give the dew, or send forth the rain, or confer fresh moisture, or draw warmth out of the burning sun, all of which are necessary to produce good fruit. So too, you can sow a word in human ears, but into his heart, which is My field, you cannot pour the dew of compunction, or the rain of tears, or the moisture of devotion, or the warmth of the Holy Spirit, through all of which the fruit of holiness must grow.

And how did you dare so rashly to touch one dedicated and sanctified to Me in baptism, that without his will you handed him over to bear My yoke in strict captivity; so that he became neither dry nor green, not dying to the world or living to the world? Why have you so oppressed him that he can do neither? If I comfort him by miracle so that he may remain in the spiritual life, that is not for humans to look into; for I want his parents not to sin in his oblation, offering him to Me without his will.

But if anyone, father or mother, wishes to offer their child to My service, let them say before presenting him, "I promise God that I will keep my child with skillful care until he reaches the age of reason, entreating, beseeching and exhorting him to go permanently into God's service. And if he says yes, I will speedily offer him to the service of God; but if he does not consent, may I be guiltless in the sight of God's Majesty."

And if the parents of the child have brought him up in this way until the age of reason, and if then the child turns away and will not give his consent, then they have shown their devotion in him as far as they could and must not offer him against his will or force him to enter that servitude which they themselves do not want to bear or perform.

47 Those who maliciously turn others from following God commit sacrilege

But one who wishes with a devoted mind to be subject to Me should be strongly exhorted to do it and is not to be drawn back from his good intention by the envy of any spiteful soul. For if anyone deflects from his purpose one who desired to follow Me, he commits sacrilege, since he breaks My covenant in the other's mind. And therefore he will render account in the just judgment if he remains firm in this evil, since he turned away one who wished to serve Me, which he should not have done, as it is written:

VISION FIVE

48 Words of Moses

“Anything that is devoted to the Lord, whether it be man, or beast, or field, shall not be sold, neither may it be redeemed” [Leviticus 27:28]. What does this mean? When a person's longing soul, in its full knowledge, touches his good sense with the conviction that he should do a certain thing, his will accepts it and says, “This is fitting for the honor of God.” And so the person promises the thing to God with good devotion and just reverence, and offers himself to Him by a kiss of the heart, that is by the will of his desire. Therefore, the thing has been offered to God as the dowry of holiness. How? Because God, seeing the person's will working in him, accepts this will by a ring of sanctification, as a husband undertakes by a betrothal ring to keep his bride in a pact of alliance that means that from now on he will never forsake her.

Hence when God has accepted this will from the manly strength of a person who forces himself to leave what he has and give what he possesses more to God than to himself, that bond of consecration must remain, and he must not forsake his devotion. Why? Because his wisdom has known it and his good sense has understood it and his will has built it up in God's honor; so whether it is a person who has offered himself to God, or an animal, owned by a person, which is offered to God, or a field bringing forth fruit, which was consecrated to God, it must not be given for a high price or held for a low profit lest God's honor be counted a trifling matter.

49 One who begins God's service and then rejects it must be recalled to it

But even as no one must be forced against his will to turn from the secular way to the spiritual path, so too one who undertook My service with devoted will and then despised and rejected it must be recalled by just judgment to resume it. How? If he has upright guides and spiritual masters full of My zeal, they should call him back to My service. In doing this, let them first soothe him by supplication, exhortation and caressing speech, and then proceed to correct him by blows, cold, hunger and similar punishments, so that these miseries will warn him by recalling to his mind the pains of

BOOK TWO

Hell; and, fearing them, he may cast from him the filthiness of his soul and be recalled to the path he had deserted. As is written of these things in the Gospel:

50 Words of the Gospel

“Go out into the highways and byways, and compel them to come in, that my house may be filled” [Luke 14:23]. What does this mean? You who are a spiritual shepherd and a just guide and an upright master, leave your original habits, which you got from your first parents, and enter the strait and narrow way of unyielding precepts, written by men sure of themselves in the design of the Holy Spirit. And consider most sharply in My zeal those who, living under these precepts and your rule, undertook or vowed, by their own will and not by the undue urging of another, to observe the holy purpose of My covenant, but then esteemed it lightly and yearned to go back to their old vices. And, by sweet and bitter reproofs, compel them to enter into church discipline, that the house I have dowered may be filled, both with those who have been strongly reproved and with those who have been sweetly admonished. For some must be called to life by various punishments, and others by various blandishments. How?

As the righteous shepherd anxiously seeks his lost sheep, so must spiritual masters seek with great diligence their underlings who go astray through vice, and force them by their cleverness to return to the house of justice from which they went out or wished to go out, that the Church may be filled with sheep, some bitterly reproved and some gently exhorted, to be brought to the heavenly pastures.

51 The undisciplined who refuse correction must be expelled to save the rest

But if any are so stubborn as to refuse to correct themselves, either by bodily punishment inflicted on them in My zeal by their superiors, or for fear of Me Who am the God Who does not wish iniquity, or for love of the blood poured out by My Son Who suffered for them; and if these labor to pollute with their filth My faithful friends who are moving quickly in My ways, then these friends of Mine must expel them like wolves, lest they contaminate the flock, which My friend Paul urges, saying:

52 Words of the Apostle

“Put away the evil one from among you” [1 Corinthians 5:13]. What does this mean? You who are at the height of governing yet remain in humble subjection, expel this evil one from among you; for he despises fear of Me and opposes Me, the Creator of Heaven and earth. Expel him from among you with such force that he may never fix a root in your consciousness or set his foot in your company, lest the sweet unguents of your good works become worthless. But if any of these shall wish to return in penitence and shall seek Me his Creator with a pure heart, I will receive him even if he comes at the end of his course, for I judge all things justly.

VISION FIVE

53 Feigned converts are deceived, sincere converts received by God

But if someone hides and reserves the treasure of his heart, saying, "Until I feel myself about to die I will not turn away from secular affairs," and so defers his conversion until his last gasp; and then, when he can no longer breathe and despairs of longer life, tries to renounce the world; he deceives his soul, for his conversion is deceptive, made in jest and taken as a jest. But if one is close to death and renounces the world with his whole heart, for his sins and for love of Me, and desires to serve Me ardently as long as he lives, I will truly accept his devotion with all the choirs of angels and grant him the glory of life. For though a person may be involved in great crimes, when he faces up to his sins and weeps bitterly over his offenses, and does this simply because he has provoked Me to wrath, I will raise him up from death to salvation and not deny him the celestial inheritance, as the psalmist David testifies in My Spirit, saying:

54 Words of David

"In what day soever I shall call upon you, behold! I know You are my God" [Psalm 35:10]. What does this mean? In whatever day of my life divine grace shall illumine my mind with celestial brightness as I lie in the dark, so that in bitter remorse for my sins and with a heavy and wounded heart I call upon You, Who grant to all who call on You with a pure heart the remedy of Your loving kindness, by this visitation I know that You Who mercifully bring all these things to pass are my God. What does this mean? When by Your grace You Who can do it shall lead me to know You as my God in works of justice, and humble myself for my deeds of wickedness; then You will receive me, for I sincerely seek you and tearfully cry out after you and know You in renewal of soul, and I exhaust my body in true penitence and know it to be of no worth.

When a person performs his penance thus, he will find the remedy for his sins. How? Because he knows Me to be his God. How? Because he has forsaken his sins, and therefore he will see with the eye of penitence that those things he did before in his evil desire were vain.

BOOK TWO

55 Blasphemers against the Holy Spirit and suicides are rejected by God

Let no one therefore neglect to seek the remedy of penitence. If one neglects penitence when he is sound of body, let him nonetheless be eager to seek it in his last moments, and I will receive him into salvation; for however great the stain of sin is, by pure penitence it is washed away for the sake of My Son. But this is not true of anyone who has impenitently uttered blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, and anyone who has obdurately flung his own body into death; these two things are like one. And in the glory of eternal life I will not acknowledge these people, as it is written in the Gospel:

56 Words of the Gospel

“Every sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven to people; but the spirit of blasphemy shall not be forgiven” [Matthew 12:31, misquoted]. What does this mean? Every sin committed as an excess of the flesh, or in lust or bitterness or such vices, or blasphemy, which is the worship of idols, where the true God is not known and a false image is adored, or the invocation of demons, where the true God is known but in human perversity the Devil is called upon; all these things are forgiven people who are truly repentant and, stung by tears from their inmost hearts, faithfully seek the true God Who grants His mercy to all who call upon Him. For though people who do these things go gravely astray in sin, if they do not utterly renounce God, Who reigns in the heavens in sovereignty and power, they will seek and find His helping hand.

But if they persevere in their infidelity, so that they never recover from their wickedness but deny God with firm heart and consenting soul; if they say to themselves, “What is this that is called God? For there is no God in any mercy or truth Who could want or have power to help me,” and therefore remain impenitent because they do not believe that they can be cleansed of sin or saved; then they are blasphemers of God. And if they persist in this, they cannot receive pardon for the blasphemy because of the wickedness of their obduracy, for they so stifle the understanding of their hearts that they cannot aspire upward. For they regard as nonexistent the One by Whose mercy they must be saved, as the psalmist David asserts, saying:

57 Words of David

“The fool has said in his heart, ‘There is no God’ ” [Psalm 13:1]. What does this mean? In his foolish utterance he who lacks wisdom and understanding has denied God in his heart, unable to know Him. How? Because he did not want to know or understand the true God, saying to himself, "What is God? God does not exist. And what then am I? I do not know what I am!" He who says these things is a fool, for he has not the true wisdom by which God is known. But anyone who has really known God, reigning in power, is wise even if a sinner. Hence anyone who has despair of God's mercy fixed in his heart, saying, "God is nothing; I know Him not because He has not known me, and I deny Him because He has denied me;" such a one will not rise again to life or inherit joy, for since he regards the Creator as nothing, all creatures will desert him.

And one who despairs because of his sins and believes that their great weight makes it impossible for him to be saved is faithless; he shall not attain to life, for he contradicts the One Who gives life to all. But if any of these is led by penitence and truly seeks Me, he shall find Me, for I reject no one who comes to me with a sincere heart.

58 Anyone who resists blasphemous despair is quickly helped by God

And if the blackest tempests of blasphemy and despair fall on anyone, and he does not consent to them in his heart or his will or any perverted taste but struggles against them in great torment; then if he perseveres in the fight and strongly resists, I will quickly help him. And let him not doubt because he must struggle, for I say he is a strong warrior against the greatest of storms, and I will help him most speedily and hold him as a friend; for, patiently enduring, he has nobly conquered great misfortunes for love of Me.

59 One who separates his body and soul, which God has joined, is damned

But just as one who does not choose to know Me, the true God, in faith or hope, does not rise again to life, as has been said; so one who throws himself into bodily death, not waiting for the separation I appoint for everyone but dividing himself without hope of mercy, will fall into perdition, for he has killed the thing with which he should have done penance. For one who separates from a person what I have placed in the person incurs great guilt, as My Son shows in the Gospel, saying:

60 Words of the Gospel

"You have heard that it was said of old, 'You shall not kill. And whoever shall kill will be in danger of the judgment' " [Matthew 5:21]. What does this mean? You who want to stand upon the rock, note that the voice that comes from the Root of all reason tells you that Scripture, interpreted for you by the finger of God, forbade your ancient predecessors to divide in a person what divine arrangement united in him. What does this mean? That He Who forbade Adam the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, saying, "In whatever day you eat of it, you shall die the death" [Genesis 2:17], also said to Adam's race through Moses, "You shall not kill" [Exodus 20:13]; so you shall not destroy what is made in the image of God. And, just as Adam in transgressing God's command deprived himself and his progeny of the life of salvation, so also the person who destroys God's creation in human form cuts off from his soul and body faithful generations of works of salvation; and, thus incurring the judicial sentence, goes into the exile of misery.

Therefore one who has made such a cruel separation in a person casts himself into calamity. He has separated what is Mine, for I placed body and soul together in humans, and who is he to dare to separate them? And if one who kills another is weighed down with immense sin, what will he be who gives himself to death and lays in the dust the thing with which he should have wiped out his crimes?

For one who kills himself imitates that lost angel who found wickedness in the beginning and gave himself to damnation by killing himself. How? By envying God, Who has no beginning and no end and Who rules all things that are in Heaven and on earth. And as the Devil in his pride chose not to look at Me when he cast himself into perdition, so the person who violently cuts himself asunder does not deign to know Me, and so falls into death, like the other who brought perdition on himself. For before he fell he tried to uplift his iniquity on the wings of the wind and to fly in the heavenly places like a bird flying in the air; and in this presumption he cast himself down from beatitude to misfortune.

But I formed Man from earth to ascend from lower to higher things, and to begin and perfect good works and thus build the splendid virtues needed for hard tasks. Therefore let Man, who has both a body and a soul, not kill himself when he can do good works and repent, lest he reach that place where he can have neither work nor penitence, like the Devil who killed himself and was cast into Hell.

But let the one who sees with watchful eyes and hears with attentive ears welcome with a kiss My mystical words, which proceed from Me Who am life.

THE FOOD OF LIFE

VISION SIX

Christ's Sacrifice and the Church

And after these things I saw the Son of God hanging on the cross, and the aforementioned image of a woman coming forth like a bright radiance from the ancient counsel. By divine power she was led to Him, and raised herself upward so that she was sprinkled by the blood from His side; and thus, by the will of the Heavenly Father, she was joined with Him in happy betrothal and nobly dowered with His body and blood.

And I heard the voice from Heaven saying to Him: "May she, O Son, be your Bride for the restoration of My people; may she be a mother to them, regenerating souls through the salvation of the Spirit and water."

And as that image grew in strength, I saw an altar, which she frequently approached, and there each time looked devotedly at her dowry and modestly showed it to the Heavenly Father and His angels. Hence when a priest clad in sacred vestments approached that altar to celebrate the divine mysteries, I saw that a great calm light was brought to it from Heaven by angels and shone around the altar until the sacred rite was ended and the priest had withdrawn from it. And when the Gospel of peace had been recited and the offering to be consecrated had been placed upon the altar, and the priest sang the praise of Almighty God, "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Hosts," which began the mystery of the sacred rites, Heaven was suddenly opened and a fiery and inestimable brilliance descended over that offering and irradiated it completely with light, as the sun illumines anything its rays shine through. And, thus illuminating it, the brilliance bore it on high into the secret places of Heaven and then replaced it on the altar, as a person draws in a breath and lets it out again; and thus the offering was made true flesh and true blood, although in human sight it looked like bread and wine.

And while I looked at these things, suddenly there appeared before my eyes as if in a mirror the symbols of the Nativity, Passion and burial, Resurrection and Ascension of our Savior, God's Only-Begotten, as they had happened to the Son of God while He was on earth. But when the priest sang the song of the innocent Lamb, "O Lamb of God, Who takest away the sins of the world," and prepared to take the Holy Communion himself, the fiery brilliance withdrew into Heaven; and as it closed I heard the voice from thence saying, "Eat and drink the body and blood of My Son to wipe out Eve's transgression, so that you may be restored to the noble inheritance." And as other people approached the priest to receive the sacrament, I noticed five modes of being in them. For some were bright of body and fiery of soul, and others seemed pale of body and shadowed of soul; some were hairy of body and seemed dirty in soul, because it was pervaded with unclean human pollution; others were surrounded in body by sharp thorns and leprous of soul; and others appeared bloody of body and foul as a decayed corpse in soul. And all these received the same sacraments; and as they did, some were bathed in fiery brilliance, but the others were overshadowed by a dark cloud.

And when these mysteries were finished, as the priest withdrew from the altar the calm light from Heaven, which, as said, had shone round the whole altar, was drawn up again into the secret places of Heaven. And again I heard the voice from the supernal heavens, saying to me:

- I The Church was joined to Christ in His Passion and dowered with His blood

When Jesus Christ, the true Son of God, hung on the tree of His Passion, the Church, joined to Him in the secret mysteries of Heaven, was dowered with His crimson blood; as she herself shows when she often approaches the altar and reclaims her wedding gift, carefully noting with what degree of devotion her children receive it when they come to the divine mysteries. Therefore you see the Son of God hanging on the cross, and the aforementioned image of a woman coming forth like a bright radiance from the ancient counsel; and by divine power she is led to Him. For when the innocent Lamb was lifted up on the altar of the cross for human salvation, the Church suddenly appeared in Heaven by a profound mystery, in purity of faith and all the other virtues; and by the Supreme Majesty she was joined to the Only-Begotten of God. What does this mean? That when blood flowed from the wounded side of My Son, at once salvation of souls came into being; for the glory from which the Devil and his followers were driven out was given to humanity when My Only-Begotten suffered temporal death on the cross, despoiled Hell and led the faithful souls to Heaven. Therefore, in His disciples and their sincere followers faith began to increase and strengthen, so that they became heirs of the celestial Kingdom. Hence that image raises herself upward so that she is sprinkled by the blood from His side; and thus, by the will of the Heavenly Father, she is joined with Him in happy betrothal. For when the strength of the Passion of the Son of God flows burningly forth and rises to the height of the celestial mysteries, as the perfume of spices diffuses itself upward, the Church, fortified by that strength in the pure heirs of the eternal Kingdom, is faithfully joined by the high Father's decision to the Only-Begotten of God. How? As a bride, subjected to her bridegroom in her offering of subordination and obedience, receives from him a gift of fertility and a pact of love for procreating children, and educates them as to their inheritance. So too the Church, joined to the Son of God in the exercise of humility and charity, receives from Him the regeneration of the Spirit and water to save souls and restore life, and sends those souls to Heaven.

VISION SIX

Therefore she is nobly dowered with His body and blood; for the Only-Begotten of God conferred His body and blood in surpassing glory on His faithful, who are the Church and her children, that through Him they may have life in the celestial city. How?

2 God conquered the ancient serpent by His Son's humility, not His power

By giving His body and blood to sanctify those who believe; and so the Heavenly Father delivered Him up to the Passion for the redemption of the peoples and conquered the ancient serpent through Him in humility and justice. He did not want His Son to conquer by His power and strength, for God is just and does not will iniquity, as the Psalmist declares, saying:

3 Words of the Psalmist

"Blessed is the man who has not walked in the counsel of the ungodly, or stood in the way of sinners, or sat in the seat of the pernicious" [Psalm 1:1]. What does this mean?

God is the Father of all the bliss and happiness of His creatures and shows many and various signs in them; and the Incarnation of His Son dripped with the sweet taste of delight, for in Him the heavenly virtues built many mansions through which humanity can return to the supernal Kingdom, which is darkened by no shadow of death. And thus the strongest powers of virtue were shown to be in the Heavenly Father, for it was He through His Only-Begotten who slew death and broke Hell; and on the last day He will make the world anew and better.

Therefore, He has not, through any wavering of His heart, wandered away into the paths of the evil spirits, who forsook the truth and seized on the lie. How? They wanted to use the lie to divide the truth. How? By trying to overthrow the Ancient of Days, Who was before days and hours began; and by yearning to make a partner for Him of the ancient serpent, who before time began was not. But that could not and should not be, for there is one God. And therefore the Devil is a liar, for he withdrew from God and forsook life to find death. And so, indeed, God did not stand in the path that sinners walk; He condemned Adam's choice and did not love his sin, but when he was seduced by the Devil He drove him from Paradise. And He did not reign in any seat of wicked power, as does the whole human race, which is bound up with death and sits in its shadow because it arrogantly deserted the truth. What does this mean? That God did not oppose either devilish presumption or human disrespect by His power or cast them out by His strength. Why? If there were two fighters, one stronger than the other, surely the stronger would show the weaker how much more he was capable of, conquering and confounding him and not yielding to him in any way. But God did not act thus; He resisted the work of iniquity by supreme goodness, sending into the world His Son, Who in His body brought back His lost sheep to Heaven with great humility. How? The blood that came forth from His body appeared in Heaven as soon as it flowed from His open wounds, pleading that the salvation of souls should be granted. How? Every creature who lives in the Son of God shows that through His Passion and death lost humanity was restored to life. How? Because the Only-Begotten of God, Who is life, offered Himself for His Passion on the altar of the cross for the redemption of the human race; and, as you have truly heard proclaimed by the voice from Heaven, in that place He chose the Church as His Bride, to be a mother to the believing peoples to restore salvation and by spiritual regeneration send them without stain to the celestial realms.

4 The growing Church offers her dowry to God and shows Him the sacraments

But as that image grows in strength, you see an altar, which she frequently approaches, and there each time looks devotedly at her dowry and modestly shows it to the Heavenly Father and His angels. For when the Church, as mentioned, suddenly increased in strong and blessed virtues, by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit the mystical altars were sanctified by the deep longings of the faithful, as is clearly shown to you. And the Church, with steady purpose, turns her footsteps there by example and devotedly offers her dowry, which is the body and blood of the Son of God, to the Creator of all in humble obedience, in the presence of those living and burning lights who are the citizens of Heaven. Why is this? Because as the flesh of My Only-Begotten came into being in the pure womb of the Virgin Mary, and then was delivered up for human salvation, so now His flesh, augmented by the incorrupt purity of the Church, is often given to sanctify the faithful.

5 Analogy of gold

For, as the goldsmith first unites his gold by melting it in the fire, and then divides it when it is united, so I, the Father, first glorify the body and blood of My Son by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit when it is offered, and then, when it is glorified, distribute it to the faithful for their salvation.

VISION SIX

- 6 When the priest approaches the altar, the angels bring a brightness there

Hence when a priest clad in sacred vestments approaches that altar to celebrate the divine mysteries, you see that a great calm light is brought to it from Heaven by angels. For when he who has the charge of souls is girded with the sacred cincture and approaches the life-giving table to immolate the innocent Lamb, at once the great light of the heavenly inheritance drives away the darkness, shining with the help of celestial spirits from the secret places of Heaven. And it completely illumines the plan of sanctification, for here is the food of the soul by which believers are saved. How? Because the Church in the voice of the priest seeks her dowry, which is the body and the poured-out blood of My Son, in order to be fit for blessed childbearing in saving souls; for when that precious blood was poured out she was increased by a great multitude of peoples. And so then I, Who am the unfailing Light, illumine the place of that consecration with My holiness, to the honor of the body and blood of My Only-Begotten.

- 7 In the sacrament of the altar God remembers His Son's Passion

For when the priest begins to invoke me on the sanctified altar, and I consider that My Son offered Me bread and wine at the supper of death just before leaving the world; then I see that My Son did this in the hour of His death, as he was about to perish on the wood of the cross, so that when the blessed offering of the holy sacrifice is offered to Me by a priest I might always have His Passion in My sight, never blotting it from My sharp vision. For He too offered Me bread and wine in the outpouring of His blood, when He cast down death and raised up humanity.

- 8 Why in the sacrament bread, wine and water are offered

But because He Who went into and came out of the cloister of virginal purity was not of human nature but of divine power, the flesh of My Only-Begotten can be produced by consecration from wheaten bread and His blood from grape wine mixed with water, as I have shown through My faithful servant the prophet Joel, saying:

- 9 Words of Joel

“And the floors shall be filled with wheat, and the presses shall overflow with wine and oil. And I will restore to you the years that the locust and the canker-worm and the rust and the caterpillar have eaten, My great host which I sent upon you; and you shall eat in plenty and shall be filled, and praise the name of your God, Who has dealt wondrously with you; and My people shall not be confounded forever" [Joel 2:24-26]. What does this mean? Through the miraculous arrangement of God the floors of the faith of the believing Church will be filled with all good things. For I will make the grain of the wheat into the body of My Son, though for their true salvation, to call My faithful back to their rightful land, I will also make adversities abound, through which for My name's sake they will crush the desires of their flesh. And likewise I will transform the juice of the grape for them into the blood of My Only-Begotten and give them the oil of mercy. How?

I will restore to you in another form, changed into salvation for you, that time consumed by the locust of forgetfulness in ignorant unbelief in a round of vanities, when villanies first arose among the children of Adam; they forgot the fruitfulness of My justice, as a person forgets his necessary food after he has put it in his stomach, and in their impiety they tore apart My justice as the locust gnaws the fruit. How? When the locust of negligence with slothful mind destroys the utility of good fruit, the canker-worm of foulness also wraps itself around it in filth; for people like this wrap themselves in the filth of idolatry and other schisms, and probings into diabolism, and magical arts, and the search for auguries in the Creator's creatures as to future happenings in human life, and vile deeds of murder and fornication, and feed on them as the canker-worm feeds on mud. How? Wherever the canker-worm of shame cherishes the stench of filth, the rust of bitterness will consume the metal of shining faith; and these people, opposing God's justice, labor to obscure it, as rust is wont to take away the beauty of metals. How?

Where the rust of biting speech stains the brilliance of good deeds, there also the caterpillar of harmful actions will rob the flourishing green crops of their usefulness; for these people cast away in wicked malice such noble virtues as simplicity, chastity and virtuous constancy, illumined by the Holy Spirit in fresh beatitude, and try to destroy them as the caterpillar destroys the crops. But in all these things My exceeding strength is declared, which in its great power conquered the opposition of the Devil when I sent it among you for your salvation. How?

I the Father sent My Son into the world, physically born of the Virgin, that through Him I might redeem you from the perdition of death; so that I might dwell in you and you in Me, since My own Son underwent the Passion and gave you His flesh to eat and His blood to drink. Hence you shall eat this sacrament devotedly for your salvation and feed blessedly upon it; and thus, through the oil of My mercy, the hunger of your souls' perdition shall be satisfied. For My Son brought you penitence as a medicine for your wounds, and My Son's Bride was adorned with all justice and truth. And therefore you shall faithfully praise My name; for I am one God in true Trinity, and I govern you and display My wonders in you, miraculously snatching you from the power of the Devil. And therefore, My people, whom I have brought forth so wonderfully from the jaws of Hell, shall not be confounded by death in the eternity that is to come.

VISION SIX

10 God does not leave the priest until he has completed the mystery

And you see that the calm light shines around the altar until the sacred rite is ended and the priest has withdrawn from it. For that light is an eternal sight, and shows itself by miracle with great brightness until the mysteries of this hallowed office are finished and the dispenser of the sacred rites, having completed them, withdraws from the holy spot. Why is this? Because it is fitting that the Divine Majesty manifest Its power most fully in these blessed rites, and because as long as a person remains within these things that belong to God, God's help will never leave him.

11 When the mystery of the sacrament begins, an unknown light shines on it

And when the Gospel of peace has been recited and the offering to be consecrated has been placed upon the altar, and the priest sings the praise of Almighty God, "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Hosts," which begins the mystery of the sacred rites, Heaven is suddenly opened and a fiery and inestimable brilliance descends over that offering. For when the fresh and living breath of the royal kiss has been given, and the fruit of noble life, which is to be sanctified and purified, has been put as a stone into God's wall, and the messenger of truth utters the sweet sound of the threefold invocation of the Lord of Hosts in praise of the Creator of all and thus begins the mystery of the shining dawn, the Incarnation of the Son of God in the Virgin; then suddenly the glorious tabernacle opens on the mystery of the sacrament, and an inconceivably calm and lofty brilliance shines down. And it irradiates [the offering] completely with light, as the sun illumines anything its rays shine through; in the power of the Father the holy heat so strikes the sparkling circle of that oblation that the radiant splendor wholly enters into the thing it falls upon. What does this mean?

The Bride of My Son offers the gift of bread and wine on My altar with a most devoted purpose. How? To remind Me in faithful memory by the hand of the priest that in this same oblation I delivered up the body and blood of My Son. How? Because the sufferings of My Only-Begotten are seen perpetually in the secret places of Heaven; and thus that oblation is united to

My Son in My ardent heat in a profoundly miraculous way and becomes most truly His body and blood. And thence the Church is quickened with blessed strength.

12 The divine light bears the oblation on high and makes it flesh and blood

For, thus illuminating it, as was said, the brilliance invisibly bears it on high into the secret places of Heaven; for that fiery brilliance, which streams through and illumines the sacrament, bears it upward with invisible power to those places mortal eye cannot see. And then it replaces it on the altar, for with gracious condescension it sweetly puts it back upon the table of sanctification; as a person draws in a breath and lets it out again, when by the wonderful arrangement of God he draws into himself the breath that makes him quicken and live, and then, also that he may live, expels it. And thus the offering is made true flesh and true blood, although in human sight it looks like bread and wine; for God is truthful and without illusion, and His sacrament also is firmly fixed on high where no one can throw it down, and is true flesh and blood without deception. For, just as a soul truly exists within flesh and blood while a person is alive in body, so too this mystery exists within bread and wine when it is worshipped in the true celebration and appears before people. And as the blind human eye cannot fully see God, so too a person cannot physically perceive these mysteries; as a person sees another's body but not his soul, so also a person can see the bread and wine but not the sacraments. Why is this?

The calm light that shone over the body of the Son of God when He was buried in the tomb, and raised Him to life again from the sleep of death, also shines on the altar over the sacrament of the body and blood of God's Only-Begotten, covering it from human sight so that people cannot see its holiness except as bread and wine, the form in which the oblation is placed on the altar. In just this way the Divinity that was in the Son of God was so concealed from people by His Humanity that they could see him only as a human being, living with them as a human being even though He was without sin. What does this mean?

I, Who created all things, benignly accept the oblation when it is offered to Me by the Church at the hand of the priest; for as Divinity displayed its wonders in the womb of the Virgin, it shows its secrets also in this oblation. How? Because here are manifested the body and blood of the Son of God. How?

VISION SIX

13 Analogy of ointment and sapphire

That oblation, by the power of God, is invisibly borne on high and brought back again in an instant, and so warmed by the heat of the Divine Majesty that it becomes the body and blood of God's Only-Begotten. People do not perceive this mystery with their bodily senses; it is as if someone encased a precious unguent in simple bread and dropped a sapphire into wine, and I then changed them into a sweet taste, so that in your mouth, O human, you could not taste the unguent in the bread or the sapphire in the wine, but only the sweetness—as My Son is sweet and mild. What does this mean? The unguent symbolizes My Son, born of the Virgin, Who was anointed with precious ointment. How? He was clothed with holy humanity, which is a precious unguent, pouring so sweetly over the deadly wounds of humans that when they turn back to Him they will no longer putrefy or stink with Adam's perdition. And the sapphire symbolizes the Divinity in My Son, Who is the Cornerstone; He is meek and humble, for he did not grow from the root of human flesh begotten by a man and a woman, but was miraculously incarnate by My fire in the sweet Virgin, and therefore his body and blood are sweet and delightful for believers to take in.

14 Why humans cannot take this spiritual gift in visible form

But you, O human, cannot take this spiritual gift visibly, as if eating visible flesh and drinking visible blood; for you are filth of filth. But, as the living spirit in you is invisible, so also the living sacrament in that oblation is invisible and must be received invisibly by you. For, as the body of My Son came about in the womb of the Virgin, so now the body of My Only-Begotten arises from the sanctification of the altar. What does this mean? The human soul, which is invisible, invisibly receives the sacrament, which exists invisibly in that oblation, while the human body, which is visible, visibly receives the oblation that visibly embodies that sacrament. But the two are one, just as Christ is God and Man, and the rational soul and the mortal flesh make up one human being; and so a person who contemplates Me in right faith receives the sacrament faithfully to make him holy. What does this mean?

My Son was miraculously born from the most pure Virgin, whose body was untouched and never burned in the sweetness of lust, for the virginal vessel in which I willed My Only-Begotten to be incarnate was the purest possible. Thus I did not permit this sweet Virgin's vessel to melt in fiery ardor, since in it My Son miraculously took on a human body.

BOOK TWO

- 15 Offered by a faithful priest the oblation becomes Christ's body and blood

But the Blessed Virgin heard true words of consolation from the angel in secret, and believed; she uplifted the sighs of her soul and said, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to your word" [Luke 1:38]. Thus she conceived the Only-Begotten of God. This indicates that the priest who is performing this office must invoke with his words Almighty God, faithfully believing in Him, offering Him in devotion of heart a pure oblation and speaking the words of salvation in the service of humility; then the Supernal Majesty will receive this oblation and transmute it with miraculous power into the body and blood of the Holy Redeemer. How? As My Son miraculously received humanity in the Virgin, so now this oblation miraculously becomes His body and blood on the altar. Therefore this sacrament is wholly perfect, being invisible and visible, as My Only-Begotten is wholly perfect, Who is invisible as to His Divinity and visible on earth as to His Humanity.

- 16 Analogy of a chick and a butterfly

For as a chick emerges from an egg, or a butterfly springs from a cocoon, and the living creature flies away while the thing it came from remains, so also in this oblation the truth that My Son's body and blood are there must be held by faith, though the oblation appears to human sight as bread and wine.

- 17 In the sacrament of the altar Christ's mysteries appear as in a mirror

And therefore, while you are looking at these things, suddenly there appear before your eyes as if in a mirror the symbols of the Nativity, Passion and burial, Resurrection and Ascension of our Savior, God's Only-Begotten, as they happened to the Son of God while He was on earth. For, as you see in a true vision, the mysteries of Him Who came to earth to save humanity—His birth from the Virgin, suffering on the cross, burial in the tomb, rising again from the dead and ascension into Heaven—shine brightly in the sacrament of the altar, since when God's Only-Begotten lived for a time among people in the world, these things happened to Him in His body by the will of the Father for the redemption of the human race. What does this mean? Before My eyes it is manifest that My Son suffered in the world for the love of humanity, for the Nativity, Passion, burial, Resurrection and Ascension of My Son slew the death of the human race. Hence these mysteries shine before Me in the heavenly places; for I have not forgotten them, but they will appear before Me in great brightness like the dawn until the end of the world. What does this mean?

VISION SIX

18 When the Lord's Prayer is said Christ's Passion will move God to mercy

Until the world ends I will see in that Passion all who will believe in it or reject it. For it will always shine before me, as long as people are obliged to recite what My Son taught His disciples to say in praying to God: "And forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors" [Matthew 6:12]. What does this mean? You Who have all things in Your power, look upon the outpouring of the blood that was shed for the human race, and forgive us, who are children of transgression, the debts we should have paid you but have not because of the baseness of our hearts. What does this mean?

We have not fulfilled what we promised in baptism, for we have transgressed Your precepts and thrown away our innocence, just as Adam in paradise disobeyed you and spoiled the garment of innocence. But because You are kind, do not punish us according to our wickedness, but forgive us our transgression according to Your loving-kindness; as we also who are transgressors, although we have much malice in us, for fear and love of our Savior forgive those who wrong us for the injuries they have done us. How? There are those who should love us because we are human, but instead trouble us, failing to love You and ignoring Your precepts. But we do not persecute them, as they deserve for their malice toward us; we contemplate Your just judgment and do not swiftly avenge ourselves on them, so that You too, O God, Who are just and good, may be gracious to us.

Hear, then, O human! As long as you need help, and as long as you can succor others, My Son's Passion will appear before Me in mercy, and His body and blood will be consecrated on the altar to be received by believers for their salvation and the purgation of their crimes. For when My Only-Begotten was in the world in the body, His body was physically sustained by wheat and wine; and therefore His body and blood is now consecrated on the altar in the oblation of wheat and wine, that the faithful may be refreshed in soul and body. For My Son miraculously redeemed humanity from Adam's perdition and now mercifully absolves people from the daily evil into which they often lapse. For whatever My Son suffered physically in His body for the redemption of humanity appears when the oblation is consecrated; and My will is not to hide this, for I draw His elect on high to the heavenly places, that through them His body may be perfected in its predestined members.

BOOK TWO

- 19 The oblation never appears as flesh except by miracle in great necessity

Thus I miraculously show all these mysteries in that oblation, since when it is placed upon the altar the oblation becomes the body and blood of My Son; but it appears in human eyes to be bread and wine, for human frailty is so delicate that people would shudder at receiving bleeding flesh and trickling blood. For, as long as a person is mortal, he cannot contemplate Divinity. And therefore the mystery that is the whole of Divinity is for humans covered with obscurity, and they perceive it invisibly; namely, that My Only-Begotten, being immortal, dies no more. And so, O human, I give you His body and blood in the oblation of bread and wine, so that by true faith you may perceive by that which is visible that which is invisible. And by divine power you receive this sacrament with true certainty, yet so that it is not visible to you, except in cases of great necessity; it has sometimes been shown to My elect at times when they were in great affliction. And I do all these things to be loving and helpful to humanity. But, though every creature is subject to My precepts, you, O human, are always rebellious against Me; so you are blind and deaf. Yet you cannot rebel against Me. Do I not do what I will without your seeing it? You do not see with your physical eyes or hear with your physical ears how I send a human soul into the body and how I take it out of the body; but your soul will understand Me when it has left its mortal body. And so also I give the body of My Son to be eaten and His blood to be drunk, and I do this by My power, O human, without your seeing it.

- 20 As the song of the Lamb is sung the faithful communicate for their good

Therefore, as you see, when the priest sings the song of the innocent Lamb, "O Lamb of God, Who takest away the sins of the world," and prepares to take the Holy Communion himself, the fiery brilliance withdraws into Heaven; for as that minister announces the praise of Him Who in His mild innocence bore the wickedness of humanity, and opens his inmost heart and his outward devotion to these mysteries, the unconquered serenity that is here showing its power withdraws itself into the supernal secret. And as Heaven closes, you hear the voice from thence saying that believing and faithful people should eat and drink with true devotion the body and blood of their Savior, Who for them suffered temporal death, to wash away the contamination our first parents brought into the world when they transgressed God's precept; so that those people, cleansed from this transgression, may be faithfully restored to the rightful inheritance that by obstinacy they had lost.

For, as the Only-Begotten of God gave His body and blood to His disciples at the Supper, so now on the altar He gives His flesh and His blood to His faithful ones, donating it for human use, as a person does when he has finished the work he wanted to do. For the Son of God, fulfilling the precepts of His Father, offered Himself for people's salvation and gave His body and blood to be eaten and drunk for their sanctification, as the Bridegroom declares to his friends in the Song of Songs, saying:

VISION SIX

21 Words of Solomon in the Song of Songs

"Eat, my friends; drink, and be inebriated, my dearly beloved!" [Song of Songs 5:1]. What does this mean? Eat in faith, you who through holy baptism have come to My friendship; for the spilled blood of My Son has purged you from Adam's fall, and as you chew the true medicine in the body of My Only-Begotten, the repeated deeds of crime and injustice you have done will be mercifully wiped out for you. And also drink in hope from this Vine, which has brought you out of eternal punishment; receive the cup of salvation, that you may firmly and strongly believe in that grace by which you have been redeemed, for you are bathed in the blood that was shed for you. And be inebriated with love, you who are so dear to Me, and flow with brooks of Scripture so that you will know best how to break away from carnal desires; and then I will awake in you splendid virtues pleasing to Me and give you the blood of My Only-Begotten. He Himself gave this sacrament to His disciples, as is written in the Gospel:

22 The meaning of the Lord's words to His disciples about this mystery

"And while they were at supper, Jesus took bread, and when He had blessed it, He broke it and gave it to His disciples, saying, 'Take and eat: This is My body.' And He took the chalice, and when He had given thanks He gave it to His disciples, saying, 'Drink of this, all of you. This is My blood of the New Testament, which will be shed for many for the forgiveness of sins. And I say to you: I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I shall drink it with you new in the Kingdom of My Father'" [Matthew 26:26-29]. What does this mean?

When the Son of God celebrated with His disciples that consummation by which He was to pass out of the world, no longer, as before, living among the events of the world but enduring the Passion of the cross in accordance with His Father's will, with supreme devotion He took the bread in remembrance of His body for human salvation. With all His longing He reminded His Father how He came forth from Him and wanted to return to Him, and prayed Him to consider whether it was possible, because of the weakness of

His flesh, for the chalice He was to drink to pass from Him; but this was not to happen. And therefore He blessed that bread in remembrance of the sweat of His body; for in the anguish of His Passion, as He submitted to His Father's command and was willing to die on the cross, He gave His body and blood to His disciples, so that they would not forget His example.

And he broke it for them; for that Passion was hard for His body to bear. But nonetheless He obeyed His Father and conquered cruel death by the death of His body; and so He showed that His body and blood were also to be given to believers in Him in the mystery of the oblation.

And He gave it to His disciples for true salvation, that they too might do such things in His name as He was doing for love of them; thus He was saying in a gentle voice, "You who humbly wish to follow Me, take with ardent love this example I leave you, My Passion and My works I have done at My Father's command, when He sent Me to teach and to manifest His Kingdom; and eat faithfully what I give you, for it is My body." What does this mean? "Eat My body, for you must imitate My works in your spirits and your flesh, whenever the Holy Spirit inspires them in your hearts, as a person swallows the food he is sending to his stomach; as you and all who wish to keep My precepts should follow Me in My works, so too you should eat My body."

And then the Son of God, taking for salvation the saving cup, gave thanks to His Father; for when the blood poured out from His side, grace was given to believers that was so strong that it conquered the ancient serpent, delivered lost humanity and strengthened the whole Church in faith. How? The Savior in the sweetness of His love gave His precious example to all His faithful, summoning them with gentle inspiration by saying, "Drink with confidence from this saving cup, all you who desire to follow Me faithfully, that for love of Me you may chastise your bodies by privation and restrain your blood by toil, and deny yourselves to strengthen the Church; even as I submitted Myself to the Passion, and shed My blood for your redemption, not thinking of the tenderness of My flesh but thirsting for your salvation. For this blood, which is shed for you, is not that blood of the Old Testament, which was shed in shadow, but My blood of the New Testament, which was given for the salvation of the peoples. How? I Who am the Only-born of My mother, the Son of the most pure Virgin, shed My blood on the cross to redeem people who contemplate Me by faith. And as I then gave it for the deliverance of the human race, so now I give it on the altar for humanity, to cleanse those who faithfully receive it.

"For in the Supper of My Passion I gave you My body and My blood to be eaten and drunk; and so now you may do the same on the altar in memory of Me. Therefore I unfold the truth and say to you, my faithful followers: I will not again drink this cup of anguish in this oppression I now suffer from the Jews until that day when I rise from the dead and Death is overthrown, and I bring in the day of salvation. Then I will drink with you the cup of your redemption and show you who are Mine your new reason for rejoicing: that the perdition of the ancient crime is taken away, and the Kingdom is opened to you that My Father has prepared for those who love Him. What does this mean? That by My death, which I suffered on the cross, you will know the salvation of souls; and when I ascend after My Resurrection, you will receive the Spirit, the Comforter, and you will newly understand true doctrine. And then for My name's sake you will endure many tribulations, and I will endure them with you; not because I will suffer any miseries in the body after this, as I did when I was in the world in the body, but because you will endure them in My name. Therefore I will endure them with you, since you are in Me and I am in you."

And thus, as was said, you who faithfully believe in Me shall receive the body and blood of My Son to wipe out your sins, so that, gladdened by this sacrament, you may attain supernal strength, as My servant David exclaims by My burning will, saying:

23 Words of David

"The earth shall be filled with the fruit of your works, bringing forth grass for cattle and green crops for the service of people, that you may bring forth bread out of the earth, and wine may rejoice the human heart; that faces may be gladdened with oil, and bread strengthen the human heart" [Psalm 103:13-15]. What does this mean?

O God, Whose magnificence is above everyone, by the faith that is the fruit of virtue in Your wisdom, and by which You are truly known, Man shall be filled; one who adheres to faith shall end the hunger of unbelief by taking the way of justice, though he had not known the truth before and had fainted from a dearth of rectitude. Now he will fulfil his mind's contrition by doing good works and offer to the simple, knowing their weakness, an example of humility. He will grow and flourish in virtue and show in abundant security a fertility of true righteousness, by which he will serve those who now long for earthly things. For he will labor to be useful to them, and by his services of support and defense lead faithful souls to heavenly joys, as do all who in their strength and protectiveness firmly defend those whom they are set to guard. And these works prevail in people by Your will, O God, so that when they are adorned with these virtues You may miraculously give them, out of the fruit of the pure fertility of the earth, the body of Your Son; as Your Only-Begotten, coming in the body out of the womb of virginal chastity, mercifully gave the bread of life to those who believe in Him.

And You perform a further miracle: that the blood of Your Only-Begotten, which was shed for the salvation of souls, gladdens the internal strength of people, their souls, by remitting their sins. How? Because, as once the body of Your Son was offered on the cross for the redemption of the human race, so now his flesh and blood are consecrated on the altar for the salvation of those who believe. And when this is miraculously accomplished in Your will, then this sacrament will gladden the face, which is to say the Church, sprinkling it with the oil of mercy. For those who believe and embrace mercy with joyous faith appear beautiful in the eyes of the Lord; and when the Salvation of the world hung on the cross and mercifully delivered humanity from the snare of the Devil, He also generously freed people from the bonds of sin, that they might faithfully believe in God with joyful and sincere hearts and never cease with devoted ardor to help the wretched.

And the faithful should burn in this love, so that the bread that offers life to its tasters may strengthen the minds of those who are wavering in inconstancy; and thus the purpose of their hearts may not decline to evil, but ascend in strength to that which is life.

24 This cleansing sacrament is to be worshipped by all up to the last

This bread is the flesh of My Son, which is obscured by no shadow of sin and clouded by no stain of iniquity, so that they who receive it are bathed with heavenly light in soul and body and cleansed by faith from their inner uncleanness. And therefore let there be no doubt about this most sacred flesh; for He Who formed the first man neither from flesh nor from bone is certainly able to produce the sacrament in this way. Therefore, O virginal Origin, You arise, grow, spread out and produce a great branch with many shoots from which to build the heavenly Jerusalem, beginning not in a man's semen but in a mystical breath. You are bound by no stain of sin at Your beginning, but developed in miraculous virtue, for You arose in an unplowed field, a flower so excellent that it will never wither from any accident of mortality, but in full freshness will last forever. Wherefore this sacrament of Your body and blood must be worshipped in the Church in a true service, until the last person to be saved by the mystery appears at the end of the world. For it comes from the secret mind of God to bring salvation to believers, as David testifies, saying:

25 Further words of David

"And He commanded the clouds from above, and opened the doors of Heaven, and rained down manna upon them to eat, and gave them the bread of Heaven. Man ate the bread of angels; He sent them provisions in abundance" [Psalm 77:23-25]. What does this mean?

VISION SIX

From the heights of Heaven the Celestial Father showed this to the patriarchs and prophets in the power of His glory and in the secrets of His mysteries to prepare human minds; for in the Holy Spirit they truly foretold His Son, and in the precepts of the Law, the blood of goats and other demonstrations they miraculously foreshadowed Him to the people. And thus, opening the sweetness and affection of His heart in mildness and burning charity, He sent them His Son, that through Him they might be refreshed from the hunger of unbelief and fed on heavenly things that would satisfy their faith and give them the fullness of happiness and beatitude. And so, when the Supreme Father sent those blessed refreshments in abundance of spiritual joy, through the humanity of the Son of God Man received that bread with whose sweetness the angels of Heaven who contemplate God can never be sated. And therefore let the faithful faithfully listen:

O you faithful people, who are the fruits of the Church! Listen and understand your souls' remedy, by which you are not children of the Devil but heirs of the celestial Kingdom; and consider how I, the mild and benign Father, have surrounded you with the manifold happiness of your salvation. Pay heed therefore to the goodness of your Father, by Whom the thing that will save you has been arranged, for though you are vile ashes the Humanity of My Son still implores for your salvation. How? My Son was born of the incorrupt Virgin, who knew nothing of any pain, but remained in the fresh purity of her integrity, like grass that flourishes in verdant glory when the dew falls on it from Heaven.

26 Why bread is offered in the sacrament of the altar

And because it was from the pure Virgin that My Son took on flesh without sin, it is fitting that His flesh should now be made from that fruit which is without the sap of bitterness. How? The grain of wheat is the strongest and best of all the fruits there are; it has in its stalk no sap or pith like other trees, but its stem rises to a spike that leads to the fruit, and it never produces bitter juice either in heat or in cold, but yields dry flour. So too the flesh of My Son was dry, with no filth of the human pollution that produces the human race through the lustful embraces of a man and a woman. Not so was My Only-Begotten born, for He came forth in verdant integrity as the stalk brings forth the clustered grains of wheat. For as a stalk of wheat, flourishing without pith, produces dry grain at the end of its pure spike, so too the Blessed Virgin, conceiving without male power, brought forth her most holy Son in simple innocence. He drew from His mother no sap of sin, because she conceived Him without the pith of a man; as the stalk gives no sap to the grain, because it flourishes not by the pith of a tree but by the sun and rain and gentle breeze. So the pure Virgin brought forth her Only-Begotten in sweet chastity, not because of a man but because she was overshadowed by the power of the Most High and imbued by the outpouring of the Holy Spirit.

BOOK TWO

Therefore, though the Virgin herself originated in the will of a man and a woman, she did not thus bring forth her Son, but without the will of a man bore in her wholeness Him Who came from Heaven, true God and purest Man. As she bore Him in her virginity to be pure and stainless, now the bread that is truly consecrated as His flesh and is pure in its integrity should be received by the faithful in purity of heart and without any element of contradiction. This I predicted to the children of Israel, as by My will it is written:

27 Words of Moses

“Remember this day in which you came forth out of Egypt, and out of the house of bondage; with a strong hand has the Lord brought you forth out of this place, so look that you eat no leavened bread” [Exodus 13:3]. What does this mean?

You who wish to be imitators of My Son, turn your eyes from death to life and keep in mind the salvation of that Day which is My Son, Who trampled death and gave life, so that you went forth from the wretched exile of perdition; you threw off the thick darkness of infidelity and tore yourselves away from the house of the Devil, to whom Adam’s transgression had given you. Turn your eyes from earthly to heavenly actions, for by divine power I the Lord have led you out of evil; I Who rule over all with such strength that no obstacle can stand against My might, but I sharply penetrate all things. So through My Son I have snatched you from the place where you shamefully lay in your wickedness, serving death by your infidelity instead of doing good works.

And now that you are freed in My Only-Begotten from that oppression, go from strength to strength and take care not to admit into your consciences the infidelity, which does not strengthen but bitterly weighs down your heart. What does this mean? Do not follow the arts of the Devil or the other fictions people devise for themselves, corrupted by philosophers, pagans and heretics; but imitate My Son as a mirror of faith, Who delivered you from the prison of Hell when He gave Himself for you to the suffering of the cross. And, that you may more carefully follow in His steps, strengthen your hearts with the celestial bread, and so with faithful devotion receive His body. For he came from Heaven and was born of the sweet and pure Virgin, and, by suffering for you on the cross, gave you His very self; so that now you may receive the sweet and pure bread, which is His body, consecrated on the altar by divine invocation, without any bitterness but with sincere affection, and thus escape from humanity's inner hunger and attain to the banquet of eternal beatitude.

28 Why wine is offered in the sacrifice of the altar

And in the wine that comes from the vine I also will show wonders, making it by the same invocation the sacrament of His blood. What does this mean?

The blood of My Son flowed from His side as the grape drips from the vine. And as the grape is trodden by feet and is crushed in the winepress, and sweet strong wine flows out to strengthen human blood, so too when My Only-Begotten in the sweat of His agony was bruised by blows and scourges, and pressed to the wood of the cross, noble and precious blood issued from His wounds and sprinkled the believing peoples with life-giving freedom. And the grape is unlike other fruits, which can be eaten out of hard shells, while people usually suck grapes rather than eat them; so too My Son was different from all other people in the matter of sin. For they are weighed down by wickedness and subjected to passions, while My Only-Begotten, miraculously born of the chaste Virgin, lacked all contamination of sin. Therefore, and because the grape is so delicate in texture, I will that wine should be consecrated as the blood of My Son.

For as wine flows out of the vine, so My Son went forth from My heart; and My Only-Begotten too was the true Vine, and many branches went forth from Him, for in Him the faithful have been planted who through His Incarnation are fruitful in good works. And as that liquor comes out of the sweetest and strongest fruit of the vine, all merciful and true justice appears out of the Incarnation of My Son, and all who faithfully seek Him find these virtues in Him. How? Those who faithfully cleave to Him are made by Him green and fruitful, so that they bring forth noble fruits of virtue; as He too, being sweet and mild, brought forth precious offshoots in holiness and justice and cleansed those who believed in Him from every stain of infidelity, as is written of Him in the Song of Songs:

29 Words of the Song of Songs

"A cluster of grapes of Cyprus is my beloved to me in the vineyards of Engedi" [Song of Songs 1:13]. What does this mean?

BOOK TWO

The Son of God, Who saved me the exile by His Passion, also mercifully gave me in His Resurrection the cup of life. How? As a cluster of grapes of Cyprus has in itself a strong fullness of drink, so too the excellence that is in God's Only-Begotten has in itself an unfailing magnitude, so that the Son of God will never be exhausted, but will always give the drink of life to those who thirst. For He is the Savior of Life. And we, who formerly fell short, now are strengthened by the manifestation and the knowledge of the true holiness of good works; and through Him we eat the food of life and go on through knowledge of God to life. In the Old Testament we endured great hunger and were unable to rise to salvation, for it was shadowed and did not show the full explanation but displayed many different meanings. But now we are satisfied, for we drink in Him the saving cup, tasting Who God is in true faith; Whom we cannot see with the outer and carnal vision, but Whom we have within by spiritual understanding, as strong wine shows its power in people's veins, though the people do not feel it but only know that it is within them.

And so the Bridegroom of souls is the cluster of grapes of Cyprus, Whose fruit will not fail. How? A blind man who has come in through the door asks for his sight. How? The person who did not have the vision of faith attains to faith and enters by the squeezing of the winepress into the dew of the blood of Christ. How? Just as we have life in our souls through His commands, so too we receive cleansing in our bodies through His gift; for we were born in Adam's transgression and are unclean, but in Christ's blood we are sanctified. Hence the betrothed soul says of Him in the Holy Spirit, "My Beloved, Who is sweet and lovable to my heart, is to me like strong wine in the full sanctification of His blood. For though I am unclean in that I am planted in flesh, as a vineyard lies in thorns when it is as yet uncultivated, He, the Fountain of Salvation, mercifully washes sinners clean of their stains and gloriously sanctifies them in His secret mysteries. As He came sweetly forth from the heart of His Father, He now sweetly displays His blood as wine; and as He was miraculously born of the Virgin, so His body is miraculously manifested in bread, for He is the cluster of grapes that will never suffer defect or loss."

And by the will of the Father He is trodden on the altar as if in the winepress, so that Man, who cannot subsist by himself, may not fall in his frailty and weakness. For as human blood is replenished by drinking, humanity is sanctified by the blood of the Son of God. And as people must refresh themselves by drinking lest their blood without watering dry up, so wine must not be lacking for consecration as the blood of the Son of God, but in the sacrament of that mystery will always be upon the altar.

VISION SIX

30 Why water must be present with the wine in the sacrament

But note clearly also, O human, that in this consecration water must be mixed with the wine, because blood and water issued from My Son's side; His Divinity is understood by the wine, and His Humanity is seen in the water. And thus, since there is both Divinity and Humanity in Him, there must be water and wine in that consecration; for as the wine symbolizes His Divinity, the water indicates His Humanity, which is pure and clean without the admixture of the blood of a man. For My Only-Begotten, the fountain of living water, when He came into the world for human salvation cleansed people by the regeneration of the Spirit and water from the ancient sin of Adam and transported them to Heaven, as it is written:

31 Words of Wisdom

"I, like a river channel and like an aqueduct, came forth from Paradise" [Ecclesiastes 24:41]. What does this mean? God strengthened Man with the faculty of reason and gave him many mystical gifts; breathing the breath of life into him, by reason he exalted him. But then he was seduced and was falling into death; so I, the Son of God, came to free him, flowing forth in the beauty of the stream of abiding charity and issuing in an outpouring of true and unfailing purity. I came forth from the secret place of celestial delight so that humanity, which was perishing because of its guilt, might be mercifully snatched from perdition. How? By pouring out for its sake in the agony of the Passion the unoffending blood of supreme innocence. How? When Adam transgressed and was expelled from Paradise, because he was guilty his blood was driven to overflow with anguish, and in that anguish was diluted and mixed with watery sweat. And thus water is present in human blood through sweating.

Therefore, O human, as the Only-Begotten of God began to be distressed in His body, when He willed to suffer for the human race, His blood came forth in drops of sweat; and later, when He hung on the cross, water flowed with blood from the wound in His side. And therefore, in the sacrament where the mystery of His Passion is celebrated, water must be present with the wine, because water and blood flowed from the wound in the Son of God's side. But in that sacrifice the wine must be more abundant than the water; for blood surpasses the liquid that dilutes it, just as milk exceeds the watery substance that moistens it. So let those who celebrate this mystery do so in the way that was shown them, as the people exhort who speak by My inspiration in the words of Wisdom, as it is written:

BOOK TWO

32 More from the Book of Wisdom

“Come, eat My bread, and drink the wine that I have mixed for you” [Proverbs 9:5]. What does this mean? You who wish to lay aside folly, come out of that ignorance which makes you disdain God, and that defilement which sent you into exile, and return into the pure place that is yours, shown to you in the mirror of faith in the fountain of living water; and with gentle devotion eat My bread, not sown in the field by a man or given growth by the earth, but issuing from God and remaining in Him. For as bread is eaten but earth is trampled, so the Son of God Who is the Living Bread excels the children of humanity; for the Son of God is steadfast in the power of His Divinity, while the children of humanity are unbalanced due to the weakness of their flesh. The Son of God, while physically in the world, did not have in His flesh any weak tendency to sin; for as a fire which bakes bread dries it and leaves no soft moisture in it, so the Only-Begotten of God, conceived by the mighty fire of the Holy Spirit and born of the chaste Virgin, had no contamination of sin in His body. And as bread nourishes people, the Son of God nourishes believers in faith, for He is the strong fruit that shall never fail.

Therefore, O ye faithful who eat this bread, drink also with pure purpose this wine, which is devoid of every uncleanness and which never enters that state of futility in which corruption devours noble innocence and turns it to poison.

33 Adam began with pure blood but his sin turned it to impure filth

When he was created, the first man was pure in this respect: He was not divided within himself but was pure in flesh and blood. But after he committed his transgression, he was ruined, and always after that poured out his blood in stinking and unclean adultery. For he had cast away his innocent honor, and therefore his blood lost its red color and was perverted in the act of conception into the liquid of pollution. In that liquid there is no form, until blood is engendered again; that blood takes on a new form, and after its beginning lies dormant, until it comes to its full strength and is secretly quickened to sensation. And then clean flesh and blood appear again, purified from poison, until it is struck by harmful heat, which produces the scum of uncleanness. But the Son of God was pure in respect to all these things: He had clean flesh and blood and was never touched by harmful heat, so that He remained in a holy and honorable state of verdant chastity, never profaned by contamination. But when He was in the agony of the Passion, He poured out water with the blood from His side; for blood is not poured out without water, but their proportions are such that the blood thickens the water rather than the water diluting the blood.

VISION SIX

34 Those who take Christ's body and blood are most sweetly vivified

Therefore, you who wish devoutly to worship God because you love salvation, receive this cup of sanctification; I have so tempered it for you with mild forgiveness that you will never feel harsh punishment. For in the supernal Son there is both Divinity and Humanity, and through His Passion you are delivered from death and quickened by His body and blood, so as to have a part in the eternal habitation. But I, Who am the Beginning and the End, again say to you, O human, that My noble Son is the flower of roses and lilies of the valley, born of the chaste Virgin who brought Him forth in wholeness, and that birth was such as to appease Me for the wickedness of the first parents of the human race, who by their transgression provoked Me to wrath.

Therefore, when I see My Son's body and blood daily consecrated on the altar in My name, and you, O human, being sanctified by that sacrament, eating His flesh and drinking His blood, I always contemplate that birth. For when the priest does his office as is appointed him, invoking Me in sacred words, I am there in power, just as I was there when My Only-Begotten, without discord or stain, became incarnate. Thus His body was pure and sweet and all-holy; and they who now faithfully receive His flesh and blood will be so sweetly enlivened that they will never be despised or rejected. As it is written in the Song of Songs:

35 Words of Solomon

"Who shall give you to me for my brother, sucking the breasts of my mother, that I may find you out of doors and kiss you, and no one will despise me?" [Song of Songs 8:1] What does this mean? With groans and devotion and with sure faith the people of the Church say, "Who will be merciful and give me, a miserable human in tribulation, You, the Bridegroom of the Church?—You, Whom I name my brother because of Your Incarnation, and Who sucks the mercy and truth that nourish humanity from the Divinity, which is my mother in my creation, giving me life and growth?" What does this mean? "The nourishments of the Church too are full of Your grace, for You Who are the Living Bread and the fountain of living water make her fully abound in the sacrament of Your body and blood. And this You do that I may surely find You out of doors, knowing that You are the Son of God in Heaven but seeing You as a man on earth, for my mortal eyes cannot perceive You in Divinity; and that I may find You in the bread and wine of the divine mystery, the sacrament without deception or artifice. And thus I may kiss You, for You were incarnate for my salvation, and You now make me a sharer in Your body and blood; no creature that is subject to You and follows Your precepts can despise me now for being a rebel against Your commands and opposing You, for You came into the world for my sake and have given me Yourself."

BOOK TWO

36 At the priest's invocation at the altar the sacrament is perfected

Now therefore, O human, as you see, when the sacrifice has been offered at the altar and the priest begins to invoke Me in those words appointed for him by the Holy Spirit, verily I say to you that I am there in My burning heat, and with full will I perfect that sacrament. How? To effect this mystery I extend over this offering My ardent charity at the moment when the priest invokes Me and remembers that My Son blessed bread and wine in the agony of His Passion as the sacrament of His body and blood, giving them to His disciples that they might do the same for the salvation of the people. Truly I say to you that there will never be an invocation over such an offering in remembrance of My Only-Begotten without the mystery of His body and blood being perfected in it; though the carnal eye cannot see it, as long as it is mortal dust, except by the perception of humble and devoted faith. How? As a bird sees that an egg has been laid in its nest; it eagerly flies to cover it and nurtures it with its warmth until the chick emerges; and then the shell remains, and the chick flies away. What does this mean?

When the offering of bread and wine has been laid on the altar and dedicated to My name in memory of My Son, I the Almighty miraculously illumine it with My power and glory and transform it into the body and blood of My Only-Begotten. How? By the same miracle through which My Son took on a body from the Virgin, the consecrated oblation becomes His flesh and blood. How? As when My Son lived in the world with people, He was also with Me in Heaven; and so now, living with Me in Heaven, He also remains with people in earth. But this is a spiritual and not a physical phenomenon.

37 God exercises the power of His will in every creature as He wishes

I the Father am present to every creature and withdraw Myself from none; but you, O human, do withdraw yourself from creatures. For instance, when you look into water, your face appears in it, but your reflection can exercise none of your powers, and when you turn away you no longer appear in the water. But I do not appear to creatures thus changeably; I am present to them in a true manifestation, never withdrawing My power from them but doing in them by the strength of My will whatever I please. And so too I truly display My majesty in the sacrament of the body and blood of My Son, and wondrously perform My miracles there from the beginning of the priest's secret words until the time when that mystery is received by the people.

38 The Mass may be said from the first to the ninth hour as necessary

And this priestly office may be done for the faithful from the first to the ninth hour of the day, according to the time made necessary by the habits of the people; for Adam arose in the morning and was seduced in the ninth hour, and the Passion of My Son began at daybreak and was completed in the ninth hour, when He expired on the cross and overcame Death by His death. And the Church stood by My Only-Begotten in that place and received her wedding gifts; and these must now be celebrated by the children of the Church.

39 All must communicate fasting except in danger of death

But this office of sacrifice is to be celebrated by the priests with empty stomachs and not in repletion, lest the digestion of the food destroy spiritual desire; spiritual feasting should precede physical refection, thus honoring the spirit and reviving the body. For this sacrament is to be received with spiritual desire, not with carnal greed, and therefore it should be taken fasting and not after a meal except in an emergency, if a person is thought to be about to leave the world. My Son gave His body and blood to His disciples around the end of the day and brought them the morning of true life; and at the end of the world, death will pass away from temporal humanity, and the elect will shine like the sun in My Kingdom.

40 God raised fallen Man and not the Devil because Man was tempted

Thus My Only-Begotten in His Resurrection drew the souls of the just out of Hell and restored the human race to eternal life, which the reprobate angels lost when without temptation by another they chose death; for they were seduced by no other tempter but themselves, since they had in themselves no taste of sin as a human has in his weak body. Therefore, Man, who was physically weak and seduced by a tempter, was restored to life by the Uplifter; but the Devil, who had not been hampered by a body, was left in his perversity. And Man was given true and salutary refreshment in receiving the body and blood of My Son; invisibly revived in soul by this sacrament, he can arise and manfully resist his invisible adversary.

BOOK TWO

41 In this sacrament not quantity but holiness must be considered

But let those who receive this sacrament in greater or lesser quantity understand that the receivers of more and of less have received the same amount of power, for the sacrament consists not in quantity but in holiness. It saves those who receive according to their faith, as is written of the manna:

42 Analogy of the manna

“And the children of Israel did so and gathered, some more and some less. And they measured by the measure of an omer, and the one who gathered more had nothing over, and the one who gathered less did not lack; but each had gathered according to what he could eat” [Exodus 16:17–18]. What does this mean? The children of election, who ardently desire to see God, long for the supernal sacrament as has been commanded them, and as their teachers instruct them they gather it in their hearts. And in their souls they scrutinize it as they have learned to do; but in their secret hearts one person has more devotion and another a lesser resolve, and in their thoughts they measure by the measure of what they feel in their souls. They determine how much faith in God they have, which is not divided but remains whole, and think about the degree and kind of devotion with which they receive the body and blood of their Redeemer. So this sacrament will not be holier for the one who receives more of it, or of lesser effect for one who receives less of it; but it will illumine the recipient according to his faith. Therefore, O human, it need not be taken in great quantity, for our mighty God is present as much in a small offering of this mystery as in a great one; so let those who receive it take care only that they have God, the Three and One, in their hearts with firm and perfect faith. And let each of the faithful collect the powers of his soul with sincere and righteous heart, as his capacity for faith permits, and beware of searching into Divinity more exaltedly or profoundly than his senses or thought can grasp, but do it soberly as the Holy Spirit teaches; let him be subject to the fear of the Lord, since Man is only poor ashes.

43 What is on the altar is the true body and blood of Christ

But do not doubt, O foolish people, that this sacrament which is thus manifested to you is the body and blood of My Son. Remember from what I created the flesh and blood of Adam—from earthly mud. How, then, does it seem to you: Is it easier for Me to make the flesh and blood of My Son from this oblation, or to make Man from the mud of the ground? A man pours forth semen from his blood, and a woman receives it; what else do they add?

VISION SIX

Nothing at all toward the formation or the body of the little baby; and who then forms the person in its flesh and bones and marrow and its beautiful face but I, the Father of all? But the father and mother have no power to make or create the little baby, except to send forth their blood in burning lust; after that they have no role in forming it. Can you see how it is done, when you cannot perceive the methods?

But you say, O human, "I do not see that this oblation is flesh and blood the way I see that a person is body and blood." To which I answer: You saw My Son in His body and blood when He was mortal on earth, as He is now immortal in Heaven; so you cannot see Him now with bodily eyes. Nor can you see how His flesh and blood are consecrated on the altar in a sacrament that exists for the glory not of a priest but of My Only-Begotten, Who did the office in the Supper with His disciples. As long as you are mortals, you cannot see Me in My glory; and so also with your physical eyes you cannot physically see the flesh and blood of My Son, because you cannot perceive that which is invisible, but with your mortal gaze can take in only that which is visible.

44 In the sacrament three things must be offered in honor of the Trinity

This sacrament must be offered to Me in three forms. What? Bread, wine and water, for the honor of the Trinity. If any of these three is lacking, the Trinity is not truly worshipped, for the Father is understood by the wine, the Son by the bread, and the Holy Spirit by the water. Thus one who offers wine without bread or water worships the Father but denies the Son and Holy Spirit; one who gives bread without wine or water holds the Son but casts away the Father and Holy Spirit; and one who uses water without wine or bread heeds the Holy Spirit but refuses the Father and the Son. One who gives wine and bread without water holds the Father and the Son but casts away the Holy Spirit; one who offers wine and water without bread worships the Father and the Holy Spirit but denies the Son; and one who uses bread and water without wine heeds the Son and the Holy Spirit but denies the Father. Therefore, let no division take place in this sacrament, as I, remaining undivided in Three Persons, am One Indivisible God; in the same way that thought, will and deed are in one human being, and without them that person is not.

45 A priest who neglects, refuses or forgets to offer these must be punished

But if there is a defect in the sacrifice, so that either bread or wine or water is left out of it, truly the one by whose neglect it happened will be liable to grave punishment. If it is done knowingly in negligent apathy, or faithlessly because of doubting unbelief, I will cast the guilty one out of My sight unless he comes to himself and punishes himself with severe penitence. And if it happens unknowingly through forgetful neglect, the guilty one will be answerable to Me for his fault and subject to penance, because he was not acute enough in ensuring that everything pertaining to My sacrifice was there. For when My Son hung upon the cross, nothing that pertained to salvation was lacking there, since He brought salvation to humanity by the outpouring of His blood; and so nothing must be absent in the celebration of His mystery. For this sacrament is the all-holiest sanctification, and so this flesh and this blood must be received with all faith and devotion.

46 How the body and blood of Christ should be distributed to the people

But let not anyone who receives this sacred flesh refuse to take the blood of the mystery too; for My Son is pure above all things and a mirror of virtue, and so His noble blood must be received. An exception is made if the recipient is weak in mind, and the priest fears the danger of spilling; in that case the recipient is given the treatment accorded to the simplicity of children, to whom bread is given and wine is denied. So let the sacrosanct flesh be granted to such a person, but the flowing blood be withheld, lest a greater danger arise from giving it; for the holy flesh is united with the blood and the blood with the flesh in one sanctity. But if the person has enough discernment to keep the mystery safe, when the sacred flesh is given him to eat let him also be given the blood of that flesh to drink.

47 The priest must use the vestments and words instituted by the Fathers

Let the priest who celebrates this sacrament take care to be clothed in those vestments that the early Fathers, instructed by the Holy Spirit, appointed to be worn at this office; and let him take great care to speak those words which the Holy Spirit gave those Fathers for the celebration of the mystery, and not omit anything from them, or go beyond the example of My Son when He took bread and the chalice and gave them to His disciples to eat and drink. One who unknowingly does something wrong in forgetful neglect as to vestments or words pertaining to this office must be corrected by a severe and salutary penance; but if he seeks My mercy he shall find it, for he did not perpetrate the transgression voluntarily in malice of heart. But if one transgresses knowingly in these sacramental rites, either from mental apathy or from wickedness of heart, I will be offended, and say to him:

VISION SIX

48 Words of the Lord to the negligent priest

“You wicked servant, why were you not rightly clothed in the priestly vestment, when your great early teachers instituted it for you in the Holy Spirit, and your spiritual office has the same meaning as the ministry of My angels to Me? And why have you ignored the form of words your fathers bequeathed to you in the Holy Spirit for the consecration of the body and blood of My Son and the salvation and glory of the human race?” And thus he who is guilty of such a charge must answer for it to Me, unless he punishes himself by inflicting on himself a severe penance.

49 The priest who offers the sacrament must take it himself

And let not a priest who offers this feast at My altar withdraw from it fasting himself, but let him receive his soul's refreshment in the body and blood of My Son. If he knows himself to be weighed down by grave burdens and unworthy of the feast, let him not presume to approach My table or touch My Son unwashed from the filth of his sins; as those people contaminated the table and the glory of the king's birthday who cruelly cut off the head of the shining light [John the Baptist]. Let the contaminated man therefore show the nature of his sickness to the High Priest, My Son, and accuse himself before another priest who is mortal; the latter will give him the remedy of comfort and penance, and so, purified at last, he may return to his office.

50 The priest at the altar must use the words instituted

But I, the Father of all, will that the secret order of sacred words by which the priest invokes Me at the altar must not be inflated and long, but as the ancient teachers rightly ordained it who taught how to address Me by the Holy Spirit. It should not be multiplied by foolish wisdom, but kept in simplicity of heart, for I delight not in long speech but in the purity of heart of those who seek Me devoutly and embrace Me willingly in burning charity. Everywhere else I give My grace to My elect by the exchange of the gifts of the Holy Spirit, but here in this sacrament I show Myself wholly: My Son in Me, and I in Him, and the Holy Spirit in Us, and We in Him, One in Divinity, as the body and soul and powers of anyone make up one living person. Therefore, let anyone who approaches this sacrament take care not to come in such a state as to offend the glory of Divinity.

BOOK TWO

51 On the five states of those who communicate

But you, O human, as other people approach the priest to receive the sacrament, notice five modes of being in them. For those who wish to receive the divine mystery from their priest should cleanse the five senses of their body from the dregs of their sins and worthily and laudably keep themselves from furtive uncleanness, that they may healthfully receive the sacrament.

52 Those who are bright of body and fiery of soul

Therefore, of those you see approaching this sacrament, some are bright of body and fiery of soul. For these are clear in faith about the sacrament and do not doubt that it is the true body and the true blood of My Son. And so, perceiving this by faith, they are strengthened and made holy in body, and because they are sanctified by this mystery they will appear in this same body in Heaven after the resurrection of the dead; and their souls are transformed and enkindled by the fiery gift of the Holy Spirit, so that, flooded with enlightenment, they reject earthly things and long for heavenly ones. How? As a fire is stirred to a blaze by the wind, they are inspired by this sacrament to burn with celestial love.

53 Those who are pale of body and shadowed in soul

But others seem pale of body and shadowed of soul. For these are weak in faith and do not firmly believe in this sacrament, but find it as hard to understand wisdom as a child whose deeds are done in foolishness. They hear outwardly with the hearing of the ear and perceive with sluggish hearts what is said to them about the sacrament, and would gladly embrace it in perfect faith; but because of the doubt that is in them they cannot understand the great holiness it has. Therefore too their inner being is plunged in darkness, for they cannot lift their minds to that perfection; conceived in sin, they are too borne down by the weight of bodily weakness to be perfect in belief, though their spirit may consent to it, and they would gladly have understanding of faith if their apathy of heart would let them.

And indeed those who are not yet weighed down in their deeds by grave burdens of sin should consent to the Spirit, even as it were unwillingly; for the soul is not yet destroyed by sin in such a case, and still has power to subject the body to its will. For the body and the soul fight with each other; the soul seeks to dominate the body, since the desire for sin in the flesh goes against its wishes, and the body disdains the righteousness that is the desire of the life-loving soul. What does this mean? What is dead longs for what is dead, and what is living desires what is living. How? The flesh loves sin, and the soul loves justice, and so they oppose each other and rarely agree. But as a child is fed and satisfied without working or understanding, so these people are revived by the sacrament almost in ignorance; for they do not madly or wickedly scorn it, but only embrace it with simple minds.

54 Those who seem hairy in body and dirty in soul

Some are hairy of body and seem dirty in soul, because they are pervaded with unclean human pollution; for they are evil and unchaste in flesh, shamelessly polluting themselves with the ordure of vice, and contaminating their souls with the stains of filthy human sin as a swine rolls its body in the mud. And because they do not fear to approach the sacrament of the body and blood of My Son unwashed after staining themselves with these vices, they must be cleansed from their presumption by a severe scrutiny. But when they are thus purged, I do not deny them My mercy, because I see worthy penitence arising in their minds.

55 Those surrounded in body by sharp thorns and leprous of soul

But others are surrounded in body by sharp thorns and leprous of soul. For these are surrounded in their hearts by anger, hate and envy, and by these thorns of iniquity they drive out of themselves gentleness, sweetness and charity; and, desiring evil and abandoning good, and troubling other people with mockery and invective, they make their souls as impure as if covered with terrible sores. And those who approach the divine mystery in such a state gravely injure themselves; but nevertheless, if they then bitterly punish themselves and seek My grace by repentance, I turn My eyes toward them.

56 Those bloody in body and foul as a decayed corpse in soul

And others appear bloody of body and foul as a decayed corpse in soul. For they make divisions among people with bloody hand and render their souls foul with the putrefying corruption of cruel wickedness; they have no thought of fearing Me, but in their cruelty reject the part I placed in Man. And if they do not fear to receive the body and blood of My Son while defiled by this contamination, they destroy themselves with severe wounds, for they presume to touch the sacrament in their uncleanness. But the fountain of salvation will still flow for them if they take care to wash themselves from this wickedness of theirs by worthy penitence.

BOOK TWO

57 Those who take the sacrament with pure faith and with wavering mind

And all these receive the same sacraments; and as they do, some are bathed in fiery brilliance, but the others are overshadowed by a dark cloud. For as believers approach to take the mystery of My Son's body and blood, those who are radiant with good deeds and receive it with devout mind and pure faith are illumined by the gift of the Holy Spirit for the salvation of body and soul; while those who eat it wallowing in bad deeds with contrary hearts and wavering minds bring on themselves the darkness of misfortune to their outer and inner detriment, because they have rashly presumed to unite themselves to sanctity while impure. For one who is so rebellious and stubborn that he does not fear to pollute himself, either by fornicating with himself by touching and pleasuring his own body, or by doubly fornicating in producing seed with a man or a woman, or by tearing himself with anger, hatred or envy of other people, or by staining himself with the blood of others in acts of murder, and who then presumes to approach the body and blood of My Son unpurified and uncorrected, without being purged by confession or rectified by penance, that one by his misdeed knowingly and consciously enters the fire of judgment. How? He will be tried as to his presumption and his sin like gold in a furnace, and no dust of that presumption will be left in him by which he approached the communion of the innocent Lamb polluted and uncorrected. For, as was said, whoever shall approach the holiness of My Son's body and blood unwashed and thus receive the sacrament will receive it to his own condemnation. How? As My most loving Paul says:

58 Words of the Apostle

"Therefore whoever shall eat this bread or drink this chalice of the Lord unworthily shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord. Let a person test himself, and then let him eat of that bread and drink of that chalice. For he who eats and drinks unworthily eats and drinks judgment on himself, not discerning the body of the Lord. Therefore are there many infirm and weak among you, and many sleep" [1 Corinthians 11:27-30]. What does this mean?

Truly I say to you, anyone who, being unworthy and foul with sin, eats the bread of life or receives the cup of salvation, which is the sacrament of Him Who is the Lord of Heaven and earth, shall feel himself at fault for it. How? Because he receives the body and blood of the Lord, the Savior of the world, snarling and dying; inclined to evil and polluted with uncleanness, he forgets the fear of the Lord and approaches the palace of healing redemption in a state of contamination. And so he commits murder there. How? By treating the sacrament presumptuously, concealing his crimes without cleansing or washing them by penance; and so with many wounds he tears himself to pieces.

Therefore I say to him: "O most miserable and most bitter one! How did you dare to cast your Lord, Whom the citizens of Heaven always long to see, into such a lake of misery? You will be tried in body and soul by bitter penance; and if you do not correct your guilt, you will still be found wanting after the resurrection of the dead." And so let anyone who wants to purge himself examine himself faithfully, and in that devout self-knowledge partake of the bread of sanctity and taste of the cup of sweetness, and so escape from the hunger of his soul's weakness and attain to the unfailing nourishment. For one who mistreats this sacrament and receives it unworthily, without purging himself from the filth of iniquity, passes on himself a sentence of vengeance for eating and drinking it unpurged; he cannot injure or obscure the mystery by his presumption, but he condemns himself. And when you presume to approach the sacrament when foul with vice, there are many infirm in your company, those who choose not to seek medicine for their souls in that holiness but impose on themselves bitter infirmity, receiving those sacraments to judgment; as well as other weak people, who are so infirm in God's law that they refuse to know Who He is Whom they are so unworthily receiving. What does this mean? They do not want to think how they should fear and worship their Lord, or how they should punish with bitter penance their flesh, which they have nourished on vice. And since they are so negligent, many of them fall asleep in forgetful neglect, not knowing or wishing to know how they should be lamenting their sins, as a sleeping person does not know or understand the state of his body.

Therefore, O human, if you receive the body and blood of My Son unwashed, not self-purified by confession or penance, in the terrible day of inquiry you will be tried for your presumption about your filthy sins, as new wine when it ferments throws off and is purged of the impurities in it.

59 The sacrament must be treated carefully by priest and people

This sacrament must be treated and guarded with great care and solicitude both by the priest and by the people, so that it does not fall to the ground by accident. For if due to apathetic neglect it falls to the ground, I in My wrath will avenge that arrogance either on the ground or on the person, unless that person punishes himself by penance and bitter blows; for flesh and blood must make restitution to flesh and blood. How? Human flesh and blood shall groan in that person because the flesh and blood of My Son have been carelessly treated by that person, as the earth quaked and people were shaken by fear when My Son gave up His spirit on the cross.

BOOK TWO

60 The mystical secrets of the Lord's body and blood must not be looked into

But if you, O human, say to yourself in your vacillating heart, "How did the oblation on the altar become the body and blood of God's Son?" I will answer you: Why, O human, do you ask this, and for what purpose do you inquire about it? Do I require you to know it? Why do you peer into My secrets about the body and blood of My Son? You should not seek out these things, but only keep them diligently and accept them in fear and veneration. Do not pause at this mystery any longer, for you must not tempt Me so rashly. What are these things to you? Only seek after Me by sure faith. For when I look into all your faith, I do not ask you to know what is the nature of the body and blood of My Son, or how this mystery is consecrated on the altar. And who asks you, O human, to stand in fire and not feel its burning? No one. So do not rashly peer into My secrets, lest you be wounded thereby. But if in your devout mind you wish to seek them, do so in diligent prayer and weeping and fasting, as your early Fathers certainly sought and often found them. And when you have thus sought and found, you will give what is left to the Holy Spirit.

But let those who approach those sacraments come not by devious paths but by the right way, lest they be cast out from them and suffer ruin in soul. How?

61 Churchmen who go in by wrong ways imitate the Devil, Baal and crucifiers

The evil deceiver who wrongly usurps the chair of the episcopal office without being elected or properly anointed, and the wicked robber who expels his pastor by the whispers of his henchmen and violently invades his throne, will either undergo grave expiation by their own will or incur serious condemnation by My wrath. For they are in the worst possible state of bitterness, imitating the one who wanted the highest honor for himself and was cast out of glorious happiness into death, and following Baal, who so deluded himself that he wrongly named himself a god and was given over to destruction. And if in their lying and presumptuous wickedness they pretend to confer My holy orders, those who receive from them ordure rather than orders are accounted in My sight no more than those who are jestingly appointed by children in their games to be laughed at by people. As this kind of thing is nonsense among people, so what these intruders pretend to do in their deceit is mockery to Me.

Thus their edifice is wicked and cannot stand, for it is a void. And if they appeared to set up anything in My temple in holy orders, it must be abolished, for it has no righteousness and is thus worthless. Let them, therefore, turn back from their temerity, lest they share the punishment of him who sought more than he should have and was thrown from the summit into the abyss. And the butcher who insanely approaches My altar without the anointing of the priestly office, as if I were as great an impostor as he is a jester, and rashly touches the table consecrated to My name to offer the sacred oblation without having the qualifications, does not fear to wound My Son with dire torment. How? As the unbeliever assails God with his incredulity, and the madman in his insanity runs into burning fire, so this one, not knowing that I am God or feeling My burning fire, casts off his fear of Me and does not love My mercy; but, with unanointed lips, he dismembers those words My Only-Begotten gave His bride when He dowered her with His body and blood, and thus wounds My Son. And it will be said to this rash attacker: "Who touches My Son, so arrogant and unanointed?"

But he who thus approaches My altar and presumes to invoke My Son with the secret words tries to wound Him not because he can put him to any pain, but because he fearlessly and presumptuously touches Him. If he persists without penitence in this contempt, he will stand in the place of punishment among those who causelessly wounded My Son. Lest he feel these torments, then, let him adopt as his own the lamentation of affliction and never again presume to approach the ministry of My altar. And let those who hold some church office that involves serving under a priest never presume to usurp his ministry unjustly, for if they wrongfully claim that righteousness for themselves, they may justly be judged unformed and rough and rejected for the construction of the edifice of the Church. For I will that My ministers shall be pure in My sight, without deceit and without stain. How? They should be duly chosen to approach My altar, and once there they should serve Me without impurity. How?

62 Priests should observe chastity like the apostles

Let them not look to an earthly marriage, for they have chosen a spiritual one. How? By entering upon My service. And if any of them suffers from the burning lust of the flesh, let him subdue his body with abstinence and fasting and chastise himself with cold and scourging. And if after all he defiles himself with a woman, let him fly from that contamination as from a burning fire or a deadly poison and cleanse his wounds with bitter penance; for I wish to be served in chastity. How? Because My Son was the height of chastity, and He represented in Himself all ecclesiastical ranks. How? Those that serve, proclaim, preach and offer. How? He touched service in His circumcision, proclaimed by His prophecies, preached Himself to humanity, and at last offered Himself as a living sacrifice on the altar of the cross. And He gave Himself as a burnt-offering in chastity; so let those who seek to offer a burnt-offering to Him on the altar imitate His chastity.

BOOK TWO

They must not only guard chastity in others but preserve it in themselves. How? As a priest should keep himself from contamination with a woman, let him also keep himself from himself; let him take care not to arouse defilement in himself by the touch of his hands, so that the clamor of lust may not make a sinful tumult within him. For the crime of Adam, which brought death to Man, aroused his senses to fornication; so let people restrain their flesh so as not to undergo a shameful death. How? My Son conquered death and gave them life; and since He assumed flesh in the integrity of virginal chastity, those who desire to serve Him ought also to be chaste, as is written in the divine command:

63 Words of Moses on this subject

“Be ready against the third day, and come not near your wives” [Exodus 19:15]. What does this mean? You who wish to serve God alone, be prepared with willing hearts for the day of His serenity, when the holy and ineffable Trinity will truly appear and show Its wonders in a great miracle. And if you wish to be worthy to draw near to Him, take care not to join in carnal unions of physical love, so as not to mingle your blood with blood that is deemed weaker. You, O My priests and other ministers, who fight under a spiritual name, beware of this, for the apostles to whom you have succeeded did not divide themselves between opposites or leave you such an example.

64 A priest should not have two marriages

For I do not want priests to have two unions, one of spiritual and one of carnal desire; the priest should be married to the justice of God, and treat it as his wife, with which to nourish and teach the rest of the people as a father brings up and teaches his children. How is it appropriate for a priest to maintain in the right proportions two different and opposing marriages? How? One carnal and the other spiritual.

65 How the Devil may be the priest of bad priests

The priest is the pastor and father of the people who have physical marriages; so if he has one to the same extent, who will be his priest? No other priest could be his superior, since all priests are ministers of a single office, except the Devil, who is appropriate as his priest because he has imitated the Devil in hiding poison under honey. How? As the Devil hides evil under good, so do such priests, who love their own dishonor better than chastity, try to hide a carnal union under a spiritual marriage, like poison under honey. But, since My Son is wholly chaste, those who touch His body and blood on the altar should also love chastity, as it is written:

VISION SIX

66 Words of the Law on this subject

“A priest shall not take to wife a harlot or a base prostitute or a woman repudiated by her husband; for he is sacred to his God and offers the bread of God” [Leviticus 21:7–8]. What does this mean? Let one who is appointed to offer sacrifice to God not love the Devil, the common author of all filth and wickedness, or degrade his senses in such a way that when he tries to bear My yoke he will instead have to follow the will of his flesh, contrary to the justice of God and the examples of the ancient saints; lest he come by bad deeds to the impurity that was spurned by those ancient fathers, who knew it to proceed from the breath of the ancient serpent. Let him therefore leave this filth and become a lover of the righteousness of God; for he is sacred to God in holiness, and thus removed from carnal desire and the deeds that bring children into the world. And so, sober and unpolluted, he may offer that bread which is placed on the table of consecration for human salvation. What does this mean? That sacrifice, which is the life of the living and the refreshment of souls and the mirror of all the virtues, which shine in holy innocence through chastity, is free from every stain; and therefore those who offer the sacrifice should be free of filthy pollution and hold themselves back from feasts and drunkenness, jesting and laughing, and light and undisciplined behavior. Let them be held in the reverence that becomes successors of the ancient fathers who set them up and in the dignity proper to their honorable patrons. So let them not live doubly in two roles, and walk at the same time in the secular and the spiritual way; for it is hard to serve two masters at once, as My Son testifies in the Gospel, saying:

67 Words of the Gospel on this subject

“No one can serve two masters” [Matthew 6:24]. What does this mean? No one who is clothed in mortal flesh can offer two masters similar and equal service, because of the weakness of his senses and his body. What does this mean? He cannot serve at once the Lord of Righteousness and the lord of injustice. Why? Because righteousness casts out injustice, and injustice as-sails righteousness. And so too a priest cannot at once and with equal devotion have the handmaid and the mistress, carnal marriage and spiritual companionship, for these two cannot exist side by side in perfection; for the carnal assails the spiritual, and the spiritual bears down the carnal. Thus My friend Paul, knowing this to be so, shows My will when he says:

BOOK TWO

68 Words of the Apostle on this subject

“A bishop therefore should be blameless, the husband of one wife” [1 Timothy 3:2]. What does this mean? One who is superior to others in a spiritual office must regulate his life so that no scandal of offense or reproach will be found in it. How? A priest should not have two roles and be at the same time the husband of a physical wife and of a spiritual spouse; but he should be the husband of one wife, namely the holy Church, which is one in My Son because she arose as one Church in Him. But though the Church is one, she has many husbands, entering into marriage with the priests of My Son who are daily in His service; yet she remains an intact virgin, for in her the faith is uncorrupted. And therefore Paul, My vessel, did not say she was the wife of one husband; for she is joined in marriage to all those priests who will arise in My Only-Begotten till the last day, when the immortal and unfailing nuptials will take place. And those who minister to the altar under the priests are also husbands of the same wife, as Paul said, offering My faithful doctrine to humanity:

69 Again Paul on this subject

“Let deacons be the husbands of one wife, who rule well their children and their houses” [1 Timothy 3:12]. What does this mean? Let those who render service to the priests and assist them be the husbands of one wife by faithful marriage. And who is this wife? The chaste Bride who can be injured by no corruption, as a woman is corrupted when she loses the flower and innocence of virginity, which she had at the beginning of her marriage when not yet corrupted by her husband. So let these bridegrooms live so faithfully with this righteous wife as to offer good examples of virtue to those regenerated by their help in the Spirit and water; let them live to labor in their office, which lies within the rampart of the Church, with faithful care, as a secular man devotes his care to maintaining his children and his house.

For My friend Paul displays that Bride to the priests and the other ministers of My altar so that they will choose her as their wife and not seek a carnal spouse. For neither Paul nor My Son's other disciples nor the rest of the Fathers who were their followers ever served as an example to them that they should take a carnal spouse and desert the spiritual wife, who had been their first choice. For a priest who is so stubborn in sin that he does the will of his flesh and illicitly takes a wife commits adultery; for he deserts his true wife, the Church, who was betrothed to him by his spiritual office, and as his will pleases unchastely marries another. It may be difficult for him to restrain his ardor, but let him restrain himself from these desires for the sake of heavenly love, as My Son shows in the Gospel, saying:

70 The three kinds of eunuchs

“There are eunuchs who were born so from their mothers’ wombs; and there are eunuchs who were made so by other people; and there are eunuchs who have made themselves eunuchs for the Kingdom of Heaven’s sake. He that can receive this, let him receive it” [Matthew 19:12]. What does this mean? There are some men who have come forth from their mothers’ wombs with a bodily coldness or impotence, which makes them unable to have wives; and so they will receive no reward for this continence, except in suffering no penalties for the deeds of sin they did not do. And there are some men who are maimed in body by the will of others, and so cannot give pleasure to their flesh in the deeds of marriage; but they also do not deserve praise for containing themselves, for although they cannot do the burning deed they often burn with wickedness in their wills. And there are other men, those who take the spiritual way, who deprive themselves of what their bodies might easily accomplish, because they scorn and reject carnal bonds for the glory of the celestial inheritance; and these shall have the greatest praise and the blessed reward.

And My priests and all who do service to My altar should imitate these last with all their hearts, that they may receive the crown of continence amid the rapture of celestial joy. So if a person can follow this example in his heart, desiring beatitude enough to conquer the body and cast out carnal desire, let him with ardent devotion repress his flesh and abandon the idea of carnal union; and so he will capture heavenly companionship.

71 He who cannot contain himself must not become a priest or minister

But he who cannot contain himself, and burns with carnal desire, should not become a priest or any other kind of minister for the sake of pride or avarice, lest he then fall into carnal delights and so sustain great damage. For those who approach My altar as ministers shall keep their bodies from contamination with women, and never for any reason enter into marriage, but voluntarily keep themselves chaste in My righteous service. If they are otherwise, they should avoid the holy service of My altar.

BOOK TWO

72 Why the primitive Church let married men become priests but does not now

It is true that certain people who had previously subjected themselves to the world were at one time allowed to minister. But these were people who had received the carnal yoke before and not after entering My service; and afterward they cast off this yoke, and then the Holy Spirit by His miracles brought about in them praise and celebration. This was granted as an unusual measure at the beginning of the Church's rise, because there were so few priests; but now the Church is adult and strong, and her ministers are many. This is like Church opinion on another prohibition of the same sort: At the beginning of the world it was granted to men to marry women most closely related to them, because there were so few people, whereas now that people are so multiplied it is forbidden. For the shapeless and rough stones are customarily laid in the foundation of a building, and afterward the beautiful and well-formed stones are chosen for the walls. And so in the Church's infancy the priests who were available were installed in office, but now the whole complement can be obtained among the spiritual people who are fitted for the priesthood, not being occupied with the secular burden of earthly bonds. For it is not fitting that the father of a family, following the rules for earthly marriage, should be called as My messenger in the priesthood. Therefore hear this comparison:

73 Analogy of the king

A certain very powerful king gathered a small army and carefully observed its performance. Seeing that it was untrained in an army's business, he chose out of it some men of the common people whom he perceived as suitable for leadership, and set them over the army, for the offspring of the nobles had not yet matured. But later, when the army was larger and there were adult noblemen in it, the king set that army in order and promoted dukes and counts from the nobler classes to command it, as justice required. What does this mean?

The King of Heaven, Whose power is over all, started the Church by gathering a little army of believers. Scrutinizing it most closely, He saw that it was as yet infirm and weak with regard to suffering in body for His name; so He set Peter over it to bind and loose, who had been one of those who had lived an earthly life. And after Peter, He cleansed others who had imbibed the taste of the earthly and been stained by temporal things, and set them up in the office of judgment and mercy; for He knew that, having embraced the Catholic faith, they were wise and faithful both in caring for souls and in sustaining bodies. For the glowing dawn that burns up human contagions in the fire of love for chastity had not yet diffused its flowers of sweetness widely among people. But now the churchly race has been multiplied and widely disseminated through the whole length of the world, and the glory of the Church's honor has been nobly strengthened; and so the supernal King has benignly and fittingly bestowed both secular and spiritual gifts on people, and chosen those who most honorably preserved their sobriety and chastity by Church law and God's justice to be priests and other ministers of the divine offices.

Wherefore, O human, many spiritual people have now arisen who want to fight the world and the Devil, and who hasten to approach My altar in chastity and bodily restraint; and so I will that My priests should appear in My sight uncontaminated by earthly marriage. For in the Old Testament priests were commanded to keep themselves from contamination with women when they approached My altar; and in the New Testament that command was brought to full perfection for My priests, so that whereas the ancient priests observed chastity for an hour, these new ones will fulfil it from the beginning of their boyhood to the end of their old age. And as I refused to receive the sacrifice from the ancients when polluted by connection with women, much more do I want My Son to be handled by the new priests only in a state of chastity.

74 Immature and unconsecrated men must not receive churches

Let no one who is immature and unconsecrated receive a church; and let him not presume to seek several churches. For if one who is young in years and without priestly consecration dares to take a church or, having one, tries to subjugate several, he is a transgressor against justice and a destroyer of strict judgment; he is like one who dares to commit fornication before the lawful time and without lawful marriage, or who has a legitimate wife but hastens to defile himself in adultery with other women.

75 Priests should be elected by Christian people from the good and healthy

Priests of wise thoughts and manly minds are to be chosen from every people that calls itself Christian, such that they will come to My service in right order with proper anointing and willing mind. Those who are crippled in any of their members should not approach the office of My altar, for in the Kingdom of Heaven there will be no trace of disabilities in human souls; and therefore I do not want anyone defective in limb to stand at My altar. But these will not be separated from the Kingdom of Heaven because they are weak in body and defective in members, as long as their souls are healthy and they seek Me in the purity of good works. I do not wish, however, that they should take part in the ministry of My altar, but that they should humbly fulfil their virtue in good works.

BOOK TWO

76 Women should not approach the office of the altar

So too those of female sex should not approach the office of My altar; for they are an infirm and weak habitation, appointed to bear children and diligently nurture them. A woman conceives a child not by herself but through a man, as the ground is plowed not by itself but by a farmer. Therefore, just as the earth cannot plow itself, a woman must not be a priest and do the work of consecrating the body and blood of My Son; though she can sing the praise of her Creator, as the earth can receive rain to water its fruits. And as the earth brings forth all fruits, so in Woman the fruit of all good works is perfected. How? Because she can receive the High Priest as Bridegroom. How? A virgin betrothed to My Son will receive Him as Bridegroom, for she has shut her body away from a physical husband; and in her Bridegroom she has the priesthood and all the ministry of My altar, and with Him possesses all its riches. And a widow too can be called a bride of My Son when she rejects a physical husband and flees beneath the wings of My Son's protection. And as a bridegroom loves his bride with exceeding love, so does My Son sweetly embrace His brides, who for love of chastity eagerly run to Him.

77 Men and women should not wear each other's clothes except in necessity

A man should never put on feminine dress or a woman use male attire, so that their roles may remain distinct, the man displaying manly strength and the woman womanly weakness; for this was so ordered by Me when the human race began. Unless a man's life or a woman's chastity is in danger; in such an hour a man may change his dress for a woman's or a woman for a man's, if they do it humbly in fear of death. And when they seek My mercy for this deed they shall find it, because they did it not in boldness but in danger of their safety. But as a woman should not wear a man's clothes, she should also not approach the office of My altar, for she should not take on a masculine role either in her hair or in her attire.

78 God will judge all perpetrators of fornication, sodomy and bestiality

Let those who approach My altar appear in My sight in chastity, as also should those who desire to receive the sacrament of the body and blood of

VISION SIX

My Son, lest they should fall into ruin. For many are found among both spiritual and secular people who not only pollute themselves in fornication with women but also assume a heavy burden of condemnation by contaminating themselves in perverted forms. How? A man who sins with another man as if with a woman sins bitterly against God and against the union with which God united male and female. Hence both in God's sight are polluted, black and wanton, horrible and harmful to God and humanity, and guilty of death; for they go against their Creator and His creature, which is in them. How?

God united man and woman, thus joining the strong to the weak, that each might sustain the other. But these perverted adulterers change their virile strength into perverse weakness, rejecting the proper male and female roles, and in their wickedness they shamefully follow Satan, who in his pride sought to split and divide Him Who is indivisible. They create in themselves by their wicked deeds a strange and perverse adultery, and so appear polluted and shameful in My sight.

And a man who sins with a woman by this same method of perverted fornication is a voracious wolf of wickedness. How? A person would seem perverted and harmful to other people if he threw away beautiful clean food and ate the ordure that comes out of the body in digestion; and these are in My sight equally unworthy and unclean, since they forsake the proper way of uniting with a woman and seek in her an alien sin. And a woman who takes up devilish ways and plays a male role in coupling with another woman is most vile in My sight, and so is she who subjects herself to such a one in this evil deed. For they should have been ashamed of their passion, and instead they impudently usurped a right that was not theirs. And, having put themselves into alien ways, they are to Me transformed and contemptible.

And men who touch their own genital organ and emit their semen seriously imperil their souls, for they excite themselves to distraction; they appear to Me as impure animals devouring their own whelps, for they wickedly produce their semen only for abusive pollution. And women who imitate them in this unchaste touching, and excite themselves to bodily convulsions by provoking their burning lust, are extremely guilty, for they pollute themselves with uncleanness when they should be keeping themselves in chastity. Hence both women and men who elicit their own seed by touching themselves in the body do a filthy deed and inflict ulcers and wounds on their souls; for they will not keep themselves in a state of chastity for love of Me. What does this mean? When a person feels himself disturbed by bodily stimulation, let him run to the refuge of continence, and seize the shield of chastity, and thus defend himself from uncleanness. How? Let him cast out the tares from the wheat, which is to say, let him separate the clamor of lust from the sweetness of chastity.

BOOK TWO

And whoever thus casts out of himself the taste for lust is very sweet and lovable to Me. But, O humans, you cast away chastity and love lust when you fornicate not only with other people but even with animals; thus you send your seed not into what lives but into what is dead, and you forsake what is equal to you and desire what is subject to you and serves you. Therefore the elements cry out against you, saying, "Alas, alas! our rulers join with us in the mingling of their seed!" And thus they show their grief at My anger against your deeds. Why then do you, knowing yourselves human, convert your intelligence into bestial stupidity? Did I create you to join with animals? Never. And when you unite with them, the guilt of the most bitter crimes falls upon you, because you scorn the plan I made for the joining of male and female. For whoever transforms himself by his deeds into a depraved follower of his own desires, and pours out his semen with an animal, brings on himself great ruin, as Satan cast himself down by his perversity when he tried to be like God.

Therefore, all you who contaminate yourselves with perverted pollutions, resist your desires; chastise your bodies, and give yourselves over to true and bitter penance with weeping and fasting and torture of your flesh and severe blows, lest you send yourselves impenitent into an excess of cruel guilt.

79 Pollution that occurs in sleep

I want men not only to keep themselves clean of impurity while awake, but also to purify themselves properly from the pollution that happens to them in sleep. For if the semen of a man who sleeps and dreams is stirred up unawares, I do not want him to approach the sacramental office of My altar in that condition of ardent heat; he should first calm that ardor in himself, as it is written:

80 Words of Moses on this subject

"If any man among you is defiled in a dream by night, he shall go forth out of the camp, and not return until he washes himself with water in the evening, and then he shall return into the camp after sunset" [Deuteronomy 13:10-11]. What does this mean? If among the laborers in My service there is anyone who is defiled in a dream while he sleeps at night, he should separate himself from the company of those who serve My altar and not presume to join in the mystery until his injurious heat has passed and he has cleansed himself from the fire of his lust in the bath of penance, with confession and compunction of heart. And after that penance has done its work and illumined his heart, let him return in love of chastity among those who faithfully defend themselves against impurity, and worthily and honorably approach that sacrament, which is wholly in sanctity.

81 One who burns strongly should not add flame to his fire

But one who burns strongly in lust either asleep or awake should take care not to add flame to his fire. How? Let him not inflame himself by those foods that stir up lust. He should humbly abstain from the flesh of animals that come forth from their mothers naked and without covering, that is, beasts; for there is a fire of heat in them that is not as great in the flesh of birds, which are not born uncovered but as an egg covered with a shell, and therefore have less inflammatory power. And he should also abstain from excessive wine, lest by too much drinking his veins become filled with noxious blood and wickedly heated with ardent fire.

82 One who is weighed down by vices should seek God's mercy in confession

But if anyone labors under too great a number of these tendencies and is not able to resist them by himself, let him with devoted purpose seek Me and humbly uncover to Me the wounds of his heart. How? Let him lay bare these wounds to Me by making a humble confession to a priest. And why this? Because true confession is a second resurrection. How? The human race was slain by the fall of the old Adam; the new Adam by His death raised it up. And so the resurrection of souls arose in the death of the new Adam. And so a person should confess his sins, as the old Adam did not; for he concealed his transgression instead of confessing it. How? He did not confess it by repenting, but concealed it by accusing the woman. Hence confession was instituted, to raise people up after they fall. And so anyone who confesses his sins to a priest for love of Me rises again from death to life; as the woman who purged herself from her impurity with tears at the banquet in the presence of My Son was snatched away from uncleanness.

83 The remedy of purgation was long prefigured in the ancient fathers

This remedy of purgation was long prefigured in the ancient fathers. How? Before the Law the patriarchs and prophets were the consolation of humanity; under the Law the high priests and the ordinary priests were its instruction; and then the apostles came and brought true righteousness in My Son, so that many people hastened to them and devoutly implored their help. And thus from the time of Adam to the time of the apostles there were always some who by celestial inspiration consoled and instructed people and helped them in their miseries. And the apostles also showed people, by their preaching and many miracles, that Man had fallen by the Devil's tempting into death and could never rise again by himself, but was snatched from death by My Son. How? By His being in the world and performing many labors in the body, and at last being nailed to the cross for the world's redemption.

So faithful people, to gain salvation, should follow this pattern with their priests. How? They should seek the help of My Son, because when they repeat the ancient crime of Adam after baptism they cannot rise from their fall by themselves. And therefore they should seek counsel as if from the patriarchs and prophets, and derive instruction as if from the high priests and the ordinary priests, and accept help as if from the apostles, laying bare their wounds and displaying their sins truly and purely. How?

They should confess their sins to the priest, who is the minister of My Son, with devoted heart and mouth. And then the priest will give them a remedy of penance and bury their sins in the death of My Only-Begotten. And then they will rise again to life and glorify the Resurrection of My Son.

84 One who refuses to confess his sin deceives himself

But one who refuses to lay bare the wounds of sin, and follows his own wishes by trying to cure them himself in silence without the help of another, is deceiving himself. For he wishes to be his own priest, but without the help of another he cannot rise; as Man did not rise up and stand by himself but was saved by My Son. Hence let one who desires to be saved never despair of confessing his sins, even at the end of his life.

85 A dying man without a priest may confess to another person or to God only

And if someone in the hour of death seeks a remedy for his wounds of sin but does not have a priest near to whom to confess them, let him show them to any other person who is there at the time; or, if he is dying so suddenly that there is no one there, let him lay them open to Me with his heart's utmost affection, while he is still in the body with which he did them, and I will regard the devotion of his heart and not reject his penitence.

86 No one should despair at the weight of his sins

Therefore, let no one despair because of the weight of his iniquity; for if he despairs of My mercy, he shall not rise again to life. One who struggles with despair and at last reduces it to nothing has delivered himself; he has been strong, and manfully conquered. But one whose mind is so inflamed that he does not seek the remedy of salvation is not to be helped; for when he could have found Me, he refused to seek Me. And so, let each person not neglect himself while he has time, but seek the refuge of pure confession, as My Son commanded the leper in the Gospel, saying:

VISION SIX

87 Words of the Gospel

“Go, show yourself to the priest, and offer your gift, which Moses commanded for a testimony to them” [Matthew 8:4]. What does this mean? You who are foul with sins and want to cleanse yourself of them, go with good intention and show them to the priest, My minister, by pure confession; and offer with devout heart the gift of true penitence, which by God’s will was foreshadowed by the man who was removed by divine power from the many floods of earthly iniquity. And thus those who formerly saw you befouled with evil deeds may now testify that you are purged from them by bitter penitence as in the furnace of trial. But, O human, if a sinner conceals his deeds in his secret heart, who will be a witness to his penitence? No one. Therefore let each person manifest his sins, that he may have a witness to his penitence.

88 Sins should be blotted out by alms and by bodily satisfaction

And let one who desires to practice penitence for his sins turn to alms as a source of help. How? When a person’s weak body falters in the work of penitence, his alms will hasten to help him. And because it is hard for a person to practice penitence with just and proper harshness, let him take alms as his mother, so as to accomplish with her what is so laborious for his body. For a mother does not cease to help her child in time of need, even when he has been brought up already; and so too alms give aid to a weak body when a person is penitent, even if he seems to be strong in doing penance and punishing his body. So let a person punish in his body the evil works he has done in his body through the lust of the flesh, so as to wash away from his body by bitter penance the deeds that were dear and sweet to his flesh. For bitter penance, with its helpmeet alms, heals in people the deadly wounds of sin. How? A person represses himself by castigation, but he can refresh himself by alms. How? Because alms represent My mercy. How? When a faithful person helps the poor with his substance for love of Me, he keeps My commandments, because he devotes his mercy to the needy for the honor of My name; just as I do not withdraw My grace from those who seek me in purity of heart. And whoever helps the poor in this way, refreshing them with alms for mercy's sake, is exceedingly lovable to Me, for he has a merciful heart; which fulfils what is written:

BOOK TWO

89 Words of the Book of Wisdom

“Place your treasure in the commandments of the Most High, and your alms shall bring you more profit than gold” [Ecclesiastes 29:14]. What does this mean?

Think justly and rightly, and take some of your material wealth, which you hold in your bosom and embrace in your heart; as the One Who is above all people commands, divide it, for God has ordered you to turn aside from evil and do good. Let your heart's good will overflow, so that you will not be among the lost sheep; sanctify yourself before God by giving of your substance to refresh those in want, and God will give you His mercy in your misery. And if you do this, the compassion you have on one without treasure will be worth more to you than if you could ascend a high mountain and in your pride possess its gold. How? Because it is better for you to give a little to the little ones in humility than to possess and enjoy the kingdom of the world; if you did the latter, God's reward of mercy could never be yours because of the weight of your pride, for you would not have had pity for the poor in your heart.

90 The elements of the world are the pit of human pleasures

Hence the elements are the pit of human pleasures, as they show by their ways. How? By bringing God's vengeance upon those who are sinning. Therefore, O human, renounce the empty avarice which will wreck you, for your true inheritance is eternal life; leave evil and do good, and so renounce harsh malevolence. And, to follow the way of mercy, give of your substance to the poor, and thereby imitate God Who is merciful.

91 One who gives or receives alms must not do so in vain

Therefore, O human, no liar can deny that you who thus help the poor are fulfilling My will. How?

You should give your alms to the poor as I mete out My grace to you. But let not those who receive alms take them vainly or avariciously. What does this mean? There are many who love laziness and do not want to labor with their bodies to feed themselves, or to do good works with their spirits to help their souls; they are like the beasts, who understand justice neither with their souls nor with their bodies. And if they persevere in this, without correction and without penitence for their apathetic wickedness, they are unworthy in My sight. But there are also many who suffer bodily necessity and receive alms in fear of Me, and pray and work for those who weigh out mercy to them, and avoid filthy and evil deeds. And among these are many from whom I have withdrawn earthly riches in order to give them celestial wealth.

92 Seekers of poverty, riches and honor are rewarded by their intention

Those who gladly suffer poverty for My name's sake are extremely lovable to Me; but those who are greedy and would gladly possess earthly riches but cannot lose the reward of this labor. And one who seeks riches in order to satisfy not his greed but My will has a good intention, and I will reward him with honor. One who desires the power of an office for his own boastful pride and not for the glory of My name is to Me like a putrid corpse; but one who seeks it desiring from it not his pride but My honor will be glorious in My kingdom. And so priests should take on the office of spiritual government not for their own sakes but for Mine, that they may rule more surely and devoutly over My people. How?

93 Priests should admonish the people about confession

They should teach, admonish, exhort and urge My people to keep the law of God worthily and fittingly. And pastors should always be thinking this over; and they should warn and exhort the people not to continue in their sins without confession and without penitence, but to tread evil deeds underfoot and do good ones. And if the people do not obey their priests when they so admonish, the people will incur the guilt and the priests will not be blamed for negligence.

94 Priests who do not use their office's authority are not priests but wolves

But if priests do not show the people the authority of their office, they are not priests but ravenous wolves, for they hold their office by robbery as a wolf cruelly snatches a sheep, doing their own will instead of caring for the sheep. And, because they live perversely, they are afraid to teach true doctrine to the people; they consent to iniquity as to a lord, for they harbor carnal desires, and they close the door of their heart to a helper as if to a stranger; for justice is of God.

BOOK TWO

95 The elements wail to God at the iniquity of priests and Heaven notes it

Therefore, O ye pastors, wail and lament your crimes, which proclaim your iniquity in dire tones, so that the very elements hear their clamor and join in their wailing before My presence. How do you dare to do your office and touch your Lord with bloody hands, in perverse filth and adulterous wickedness? By your uncleanness you shake the foundations of the earth. How? Because you do not fear to touch your Lord while foul with such crimes, I bring great griefs and oppressions upon the earth; and so I avenge the flesh and blood of My Son, for in this horror you not only cruelly shake the earth but by your filth contaminate Heaven. How?

When you touch your Lord in the stench of uncleanness, as a swine tramples pearls into the mire, the heavens receive your iniquity and shower upon the earth the sentence of My judgment. You should have gone before the people in true justice and with divine law, shining for them with good works, so that when they followed you they would avoid tripping on any stumbling-block; and instead you stain My people with greater iniquity than that with which they stain themselves, giving them a bad and evil example. You should have been a shining jewel, by whose light they could have perceived and entered the path of rectitude; but your example is death to them, and they can find no measure in your iniquity. How can you be their shepherd when you seduce them so? And how will you answer for them, when you cannot give an answer for yourselves? Therefore weep and howl, before Death carries you off. For why do you not consider your own honor, which is given you for the sake of other people? What does this mean?

96 Priests have the power of binding and loosing

That you, rather than others, have received in My Son the keys of Heaven; which are righteous decisions of just judgment made in the knowledge of the Scriptures, as long as you consider rightly what it is you should bind. What does this mean?

When people stubbornly oppose themselves to My Law, you must inspire them with fear of My judgment. And if they do not then correct themselves, extend over them your power of binding. How? You will bind these rebels in My words with a clear voice, and show them the power of the binding; for their stubbornness they are bound in My sight, as My Son showed to the Church's first pastor, saying:

97 Words of the Gospel

"I will give you the keys of the kingdom of Heaven. And whatsoever you shall bind on earth, it will be bound also in Heaven; and whatsoever you shall loose on earth, it will be loosed also in Heaven" [Matthew 16:19]. What does this mean? I, Who have all power in Heaven and earth, by My grace give to you, My devout imitators, those judgments that touch the dignity of the Kingdom of Heaven. As you see people sin on earth, you will bind the wicked deed on earth with just judgment, and it will be entangled in its wickedness and bound in Heaven; it will be separated and driven out from Heaven, for in the heavenly mansions there is no freedom and no place for iniquity. But after I withdraw a person's soul from his body, you will not extend your judgment over him, for that judgment is Mine. Likewise, if a transgressor is penitent, you will loose on earth the chain you fastened on him in his rebellion, and it will be loosed in the secret places of Heaven, for God does not reject the groans of a devout heart. But after the person's death you will pray for his soul, but you cannot then absolve it from being bound.

98 No one is to be bound without a grievous fault

But, O priests, who have received this power thus from My Son, you shall not in anger of heart bind any person in My words unless he has committed a grievous fault; you will consider most carefully before you bind anyone. You will use My words of ecclesiastical censure to separate from My church anyone who cannot be restrained by shame before other people, or by fear of Me, or by your prayers and precepts, but seeks to persevere in his iniquity. But you shall not bind an innocent person; for when you bind such a one you bind yourselves in bonds of dire guilt.

99 One who is bound when innocent must ask to be loosed for God's honor

And if anyone has been bound while innocent, contrary to right, he must ask to be loosed for the honor of My Name; yet humbly and submissively, for if he is stubborn he might incur the guilt of pride. But this is the purpose of that binding: that one who perversely refuses to obey Me or the precepts of his superiors may be separated by My word from celestial things. Thus Adam, when he disobeyed Me, was by My command cast out of Paradise.

BOOK TWO

And until he repents and obeys, he shall not be received into the company of the faithful; as the human race was recalled to the celestial country by the martyrdom of My obedient Son.

100 Rebels who refuse to return to Christ and ask mercy imitate the Devil

But one who rebels and refuses to return to Christ in humility, and continues in this arrogance, will join the company of those who keep a stone for a heart and remain in infidelity; and such people refuse to know the glory of the Church's beatitude. For one who is so obdurate that in his wickedness he will seek no mercy imitates the ancient serpent, who, when he deceived the first man in Paradise, was saying within himself:

101 Words of the Devil

"I was thrown out of Heaven when I tried to fight with my angels against the army of the Most High; I could not resist Him, and He conquered me. But now I have found Man on earth, and I will avenge myself mightily by working my wrath on him. For I will accomplish in Man on earth that which I tried to do in Heaven, and make myself like the Most High. And if God is just, that power will not be taken from me, for Man will consent to me and disobey God."

Saying these things to himself, the Devil arrayed all his arts against Man, and Man withdrew from God and adhered to the Devil; and the Devil bound him so closely to himself that Man worshipped him instead of God and denied God, his Creator.

102 By the Son of God's Incarnation humanity was led out of the darkness

But when humanity was lying in a great darkness of infidelity and could not raise itself, I sent My Son for its salvation, miraculously incarnate of the Virgin, true God and true man. What does this mean? That His Divinity truly came forth from Me, the Father, and His Humanity truly took flesh from the Virgin Mother. What does this mean? O human, you are soft and delicate of body, but hard and inflexible in your incredulity. For a stone can be smoothed for a building, but you are unwilling to be soothed by the faith. Yet listen. As a person who has a beautiful jewel in a box puts it in a metal setting to show it to people, so I, Who had My Son in My heart, willed him to be incarnate of the Virgin to save the lives of those who believe. But if I had given Him a physical father, who would He be then? Not My Son, but My servant; and that could not be. He, born of the Virgin, ate, drank, lay down to sleep and experienced bodily miseries, but He never felt the taste of sin in His flesh, for He had assumed flesh not through a lie but through truth. What does this mean? Other people, because of Adam and Eve's transgression, are born from the taste of delight, which is to say through a lie and not the truth. But My Son did not originate so, but was born in sanctity from the most chaste Virgin to redeem humanity. For like cannot loose like from a chain; a greater one must come who can save him. What does this mean? That no person born in sin could deliver sinful humanity from the perdition of death. Therefore My Son came, without sin; He conquered death and mercifully delivered humanity therefrom.

VISION SIX

But let the one who sees with watchful eyes and hears with attentive ears welcome with a kiss My mystical words, which proceed from Me Who am life.

THE DEVIL BOUND

THE TEMPTER

VISION SEVEN

The Devil

Then I saw a burning light, as large and as high as a mountain, divided at its summit as if into many tongues. And there stood in the presence of this light a multitude of white-clad people, before whom what seemed like a screen of translucent crystal had been placed, reaching from their breasts to their feet. And before that multitude, as if in a road, there lay on its back a monster shaped like a worm, wondrously large and long, which aroused an indescribable sense of horror and rage. On its left stood a kind of market-place, which displayed human wealth and worldly delights and various sorts of merchandise; and some people were running through it very fast and not buying anything, while others were walking slowly and stopping both to sell and to buy. Now that worm was black and bristly, covered with ulcers and pustules, and it was divided into five sections from the head down through the belly to its feet, like stripes. One was green, one white, one red, one yellow and one black; and they were full of deadly poison. But its head had been so crushed that the left side of its jawbone was dislocated. Its eyes were bloody on the surface and burning within; its ears were round and bristly; its nose and mouth were those of a viper, its hands human, its feet a viper's feet, and its tail short and horrible. And around its neck a chain was riveted, which also bound its hands and feet; and this chain was firmly fastened to a rock in the abyss, confining it so that it could not move about as its wicked will desired. Many flames came forth from its mouth, dividing into four parts: One part ascended to the clouds, another breathed forth among secular people, another among spiritual people, and the last descended into the abyss.

And the flame that sought the clouds was opposing the people who wanted to get to Heaven. And I saw three groups of these. One was close to the clouds, one in the middle space between the clouds and the earth, and one moved along near the earth; and all were shouting repeatedly, "Let us get to Heaven!" But they were whirled hither and thither by that flame; some did not waver, some barely kept their balance, and some fell to the earth but then rose again and started toward Heaven. The flame that breathed forth among secular people burned some of them so that they were hideously blackened, and others it transfixed so that it could move them anywhere it wanted. Some escaped from the flame and moved toward those who sought Heaven, reiterating shouts of "O you faithful, give us help!" But others remained transfixed. Meanwhile, the flame that breathed forth among spiritual people concealed them in obscurity; but I saw them in six categories. For some of them were cruelly injured by the flame's fury; but when it could not injure one of them, it burningly breathed on them the deadly poison that flowed from the worm's head to its feet, either green or white or red or yellow or black. But the flame that sought the abyss contained in itself diverse torments for those who had worshipped Satan in place of God, not washed by the font of baptism or knowing the light of truth and faith.

And I saw sharp arrows whistling loudly from its mouth, and black smoke exhaling from its breast, and a burning fluid boiling up from its loins, and a hot whirlwind blowing from its navel, and the uncleanness of frogs issuing from its bowels; all of which affected human beings with grave disquiet. And the hideous and foul-smelling vapor that came out of it infected many people with its own perversity. But behold, a great multitude of people came, shining brightly; they forcefully trod the worm underfoot and severely tormented it, but could not be injured by its flames or its poison. And I heard again the voice from Heaven, saying to me:

1 God strengthens the faithful so that the Devil cannot conquer them

God, Who disposes all things justly and rightly, calls His faithful people to the glory of the celestial inheritance; but the ancient deceiver lurks in ambush and tries to hinder them by using all his wicked arts against them. But he is conquered by them and is confounded as his presumption deserves, for they possess the celestial country, and he suffers the horrors of Hell.

Therefore, you see a burning light, as large and as high as a mountain, divided at its summit as if into many tongues. This is the justice of God, which burns in the faith of believers, displaying the greatness of His power, sanctity and glory, and wonderfully declaring in that glory the diverse gifts of the Holy Spirit.

2 The multitude of the faithful and the divine law displayed before them

And there stand in the presence of this light a multitude of white-clad people, a cohort of people in the presence of God's justice, shining with faith and well and honorably constituted in good works. Before them what seems like a screen of translucent crystal has been placed, reaching from their breasts to their feet; for, from their decision to do good actions to their completion, they have before their eyes the strong and splendid sight of the divine law. And thus they are so strengthened in these actions that no cunning or deception of false persuasion can conquer them.

VISION SEVEN

3 The deceptions of the Devil lie in the path humans take in this world

And before that multitude, as if in a road, there lies on its back a monster shaped like a worm, wondrously large and long. This means that the ancient serpent is well-known to humanity in the course of the pilgrimage of the good and the bad through the world, not in that visible form but in its inner meaning. Its mouth is gaping upward in order to pull down by deception those who are tending toward the celestial regions; but it is lying down, because the Son of God destroyed so much of its strength that it cannot stand up. And it arouses an indescribable sense of horror and rage; for the mental capacity of mortal humans is insufficient to understand the manifold variations of its poisonous fury and malicious exertions.

4 The Devil offers fraudulent riches and delights, and some buy them

On its left stands a kind of marketplace, which displays human wealth and worldly delights and various sorts of merchandise. For the left hand of the destroyer signifies death, and there is seen a marketplace composed of Death's evil works: pride and vainglory in corruptible riches, licentiousness and lust for transitory pleasures, and trafficking in all kinds of earthly desires. Thus those who would be terrified by the horror of the Devil if they met it openly are deceived by these things; they are lightly offered persuasions to vice as a merchant displays his diverse wares to people, and delighted by the display so that they buy what is offered. So the Devil offers humanity his lying arts; and those who desire them buy them. How? They throw away a good conscience as if selling it, and they collect deadly wounds in their souls as if buying them.

5 The strong resist the Devil's offers, the apathetic consent to them

And some people are running through it very fast and not buying anything; they know God, and so they carry the treasure of good will and the sweet spices of virtue and eagerly accumulate more of them, and quickly pass by the pleasures of the world and the filth of the Devil, obeying God's commands and despising the sweetness of their flesh. But others are walking slowly and stopping both to sell and to buy; they are slow to do good works and apathetic of heart, and so they smother their own desire for Heaven as if selling it, and nurture the pleasures of their flesh as if buying them.

Therefore, the former will receive the reward of good works, and the latter will suffer the punishment of iniquity, as Ezekiel shows, saying:

BOOK TWO

6 Words of Ezekiel on this subject

“The justice of the just shall be upon him, and the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him” [Ezekiel 18:20]. What does this mean? The shining works of the pure person bathe him in sanctity and surround him like a thousand eyes that see into the heights and the depths; as the Holy Spirit inspires him, they bear him aloft to great honor and leave his wrong desires behind for dead, as a bird is borne aloft in the air by its wings whenever it pleases. But the person who faithlessly follows the wickedness of the savage viper who hisses at Heaven, covering the pearl with mud and raging at the Most Beautiful among all the beautiful, is degraded by its snakelike poison; he is cut off from the noble work of God’s hands, from all honor and from the beatitude of the celestial vision, and exiled from the Living Fruit and the root of the Just Tree.

7 The Devil labors to deceive the five senses of humanity

But you see that that worm is black and bristly, covered with ulcers and pustules. This shows that the ancient serpent is full of the darkness of black betrayal, and the bristles of concealed deception, and the ulcers of impure pollution, and the pustules of repressed fury. And it is divided into five sections from the head down through the belly to its feet, like stripes; for from the time of his first deception when he tried to put himself forward until the final time when his madness will end, he does not cease to inspire the five human senses with the desire for vices. Simulating a deceitful rectitude, he draws people to the downward slopes of his unclean arts. One is green, one white, one red, one yellow, and one black; and they are full of deadly poison. The green indicates worldly melancholy; the white, improper irreverence; the red, deceptive glory; the yellow, biting envy; and the black, shameful deceit, with all other perversities that bring death to the souls of those who consent to them.

8 The Devil’s pride was overthrown by the Incarnation

But its head has been so crushed that the left side of its jawbone is dislocated. This means that his pride was so overthrown by the Son of God that even the enmity of Death is already destroyed and cannot exert its full strength of bitterness.

9 What the eyes and ears and nostrils of the serpent signify

Its eyes are bloody on the surface and burning within; because his wicked intent outwardly inflicts harm on human bodies and inwardly drives a fiery

VISION SEVEN

dart into their souls. Its ears are round and bristly; for the bristles of his arts pierce a person all around, so that if he finds anything that is his in that person, he may quickly throw him down. Its nose and mouth are those of a viper; for he shows people unbridled and vile behavior, through which, transfixing them with many vices, he may cruelly slay them.

10 Its hands and feet and tail and what they signify

Its hands are human, for he practices his arts in human deeds; its feet a viper's feet, because he ceaselessly ambushes people when they are journeying and inflicts devilish lacerations on them; and its tail short and horrible, for it signifies his power in the short but most evil time of the son of perdition, whose desire to run wild exceeds his power to do it.

11 The might of God has broken the Devil's strength to do what he wants

And around its neck a chain is riveted, which also binds its hands and feet; which is to say that the strength of the Devil was so broken and crushed by the power of Almighty God that he cannot freely work his evil and accost humans in the way. And this chain is firmly fastened to a rock in the abyss, confining it so that it cannot move about as its wicked will desires; for the power of God abides unfailingly and immovably for eternity, and by saving souls oppresses the Devil so forcibly that he is not able by inner or outer means to take away redemption from the faithful, or keep them from that place of joy from which he perversely exiled himself.

12 The Devil sends his fire to lead astray all kinds of people on earth

Many flames come forth from its mouth, dividing into four parts. This means that in his rapacious voracity he sends forth in cruel flames the terrible and manifold evil of his wicked counsels; he breathes it into all four corners of the world, that the people there may follow him.

One part ascends to the clouds; for the sharpness of the Devil's breath drags down those who with all their mind's longing seek Heaven. Another breathes forth among secular people; for its many forms deceive those who live among earthly affairs. And another among spiritual people; for its pretence infects those who labor in spiritual disciplines. And the last descends into the abyss; for its persuasions put the faithless who consent to it into the torments of Hell. For they have walked the way of falsity and deception and left the way of rectitude, and they have not shown the reverence due to the true God, as David testifies, saying:

BOOK TWO

13 Words of David

“Destruction and unhappiness in their ways, and the way of peace they have not known; there is no fear of God before their eyes” [Psalm 13:5]. What does this mean?

People who expel God from their hearts by their wicked and damnable deeds are overwhelmed by His innocent and mighty works, which arise in the pure living Fountain, as a great rain submerges an object so that it is no longer visible. And so they are not formidable in the sight of God, for misery is in their ways wherever they go, and most unhappy companionship, and the food of death. How? They taste and eat what is evil. Hence in their deeds they do not know the way that ascends in the sunlight, and do not taste in honor or in love the sweetness of God; they cast away their fear of Him as if it were fear of another person, desiring neither to see Him nor to look Him in the face.

14 The Devil assails spiritual and secular people in many ways

Hence you also see that the flame that seeks the clouds is opposing the people who want to get to Heaven. For when that wicked flame feels that the minds of the faithful are tending upward, it rages against them most cruelly with its arts, so that they may not come to the celestial places to which they aspire.

15 The three groups of these people

And you see three groups of these; for they do not cease to worship the true and ineffable Trinity, although greatly fatigued by their struggles. One is close to the clouds; these are fighting most strongly against the Devil and raising their thoughts from earthly deeds to heavenly things as a cloud floats above the earth. And one is in the middle space between the clouds and the earth. These people control themselves moderately well, but their whole mind is not set on heavenly things nor their whole desire on earthly ones; they take a middle way, seeking inner qualities but not refusing outer ones. And one moves along near the earth; for these people have not perfectly renounced the transitory but cling a little to passing things, and so have great labor and suffer much fatigue. But, with the help of Heaven, they are all victors; for all are shouting repeatedly, “Let us get to Heaven!” And so the former and the latter people, with sighs of desire, exhort themselves to move toward the secret places of Heaven, even though tired out by the arts of the ancient serpent. But they are whirled hither and thither by that flame, being driven to various actions by the wind of the Devil’s temptation. Some do not waver, for they are exceedingly strong fighters and manfully defend themselves from these illusions. Some barely keep their balance, for they keep their feet in the path of rectitude and persevere in God's commandments, but are worn out by their labors and can scarcely conquer the Devil's arts; and some fall to the earth but then rise again and start toward Heaven, for they fall into different ways of vice but are then raised up by penitence and place their hope in God and good works.

16 The temptations of secular people

Now the flame that breathes forth among secular people burns some of them so that they are hideously blackened. This is to say that the flame of evil deception aims itself at those who pursue worldly affairs and subjects some of them to its perversity; it stains them with dark and iniquitous vices, so that they despise the brightness of the true faith. Thus they slay themselves by a bitter death, and fall to the ground and there do evil deeds. And others it transfixes so that it can move them anywhere it wants; for it dominates them by its wickedness and bends them to all the vices of its own depravity, seducing them into the embrace of worldly pleasure, so that according to their desires they have different ways in their speech, hair, clothing, gait and other such things. Therefore they become confused and neglect the justice of God, breaking the law and failing to circumcise their minds; they seek excess in lust and do not observe the times of the Law God constituted for them. And as the sea is stirred into turbulence by the wind, they are stirred into diverse vices by the breath of the ancient dragon. Some of these escape from the flame and move toward those who seek Heaven, reiterating shouts of "O you faithful, give us help!" For they withdraw themselves from shameful and harmful companionship and imitate those who fix their mind on celestial things, desiring with heart and voice their solicitude and help. But others remain transfixed, continuing to be ensnared in evil actions by their various vices.

17 The six ways of temptation of the spiritual

But the flame that breathes forth among spiritual people conceals them in obscurity. This means that the breath of the Devil's persuasion, when it flames toward those who should be assenting totally to the Spirit, beclouds them with the perversity of its vices, so that they long for the flesh more than for the Spirit.

And you see them in six categories; for the ancient enemy strives to pervert both their five exterior senses and the sixth inner one, the devotion of the heart. Some of them are cruelly injured by the flame's fury; for the Devil unlooses his arts on them and inspires them with carnal desires and pleasures, and so enkindles them to lust and unclean pollution. But when it cannot injure one of them, it burningly breathes on them the deadly poison that flows from the worm's head to its feet, either green or white or red or yellow or black. How? When they refuse the delights of pollution, he pours into them the sprouting green of mundane sadness, so oppressing them that they have no strength for spiritual or worldly matters; or he sends against them the empty whiteness of vicious irreverence, so that they do not hide their shame before God or Man; or he displays to them the bright red of earthly glory, giving them bitterness and anxiety of heart; or he puts into them the dull yellow of contempt for their neighbor, and thus they become whisperers and hypocrites; or he imposes on them the horrid blackness of feigned justice, through which their hearts are wretchedly darkened.

All these are deadly plagues; they have proceeded from the destroyer from the beginning of his time of deception, and will do so until the end of time, when his madness will end in the world. And through them he injures and burns people up with vices.

18 Concerning the unbaptized

But the flame that seeks the abyss contains in itself diverse torments for those who have worshipped Satan in place of God, not washed by the font of baptism or knowing the light of truth and faith. This is to say that the fire that accompanies perdition inflicts dire and bitter torments on those souls who were not washed clean in the font of salvation and did not see the brightness of the celestial inheritance or the faith instituted by the Church, and who continue to venerate the lurker in ambush who tries to kill human souls, rather than the One Who granted humanity life and salvation.

19 What is meant by his mouth's arrows, breast's smoke and loins' fluid

And you see sharp arrows whistling loudly from its mouth; these are the terrible and evil thrusts of the Devil's rage, which issue forth in madness and iniquity; and black smoke exhaling from its breast, which is the outpouring of his malicious impulses of hideous wrath and envy; and a burning fluid boiling up from its loins, which is the effusion of his uncleanness in ardent lust.

20 What is meant by his navel's whirlwind and bowels' uncleanness of frogs

And a hot whirlwind is blowing from its navel, which is the suffocating wind of fornication that proceeds from his voracity to dominate; and the uncleanness of frogs issuing from its bowels, which is the fetid excrement of his obduracy in desperation and his perverse concentration on it. For the ancient waylayer hopes to subjugate those who follow him completely to his will. And all of these things affect human beings with grave disquiet; for such perversities bring those who fix their hope in the earthly and not the heavenly, and so most miserably become involved with them, into extreme ruin.

VISION SEVEN

21 The Devil makes the foolish believe what he falsely shows them

And the hideous and foul-smelling vapor that comes out of it infects many people with its own perversity. This means that the black wrong of a fetid conscience proceeds from the Devil and disturbs the foolish with wicked unbelief. How?

From the time of the beheading of John the Baptist, who declared that the Son of God is the One Who heals the wounds of sin, most evil error arose, whereby the Devil seduces different people by different false images; so that they think that what he shows them, each according to his understanding, is true. And many are deceived thus, because their faith is constantly weak and wavering.

But you, O My children, if you wish to live justly and devoutly, fly from this most wicked error, lest death catch you in your unbelief.

22 Heretics who worship the Devil for God must be avoided and excommunicated

And fly from those who linger in caves and are cloistered supporters of the Devil. Woe to them, woe to them who remain thus! They are the Devil's very viscera, and the advance guard of the son of perdition.

Therefore, O you My beloved children, avoid them with all devotion and with all the strength of your souls and bodies. For the ancient serpent feeds and clothes them by his arts, and they worship him as God and trust in his false deceptions. They are wicked murderers, killing those who join them in simplicity before they can turn back from their error; and they are wicked fornicators upon themselves, destroying their semen in an act of murder and offering it to the Devil. And they also invade My Church with their schisms in the fulness of vice; in their shameful plots they wickedly scoff at baptism, and the sacrament of My Son's body and blood, and the other institutions of the Church. Because they are afraid of My people, they do not openly resist these institutions of Mine, but in their hearts and their deeds they hold them as nothing. By devilish illusion, they pretend to have sanctity; but they are deceived by the Devil, for if he were to show himself to them openly they would understand him and flee him. By his arts he shows them things he pretends are good and holy, and thus deludes them. O woe to those who persevere in this death!

BOOK TWO

But because the Devil knows he has only a short time for his error, he is now hastening to perfect infidelity in his members: you, you evil deceivers, who labor to subvert the Catholic faith. You are wavering and soft, and thus cannot avoid the poisonous arrows of human corruption, which you employ as you wish against the Law. And after you pour out your lust in the poisonous seed of fornication, you pretend to pray and falsely assume an air of sanctity, which is more unworthy in My eyes than the stinking mire.

And thus for certain the punishment of all the schisms shall fall upon you: The one that arose in Horeb when the Jewish people made a graven image and played before it in devilish mockery, as some wantonly do to this very day; and the one about Baal, in which many perished; and the one about fornications, where the Midianites did shameful deeds; and all the others. For you have part in all of them by your evil actions; but you are worse than the earlier people, because you perceive the true law of God but stubbornly abandon it.

But, O you who desire to be saved and have received baptism and form the holy mountain of God, resist Satan, and do not descend from the height of your salvation.

23 God's grace forsakes His despisers but mercifully helps His seekers

The Devil ceaselessly sets his snares against a person who is so hard-hearted as to despise God's help in resisting him; for then he sees a blackness of iniquity rising up in that person, bringing such bitterness into his whole body that its strength dries up. Hence, when a person begins to contemplate his evil and so crushes himself in despair, deeming it impossible for him to avoid evil and do good, the Devil sees this and says, "Behold a person who is like us, denying his God and turning to follow us. Let us hasten and run swiftly to him, urging him by our arts so that he cannot escape us. For to leave God and follow us is what he wants."

But a person who is assailed by these evils through the Devil's agency, and polluted by murder, adultery, voracity, drunkenness and excess of all vices, will fall into death if he continues in them impenitent; while one who resists the Devil and withdraws repenting from these vices will rise again to life. For if a person follows the longing of his flesh and neglects the good desires of his spirit, the Maker of this globe says of him, "He despises Me and sinfully loves his flesh, and rejects the knowledge that he should turn away from perdition. And therefore he must be cast out." But if a person loves the virtuous ardor of his spirit and rejects the pleasure of his flesh, the Creator of the world says of him, "He looks toward Me and does not nourish his body on filth, and desires the knowledge of how to avoid death. And therefore help will be given him.” How? As Solomon says, in accordance with My will:

24 Words of Solomon

“Evil pursues sinners; and to the just good shall be repaid” [Proverbs 13:21]. What does this mean? Those who fall into error and slide into ruin are invaded on all sides by deadly sickness; and so they do not wisely regard what is true, but carelessly abandon it. And, because they reject God and choose the Devil, they are not worthy to look at God or take any pleasure in God or other people, and the evil they do brings them much adversity. But in good people, right sense and just thoughts erect a tall building; they receive in their bosom the inheritance of the Father, for they long for the celestial light. For they are not among the deceivers in the derisive marketplace, where this or that is sold without regard for its value, but in God they possess that which is true.

25 True worshippers of God crush the ancient serpent

But you see that a great multitude of people come, shining brightly; they forcefully tread the worm underfoot and severely torment it. This is to say that those who are born into human misery, but who constitute the faithful army of believers, hasten to attain their desire for Heaven by the faith of baptism and blessed virtues, which are beautiful adornments; and by their deeds they cast down the ancient seducer. They are virgins, martyrs and all other kinds of worshippers of God, who in full knowledge tread worldly things underfoot and desire the heavenly; and they surround the Devil and crush him with force, weakening him with dire suffering. But they cannot be injured by its flames or its poison; for they are protected by God with such strength and constancy that neither the open flame nor the hidden persuasion of the Devil’s wickedness can touch them. For they forsake all vain fictions, and with great strength in virtue hold fast to sanctity.

But let the one who sees with watchful eyes and hears with attentive ears welcome with a kiss My mystical words, which proceed from Me Who am life. Amen.

Book Three

THE HISTORY OF
SALVATION SYMBOLIZED
BY A BUILDING

THE ONE SITTING UPON THE THRONE

THE FALLEN STARS

VISION ONE

God and Man

And I, a person taken up from among other people—though unworthy to be called a human, since I have transgressed God's law and have been unjust when I should have been just, except that by God's grace I am His creature and will be saved—I looked toward the East. And there I saw a single block of stone, immeasurably broad and high and the color of iron, with a white cloud above it; and above the cloud a royal throne, round in shape, on which One was sitting, living and shining and marvellous in His glory, and so bright that I could not behold Him clearly. He held to His breast what looked like black and filthy mire, as big as a human heart, surrounded with precious stones and pearls.

And from this Shining One seated upon the throne extended a great circle colored gold like the dawn, whose width I could not take in; it circled about from the East to the North and to the West and to the South, and back toward the East to the Shining One, and had no end. And that circle was so high above the earth that I could not apprehend it; and it shone with a terrifying radiance the color of stone, steel and fire, which extended everywhere, from the heights of Heaven to the depth of the abyss, so that I could see no end to it.

And then I saw a great star, splendid and beautiful, come forth from the One seated on the throne. And with that star came a great multitude of shining sparks, which followed the star toward the South, looking on the One seated on the throne like a stranger; they turned away from Him and stared toward the North instead of contemplating Him. But, in the very act of turning away their gaze, they were all extinguished and were changed into black cinders.

And behold, a whirlwind arose from those cinders, which drove them away from the South, behind the One sitting on the throne, and carried them to the North, where they were precipitated into the abyss and vanished from my sight. But when they were extinguished, I saw the light, which was taken from them, immediately return to Him Who sat on the throne.

And I heard the One Who sat on the throne saying to me, "Write what you see and hear." And, from the inner knowledge of that vision, I replied, "I beseech you, my Lord, give me understanding, that by my account I may be able to make known these mystical things; forsake me not, but strengthen me by the daylight of Your justice, in which Your Son was manifested. Grant me to make known the divine counsel, which was ordained of old, as I can and should: how You willed Your Son to become incarnate and become a human being within Time; which You willed before all creation in Your rectitude and the fire of the Dove, the Holy Spirit, so that Your Son might rise from a Virgin in the splendid beauty of the sun and be clothed with true humanity, a man's form assumed for Man's sake."

And I heard Him say to me, "Oh, how beautiful are your eyes, which tell of divinity when the divine counsel dawns in them!" And again I answered from the inner knowledge of the vision, "To my own inner soul I seem as filthy ashes of ashes and transitory dust, trembling like a feather in the dark. But do not blot me out from the land of the living, for I labor at this vision with great toil. When I think of the worthlessness of my foolish bodily senses, I deem myself the least and lowest of creatures; I am not worthy to be called a human being, for I am exceedingly afraid and do not dare to recount Your mysteries. O good and kind Father, teach me what to say according to Your will! O reverend Father, sweet and full of grace, do not forsake me, but keep me in Your mercy!"

And again I heard the same One saying to me, "Now speak, as you have been taught! Though you are ashes, I will that you speak. Speak of the revelation of the bread, which is the Son of God, Who is life in the fire of love; Who raises up everyone dead in soul and body, forgives all repented sins in His serene clarity, and awakens holiness in a person and sets it growing. Thus God, the magnificent, glorious and incomprehensible, gave Him as a great intercessor by sending Him into the purity of the Virgin, who had no corruptible weakness in her virginity. No pollution of the flesh should or could have been in the mind of the Virgin; for when the Son of God came in silence into the dawn, which was the humble maiden, Death, the slayer and destroyer of the human race, was deceived without knowing it as if in a dream. Death went on securely, not realizing what life that sweet Virgin bore, for her virginity had been hidden from it. And that Virgin was poor in worldly goods, for the Divine Majesty willed to have her so. Now write about the true knowledge of the Creator in His goodness."

I The faithful should venerate the magnitude of the fear of the Lord

God, Who created all things and appointed humanity to that glory from which the lost angel and his followers were cast out, should be worshipped and feared by every creature of His with the greatest honor and awe; for it is just that His creatures should worship the Creator of all things and faithfully adore God above all beings. This is symbolized by that stone that you see. For in this mystery it represents the magnitude of the fear of God, which should always arise and live in the hearts of the faithful with purest purpose.

You see it as a single block of stone, immeasurably broad and high and the color of iron; this shows how firmly the fear of God must be held. For God is to be dreaded by every creature with single-heartedness, so that they know He is the one true God, without Whom is no one and like Whom there is no one. It has immense breadth, because He is incomprehensible; and height, because Divinity is above all else and the highest pitch of any creature's senses cannot understand or attain to it. Its iron color means that it is burdensome and hard for human minds to fear God; for this is a heavy burden for soft and fragile dust, and the human creature rebels against it.

VISION ONE

2 Every soul that wisely fears God becomes by faith God's throne

The white cloud above that stone is the clear wisdom of the human mind; and the royal throne above the cloud, round in shape, is the strong faith of the Christian people. In it, God is faithfully recognized; for wherever the fear of the Lord takes root, human wisdom will also appear, and then God's help will set faith above it, and prepare His rest in it. For when God is feared, He is understood by faith with the help of human wisdom, and these will touch Him as a seat touches its owner. And in them God prepares a seat for Himself, supreme above all else; for neither power nor force can comprehend Him, but He resides in single-minded and pure faith, One above all things.

3 God's mystery is incomprehensible unless He gives faith to do so

And One is sitting on that throne, living and shining and marvellous in His glory, and so bright that you cannot behold Him clearly. He holds to His breast what looks like black and filthy mire, as big as a human heart, surrounded with precious stones and pearls. This is the Living God, Who reigns over all things, shining in goodness and wondrous in His works. The deep mystery of His immense glory can never be perfectly contemplated by anyone, unless faith allows that person to comprehend and bear Him, as a seat contains and surrounds its owner. As the seat is subject to its owner and cannot rise and throw him off, so faith has no proud desire to look upon God, but only touches Him in intimate devotion.

4 In the Father's wisdom the perfection of the elect is revealed

And to His breast, that is in the wisdom of His mystery, for love of His Son He holds that poor, weak, infirm mire that is Man: black in the blackness of sins and filthy in the filthiness of the flesh, but the size of a human heart, which is the breadth of the profound wisdom with which God created Man.

BOOK THREE

For He has looked upon those who are saving their souls through penitence, and no matter how in their persistent weakness they have sinned against Him, they will come to Him at last. They are surrounded by ornaments, those great ones who rise up among them: martyrs and holy virgins like precious stones, and innocent and penitent children of redemption like pearls; so that by them the mire is surpassingly adorned, and the virtues, which so gloriously shine in God, shine also in the human body. For He Who put breath and life in Man was scrutinizing Himself. How?

Because He foreknew and decided in advance that His Son would be incarnate to bring redemption; therefore, every stain of sin must be washed away from His body. And so too He knows the souls which, after many and great sins while they are still in the body, will end by being justified; which, after their several errors will walk in God's justice, will be steadfast in Him and shake off their forgetfulness, turning from the vices that wounded them in the earthly places where they fell into sin. And He will also take note of the fact that many peoples have arisen from their erring ways and were brought back from the deadly stench of sin, though they were walking covered with wounds and most dreadful sores; but many will arise who have been wounded so severely by the bitter and harsh pains of sin that their crimes are beyond measure and their evil habits are ingrained, and they are too ill even to summon the energy to do their deadly works, murder and adultery and all the other evils.

5 Example from the Gospel

O wretches! Do they not approach like pilgrims from a far-off land? As the Scripture says in the Gospel, the younger son said, "I will arise and go to my father and say to him, 'Father, I have sinned against Heaven and before you, and am no longer worthy to be called your son. Make me as one of your hired servants' " [Luke 15:18]. This is to say: A person who, admonished by the Holy Spirit, comes to himself after a fall into sin says, "I want to rise up from the unendurable sins whose heavy guilt I can no longer bear. I will retrace my steps in memory, lamenting and sorrowing over my sins, until I come to my Father, Who is my Father because He created me. And I will say to him, 'Father, I have sinned against Heaven, wronging the celestial work that is myself; You formed me by Your will, and touched me in creating me, so that I should be only celestial in my deeds, but I have belittled myself by shameful actions. And I have sinned before You, because I have forsaken the humanity of my nature. How? By my many abominations.

" "Therefore, I am guilty both of losing myself and insulting You, and am not worthy to be called Your son; for in the wickedness of my heart I have led Your creature in me in a path You did not appoint for me. But now, let me be as Your servant, redeemed at the price of Your Son's blood. You gave Him at a price so great that not even death can ever repay it; but that price allows penitence to arise from Your Son's Passion, and so sets sinners free. I have lost my rightful inheritance as a child of Adam, for he, who was created a son in justice, was stripped of that joyful glory; but now the blood of Your Son and penitence have redeemed the sins of humanity.' "

VISION ONE

And thus all should speak who have repeated Adam's fall but then return through penitence and attain to salvation. They should remember the many warnings they have heard told from the Scriptures about the suffering and the blood of their Redeemer, and recall with lamentation how they have transgressed the rules of keeping God's word instead of receiving them with longing. For they neglected His law, which was set up for them to keep when the commandments were instituted, and refused to think about what things they should have done and left undone for fear of the Lord. But they come to the truth nonetheless, remembering what they heard and learned from God; even though they previously were blinded, not desiring to know His justice and avoiding whatever would set that justice they despised above their sins; even though they turned their back on God's word and rejected His law.

Many of these will be superabundant in good things; they will not find it sufficient to feast in the house of the Lord, to celebrate His Divine Office and work His justice to the fullest, but will always be weeping and woefully remembering the evils they did when they cherished unlawful works and ignored the deeds God's law allowed.

6 The meaning of the mire on the breast and why the angels may not spurn Man

This is the filthy mire that you see on the breast of the loving Father. How? The Son of God went forth from the Father's heart and entered into the world; He is surrounded by the people who believe, and by their decision to believe in Him hold to Him. And therefore they also appear on the breast of the gentle Father; and thus neither angel nor any other creature may spurn a human being, since the incarnate Son of the Most High God has human form in Himself. For the blessed choir of angels would regard Man as unworthy, for he stinks of vice and sin, while those heavenly angels themselves are invulnerable and free from any deed of injustice; except that they continually see the face of the Father, and love in the Son what is loved by the Father. What is this? That the Son of God was born as a human. For I, the Father, established My Son, born of the Virgin, for the salvation and restoration of humanity, as My servant, the prophet Isaiah, says to you:

BOOK THREE

7 Words of Isaiah

“He shall feed His flock like a shepherd, He shall gather up the lambs with His arm and raise them to His bosom; and He shall carry those who are with young” [Isaiah 40:11]. Which is to say: As a shepherd feeds his flock, so My Son, the Good Shepherd, feeds the flock of His redeemed. How? He feeds it by His law, which He planted through Me. Because My Son is human, He will extend His power like His arm, and gather together the lambs, who by the innocence of baptism, which strips from them the old man and his works, are innocent of Adam’s sin; and by His virtues and His law He will take them up into His bosom. How? By lifting them above the height of the heavens and making them members of Himself.

Therefore the human form is to be seen in the inmost nature of the Deity, where neither angels nor any other creatures appear; because My Only-Begotten, to redeem the human race, assumed human form in the flesh of a Virgin. And He will carry in His heart those who are with young. How? My Son carries human beings in His blood, and saves them by His five wounds, for whatever sins they have committed by means of their five senses are washed away by supreme justice when they repent; and He carries them so because He was incarnate, and suffered wounds on the cross, and died and was buried, and rose again from the dead.

And He has stretched out His hand to them and drawn them back to Himself. How? When He assumed humanity for them, though they thought they were lost when Adam fell. For My Only-Begotten conquered death, and it could no longer triumph over them; and so He knew them in the power of His glory, and knew that they were to come to Him by the purgation of penance.

And you see them appear in the bosom of the Father. This means that the Son of Man is perfected with all His members in the secret heart of His Father. How? Because when the world reaches its end, the elect of Christ, who are His members, are to be perfected. O how beautiful is He! As the Psalmist says:

8 Words of David

“Beautiful of form above the children of men” [Psalm 44:3]. This is to say: In Him shines forth beauty beyond beauty, the noblest form free from any spot of sin, without a splash of human corruption, and lacking all desire for the sinful works demanded by fleshly human weakness. None of these ever touched this Man. And the body of the Son of Man was born more purely than other people, for the stainless Virgin bore her Son in ignorance of sin, and thus ignorant of the sorrow of childbirth. How? She never felt any stubborn urge to sin, and therefore the pains of childbirth were unknown to her; but the wholeness of her body rejoiced within her. Oh, how beautiful then His body!

VISION ONE

But let the people know that His bodily beauty was no greater than the profound wisdom that established His human form; for the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, one God in Three Persons, does not delight in the beauty of the flesh but in the humility with which the Son of God clothed Himself in humanity. And in His form there were no exterior blemishes. Sometimes an ordinary person is given by God an ugly appearance as bodies go, as when his limbs are distorted and misshapen and he is a cripple. This is not because nature so forms human bodies, but because of God's judgment; a strong nature is expressed in a proper form, and a weak one in various deformities. But the latter was not the case with My Son.

Humans, I say, are widely divergent in bodily form; they can be black, ugly, polluted, leprous, dropsical and full of defects; they can also be persuaded by devilish art into becoming inflamed with sorcery, stupid, blind to the good things of the Lord or forgetful of what they should praise and what they should blame. For they should do the works of justice, but they do the works of evil and omit the good, despising the cross and the martyrdom of their Lord. But God the Father contemplates this work of mire with the purpose of His goodness, as a father looks at his children when he hugs them to his breast. And, because He is God, He has the love of a tender father for his children. For so great is His heart's inmost love for people that He sent His Son to the cross, like a meek lamb that is carried to the slaughter. And so the Son brought back the lost sheep, bearing them on His shoulder by assuming humanity; which caused Him great sufferings, for He deigned to die for His flock.

But among these people there are many surrounded by ornaments and adorned pricelessly with virtue. They are the martyrs, the virgins, the innocents and the penitents, as I said before, and those who have obeyed their masters, and those who accuse themselves of their sins and tirelessly strive to punish themselves for them, denying the self in them. And who or where these elect are must not be stated; for the numbers of them all have been reckoned.

Does anyone think it possible to see into the deep wisdom of the Most High and into the discernment of His knowledge, and count the number of those who are to be saved? His judgments are incomprehensible to all people. Your task is to run; for the kingdom of God is prepared for you. For as great as is the zeal of the faithful, washed in baptism and known in faith, to fulfil God's justice, so great also shall be their reward.

BOOK THREE

9 The Father does, ordains and perfects all His works through His Son

But you see that from the One seated upon the throne extends a great circle colored gold like the dawn, whose width you cannot take in. This means that from the Almighty Father there extends a supremely strong power and action, whose might encircles all things; and He works it through His Son, Who is always with Him in the majesty of Divinity, ordaining and perfecting all His works through Him before all worlds and in the world from its start. His Son glows with the brilliant beauty of the dawn; for He was incarnate in the wisest Virgin, whom the dawn signifies, by the hand of God Which is the Holy Spirit, in Whom also each work of the Father is done. You can never comprehend the full extent of His glory, for no creature has, will have or should have a standard of goodness or power with which to measure His power or His deeds; God's power is inestimable and incomprehensible, and His works are invincible and marvellous.

10 On the revolving circle

And that circle wheels about from the East to the North and to the West and to the South, and back toward the East to the One on the throne, and has no end. This is to say that God's power and His work encircle and include every creature. How? All creatures arose in the will of the Father, Who is One God with the Son and the Holy Spirit, and all feel Him in His power. How? They all feel Him in their creation: He wheels around from the East, the origin of all justice, to the North, where the Devil is confounded, to the West, where the darkness of death tries to extinguish the light of life but the light conquers it and rises again, and to the South, where the ardor of God's justice burns in the hearts of the faithful; and so back to the rising of justice as to the East. What does this mean?

When in God's foreordained time His work shall have been completed in the people of this world, then the circuit of the world will have been made, and the perfection of time and the last day will arrive; and then each work of God, seated in His throne without end, will shine resplendent in His elect. For God is perfect in His power and His work, Who was and is and ever shall be, and His Divinity had no beginning; so that it is not that He will have been, but that He is.

11 God's power is greater than Man can know, and why the angels praise Him

And that circle is so high above the earth that you cannot apprehend it. This is to say that the Supreme Power is so far exalted above the lives of all creatures and above the sense and intellect of Man, and so incomprehensible in and above all, that no creature's senses can grasp it, except to realize that this Power is much higher than it can know. And therefore the angels sing to God in praise; for they see Him in His power and glory, but they also cannot understand or sense Him completely, and they can never have enough of His magnitude or His beauty.

VISION ONE

12 God is manifest justice, true and just without alteration

But that it shines with a terrifying radiance the color of stone, steel and fire; this means that the divine power radiates formidable and severe virtue against iniquity that is dissimulated, impenitent or unpunished. This strength is like steel, because God's manifest justice yields nothing to weak injustice; whereas dust, as the saying goes, is unjust and does not please God. His justice, like steel, strengthens all other justice, which is weaker than it as iron is weaker than steel. And this strength is like fire; for He Himself is the Fire of Judgment, burning up all sin and injustice, which refused to bow down before Him and seek His mercy.

And God is like the rock in Man; for He is true and just without any alteration, as stone cannot be changed into softness. He is like steel, piercing everything with His all-penetrating gaze, never changing but remaining God of all things. And he is also like fire, because He inflames and enkindles and illuminates all things without changing over time; for He is God.

13 God's strength, justice and judgment have no boundary Man can sense

And you see that this radiance extends everywhere, from the heights of Heaven to the depth of the abyss, so that you can see no end to it. This is to say that the strength of God's power and work, His justice and His upright judgment are everywhere, and neither in the heights of Heaven nor in the depths of the abyss is there any boundary to them that human senses can comprehend.

14 Why and how the first angel and his followers fell

Then you see a great star, splendid and beautiful, come forth from the One seated on the throne, and with that star come a great multitude of shining sparks. For, by the command of the Almighty Father, the angel Lucifer, who now is Satan, came forth from his beginnings adorned with great glory and clothed with brightness and beauty; and with him came all the lesser lights that were his followers, who then shone with brightness but now are extinguished in darkness. But he was inclined toward evil and did not look on Me the Perfect One; he trusted in himself and thought he could begin anything he wished and finish anything he began. Thus the great honor he owed to the One on the throne, Who was his creator, he gave to himself, and so descended into sin.

BOOK THREE

But all the sparks that follow the star toward the South look on the One seated on the throne like a stranger; they turn away from Him and stare toward the North instead of contemplating Him. This is to say that Lucifer and all his company, who were miraculously created by the ardent goodness of God, had a secret sin, which was that their pride disdained the One Who reigns in Heaven. All of them, formed at the beginning of Creation, tasted the impiety that leads to perdition, and contemplated God not in order to know His goodness but in order to exalt themselves above Him as if He were a stranger; in their open elation they turned away from knowledge of Him in His glory and hastened toward their fall. But, in the very act of turning away their gaze, they are all extinguished and are changed into black cinders. Which is to say that as soon as they disdained to know God, the splendid brilliance with which the divine power had clothed them was extinguished in Lucifer himself and all the followers of his malice; as he destroyed in himself the inner beauty that was his consciousness of good, and gave himself over to impiety, he was erased from eternal glory and fell into eternal loss. Therefore they were all changed into black cinders; stripped of their bright splendor along with their leader, the Devil, they were smothered in darkness and deprived of the glory of beautitude, like a dead coal without its smoldering spark.

Then a whirlwind arises from those cinders, which drives them away from the South, behind the One sitting on the throne, and carries them to the North, where they are precipitated into the abyss and vanish from your sight. This is to say that when these angels of iniquity tried to prevail over God and oppress Him with their pride, the wind of impiety that arose in them was belched forth in bitter perdition, and blew them backward from the South, which means from goodness, into the North, which means into forgetfulness of God the Ruler of all. Thus when they tried to exalt themselves in pride, they were confounded and met their downfall, and were precipitated by their pride into the abyss of eternal death, which is their doom, never again to be seen in brightness. Even so did I tell the noonday forest, which should ardently have borne the fruit of justice and did not, by My servant Ezekiel:

15 Words of Ezekiel

“Behold, I will kindle a fire in you and will burn in you every green tree and every dry tree. The flame of the fire shall not be quenched; and every face shall be burned in it, from the south to the north. And all flesh shall see that it is I the Lord Who have kindled it; and it shall not be quenched" [Ezekiel 20:47-48]. Which is to say: O fool, who raised yourself up in pride against Me! I Who have neither beginning nor end will bring this to pass: In My zeal I will kindle in you the fire of My wrath, and burn up all your vigor with which you tried to begin a work, trusting in your false energy more than in Me, and choosing to act as your pride dictated on your own foolish wisdom. And I will burn up in you all your dryness, that aridity which belongs to your sin and that of the other lost ones, and in which you tempt humanity, which is ashes, to sin; and this temptation will not bring you back salvation, but will become in you eternal fire. There is no reward of salvation for you or those who follow your example. And that fire of punishment shall not be quenched or abate its tortures, but will burn up that headlong pride in which you looked upon the face of honor and tried to seize it for yourself. And thus were you ejected from all your glory; you rose in the South in clear and ardent light, but you set in the darkness of the North, which is to say in Hell.

And everyone shall see this and know Gehenna, both the elect and the reprobate. The elect will know Gehenna because they have escaped it, and the reprobate because they will remain in it and be punished; knowing that it is the place that I the Lord Almighty have kindled in retribution for your crimes, O Devil, and it will not be extinguished by your evil deeds or those of your followers. So the sin of diabolical pride has cast Satan and his angels into the outer darkness of eternal torment, without any comfort from light; so that there is no place for them in the eternal light, and you, O frail human, cannot see them there any longer. As Ezekiel, imbued with My Spirit, says with mystical significance to the King of Tyre:

"All who see you among the nations will be astonished at you; you are brought to naught, and you shall not be forevermore" [Ezekiel 28:19]. Which is to say: All the upright of heart, O Devil, will be astounded at your filthiness, seeing you drunken with the vices of the nations who embrace you and transgress the laws of God and wither away; for you pollute with temptation God's temple, which is Man. And so, through your pride you are brought to naught and fall from the glory of salvation; for you have no honor and no felicity, and no glory shall be yours in the eternity of Heaven; you are lost from them forever, without end.

16 The glory lost by the Devil and the others was saved by the Father

But when they are extinguished, you see the light that was taken from them immediately return to Him Who sits on the throne. This is to say that when the Devil, because of his pride and obstinacy, lost his exceeding brilliance (for Lucifer was of purer light than all the other angels), and when the seeds of death entered into him and all his followers, that brilliance returned to God the Father to be kept in His secret heart; for the glory of that splendor was not allowed to go for nothing, but God kept it as a light for another of His creations.

For God, Who commanded one variety of His creatures to arise without flesh yet bright in splendor, namely the Devil and all his company, kept this splendor for the mire that He formed into Man, who arose covered with a vile earthly nature, that he might not exalt himself into the likeness of God. For the one created in bright splendor, and not clothed in a miserable form as humans are, could not sustain his self-exaltation; there is only one Eternal God, without beginning or end. And thus comparing oneself to God is the wickedest of all crimes.

And so I, the God of Heaven, kept the illustrious light, which departed from the Devil because of his crime, and hid it within Myself until I gave it to the mire of the earth, which I had formed in My image and likeness; as does a human being when his son dies and his inheritance cannot pass to children of his. When he has no children to inherit, a father holds the inheritance and plans to give it to children yet unborn, and when they are born from him he gives it to them.

17 The Devil fell without leaving an heir, but fallen Man had one

For the Devil fell without leaving an heir, which is to say without the intention of doing good works; he never accomplished or began anything good, and therefore another received his inheritance. This other also fell, but did have an heir, which was the beginning of obedience; and he received this inheritance with devotion, even though he could not complete the work that went with it. But then God's grace completed that work in the Incarnation of the Savior of the nations, and restored the good inheritance. So Man receives his inheritance in Christ, because he did not reject God's commandments when they were first given; whereas the Devil did not want to serve the Creator for good, but to vaunt his own pride, and so was deprived of the glory and perished in perdition.

18 Example of Goliath and David

As Goliath rose up despising David, so the Devil rose up presuming upon himself and wanting to be like the Most High. And as Goliath was unaware of David's strength and despised him as nothing, so the Devil's towering pride despised the humility of the Son of God's humanity, when

VISION ONE

He was born into the world and sought not His own glory but in all things the glory of the Father. How? The Devil did not seek to imitate this example and submit himself to his Creator as the Son of God submitted Himself to His Father. But David, with the secret strength given to him by God, cut off Goliath's head, as is written by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit:

“And David, taking the head of the Philistine, carried it into Jerusalem; but his arms he placed in his own tent” [1 Kings 17:54]. This is to say: My Son took the spoils and booty of the Devil with His great power and deprived the ancient serpent of his head. Where? In the womb of the Virgin, who crushed that head. Through whom? Through her Son. What is this crushing? The holy humility, which appears both in the Mother and in the Son, and struck at the origin of pride, which is the head of the Devil. And so, in His humility My Son in the body carried that head into the holy Church, which is the vision of peace, and showed it that the pride of the Devil had been slain. The strong arms are the Devil's stubborn vices, by which he had overcome the human race and made them worship him as God; for he had terrified them by his vices as people are terrified by arms. But My Son broke them and placed them in His tent; that is, in the Passion of His body while He suffered on the cross.

So now He lets the battle continue among the tents, which are the bodies of His chosen members, that they may divide with Him the Devil's arms. How? As He conquered the Devil in His Passion, they too may conquer him by restraining themselves from their desires and not being in harmony with his vices. And, to extend the metaphor, as the glory of Goliath was given to David, so the glory that was taken from the first angel was given by Me to Adam and his race, which confesses Me and keeps My precepts, after the Devil's pride was destroyed.

But let the one who has ears sharp to hear inner meanings ardently love My reflection and pant after My words, and inscribe them in his soul and conscience.

THE BUILDING OF SALVATION

VISION TWO

The Edifice of Salvation

Then I saw, within the circumference of the circle, which extended from the One seated on the throne, a great mountain, joined at its root to that immense block of stone above which were the cloud and the throne with its Occupant; so that the stone was continued on to a great height and the mountain was extended down to a wide base.

And on that mountain stood a four-sided building, formed in the likeness of a four-walled city; it was placed at an angle, so that one of its corners faced the East, one faced the West, one the North and one the South. The building had one wall around it, but made of two materials: One was a shining light like the light of the sky, and the other was stones joined together. These two materials met at the east and north corners, so that the shining part of the wall went uninterruptedly from the east corner to the north corner, and the stone part went from the north corner around the west and south corners and ended in the east corner. But that part of the wall was interrupted in two places, on the west side and on the south side.

This building was a hundred cubits long and fifty cubits wide, so that the two side walls were of equal length and the front and back walls were of equal length. But the four walls were equal in height except for the bulwarks, which were somewhat taller.

And between the building and the light of the circle, which extended from the height to the abyss, at the top of the east corner there was only a palm's breadth; but at the north and west and south corners, the breadth of separation between the building and the light was so great that I could not grasp its extent.

And as I was marvelling, the One seated on the throne again said to me:

I Faith rose in the circumcision of Abraham and climaxed in the Incarnation

Faith appeared faintly in the saints of the Old Testament, who did that justice which was constructed on high in the goodness of the Father. But at the Incarnation of the Son of God, it burst into burning light by the open manifestation of ardent deeds; for the Son of God did not desire transitory things, and taught by example that they should be trampled underfoot and only celestial things loved. The early patriarchs did not flee or separate themselves from the world, for it had not yet been shown them that they should forsake all things; but they worshipped God with simple faith and humble devotion.

Therefore, you see within the circumference of the circle, which extends from the One seated on the throne, a great mountain, joined at its root to that immense block of stone above which are the cloud and the throne with its Occupant; so that the stone is continued on to a great height and the mountain is extended down to a wide base. This is to say that the mountain, which signifies faith, stands within the mighty and strongly built power of the Supreme Father; this faith, great in virtue, first appeared in the circumcision of Abraham and progressed until the coming of the Supreme God's Son. Since the ancient serpent was ruined, this faith has been inspired in people by the Holy Spirit; faithfully working in the Father, they can believe that God is almighty, Who could conquer so great an enemy, and uplifted by this belief, they can attain to that glory from which the Devil was cast out for his pride.

2 Faith and fear of the Lord are joined to one another

And this mountain is rooted in that immense stone, which holds the mystery of the fear of the Lord; for faith is connected to constant fear of the Lord, and fear of the Lord to the strength of faith. This is because the Son was sent from the Father to be born of the Virgin, and from the Son came forth true faith, which was the first foundation of the good works that fear of the Lord brings forth with all the virtues, whose height touches God. And so, in the wise minds of the faithful, God Who reigns over all things is faithfully worshipped. How? Because fear of the Lord, with its sharp contemplative sight, penetrates the secrets of Heaven; for fear is the beginning of a just intention, and when that flowers into sanctity by good works, it joins with blessed faith and reaches God in full perfection.

3 The faithful build good works on faith in all four corners of the earth

And on that mountain stands a four-sided building, formed in the likeness of a four-walled city; which is to say that the goodness of the Father builds good works on faith. Gathering multitudes of the faithful from the four corners of the earth, he draws them to celestial things and fortifies them in constancy of virtue; then the Heavenly Father graciously places them in His bosom, which is to say in His inner power and His mystical counsel, in four categories of faith. How?

VISION TWO

4 On the four categories

I Who am the Most High ordained in My work the first category of people, the race of Adam; which race, after his death, went on weakened by great discord until the second arose. This was at the coming of Noah, when the Flood took place; in which, by the Ark, I foretold the mysteries of My Son. But in the time of Noah, by My commands I showed the shining part of the wall of the building; by drowning sinners in the flood, I implied to people that they should flee death and seek life, and thus opened to them the knowledge of the choice between the two ways. What does this mean?

A person flourishes and thrives in the living life, which is the soul, and in it he contemplates and sees two ways, good and evil; either way is open to him, so that while he is in the body he can do good or evil with soul and body, starting with his mental choice and perfecting his will in his deeds. And so, in Noah, by My command there was shown the knowledge of the choice between the two ways, and a sharp warning to spurn evil and love good. And, with the decree of circumcision, this anticipation of God's will leads to the third category, in which Abraham and Moses were united in circumcision and the Law. Circumcision and the Law continued until the fourth category, the time of the Holy Trinity, when the Old Testament was openly fulfilled in the Son of God. And so, through the Son of God an inner shoot arose in the Church; He was born and suffered for human salvation, rose again and returned to the Father, and so restored that corner of the wall that had been obscured and weakened by Adam's fall, building it up again with saved human souls.

5 People must go forward humbly and wisely flee the Devil's snares

But the fact that the building is placed at an angle means that Man, who is the work of God, is too weak to go forward by conquering the Devil by force, without fear of sin or bodily harm; he must humbly avoid the Devil and wisely flee his snares, and faithfully unite himself to good works. Thus he will be established on the Son of God, Who sits in the corner and is the Cornerstone, and thus join himself to the work of human salvation.

6 The four corners of the building and what they mean

But one of its corners faces the East, one faces the West, one the North and one the South. This means the following. The Son of God was born of the Virgin and suffered in the flesh that justice might arise and humanity be restored to life with all justice; and that is the eastern corner. From it arose the salvation of souls when in His Son God fulfilled justice; which was prefigured from the time of Abel till the coming of the Son Himself, and in Him was ended the physical observance of the laws in the Old Testament. Then came the salvation of faithful people by their faith, which in the last times the Son of God Who was sent by the Father brought into the world, which is the western corner. In Abraham and in Moses justice raised itself against the Devil, and they foreshadowed the promised grace through which Man was saved, though the Devil had deceived him and slain him like a robber in Adam's fall, which is the northern corner. And the wretched and fatal fall of the human race was at last through heavenly grace nobly and beautifully restored, and the ardent work of God and man bore full fruit, which is the southern corner.

BOOK THREE

7 Another meaning for the corners

The southern corner also means that the first man, Adam, was created by God. But the knowledge of the choice of the two roads does not come from this corner; which means that from Adam on the human race was disorderly and did not worship God in wisdom by eager service to the Law, but did its own will in great evil. It did not glow with knowledge of God or true beatitude, but lay in death; but what the Father willed to do with the human race lay hidden only in His heart. The eastern corner designates Noah, in whom justice began to show itself; thus there was openly manifested and foreshadowed the knowledge of sanctity that would later be perfected in the Son of God. And because in the Son of God, Who is the true Orient, every kind of justice began, and for the sake of His sanctity and honor, first truly declared in Noah, the building should always be named starting from the east.

The northern corner also means Abraham and Moses, who, working against Satan, surrounded that knowledge as if with precious stones and roofed it in with the golden roof of God's manifest justice, which was circumcision and the Law. For, before circumcision and the Law, justice was naked and without deeds.

And the fourth, the western corner, also means the true Trinity, which showed Itself when the Savior was baptized; and He returned to Heaven with all his work to save souls, and built there the true holy city Jerusalem.

8 God gives people fortifications and defenses of their good works

The building has one wall around it, but made of two materials: One is a shining light like the light of the sky, and the other is stones joined together.

VISION TWO

These two materials meet at the east and north corners. This is to say that the goodness of the Father gives people unbroken security, in the form of a fortification and defense of their good works; and thus, surrounded and strengthened by them, people may forsake the lusts of the flesh and fly to the One God Who is their protection.

The wall is of two materials. The first is the knowledge of the choice of the two roads, which is given to people when they speculate and think clearly with their minds, to make them circumspect in all their affairs; and the second is earthy human flesh, for people were created by God to do active deeds.

9 On the reflective knowledge

And the knowledge shines as brightly as daylight, because through it people know and judge their actions, and the human mind that is carefully considering itself is radiant. For this beautiful knowledge appears in people like a white cloud, and passes through human minds as swiftly as the cloud moves through the air; and it shines like daylight, because when God graciously does His most splendid work in humans and they avoid evil, the good they accomplish is as bright in them as the day.

And every human deed proceeds from this knowledge. How? Each person can have two ways. How? With his sensibilities he knows good and evil; and when he moves away from evil by doing good he imitates God, Who works good in Himself, Who is just and knows no injustice. But when he does evil, the wily Devil entangles him in sins, for the Devil seeks iniquity and flees sanctity, and will not rest until he holds the person bound by evil deeds. But if the person breaks free of evil and does good, the Supreme Goodness will receive him; for he has conquered himself for the love of God, Who handed over his Son for him to the death of the cross.

This knowledge is reflective because it is like a mirror; for as a person sees his face in a mirror and discerns beauty or blemishes, so too in the finished deeds he ponders within himself, he can knowingly discern good and evil. For this discernment is part of the reason with which God inspired Man when He breathed life and soul into his body. The life of animals is deficient, because it is not rational; the human soul is never deficient, but because of its rationality it will live forever. And so a person contemplating good and evil knows whether a deed is wicked or good; he was formed by the grace of God and given reason at the beginning of creation, and in the choice of baptism and the salvation of souls in the New Testament he is restored by that same grace. As My most loving Paul says about this election of grace:

BOOK THREE

10 Words of Paul

“There is a remnant saved according to the election of grace. And if by grace, it is not by works; otherwise grace is no longer grace” [Romans 11:5-6]. This is to say: The remnant, who are not inside the snare of death, shall not stoop to the Devil’s example, for they were openly saved when God sent His Son to become incarnate; and this is the election of grace, manifested for human salvation. How?

The grace of God created Man, but by evil works he fell. Then the election of grace was shown in the chosen vessel; for the Son of God was born from the Virgin, and it was not possible for Him to lapse. For if a person makes something useful for himself and it is taken away from him by someone else, he will get himself something even more useful that no one will take, and be content with it. And this is the way the grace of God acted. It made Adam, the first man, and the Devil drew him away from innocent deeds; but then grace brought the fullness of good works and the salvation of souls through the Son of God. But if the grace of God was the cause of salvation, then it was not caused by the merit of any human deeds. How?

There was no justice in Adam’s deeds; therefore, humanity would never have returned to salvation by the merit of its works, except that it was restored by grace through the works of the just Son, Who was obedient to His Father, and cleansed by baptism, which the Son of God gave to humanity along with good works. So in this work the grace of God collaborates with humanity, and humanity with it. And therefore the grace of God goes with this work, and the work has arisen from grace.

But if salvation arose from human merit, and righteous human deeds stemmed from the people themselves and not the grace of God, grace would no longer be grace. How? Because then Man would stem from himself and not from God, and no creature would give thanks to God, and the grace of God would be nothing. But as it is, the grace of God has given people the support of reason, that they may work justice in the knowledge of good and evil; and by this knowledge they can seek the good and cast away evil, and so know life and death and choose which one to stay with. As Solomon says in his knowledge of wisdom:

11 Words of Solomon

“He has set before you water and fire; stretch forth your hand to whichever you will” [Ecclesiasticus 15:17]. This is to say: When the soul awakens God gives it a great and acute power, the knowledge of evil and good, which are water and fire. For as water overflows and conceals in its depths deadly creatures and useless things, so a person overflows with evil deeds and conceals them lest he be discovered. And as fire burns and leaves no impurity unconsumed, or as a craftsman purifies jewelry by fire to remove its rust, so too does good purify a person, melting the rust of wickedness off him. Now water and fire are inimical, extinguishing or evaporating each other. And so too does a person: He kills good by evil, or evil by good, and either way he silently hides his desires within himself and turns them over in his mind.

VISION TWO

12 On the working of the two motives

And while he is mulling over these desires, the person's will makes its choice of the way he wants to go, and he stretches out his hand to it and moves along it by his deeds. He does good work by God's help through grace, and he does evil by the Devil's craft and his artful temptations; and the person himself observes his deeds by the exercise of his reason. With this reason he contemplates good and evil, and the desire rises in him to choose between the two ways, good and evil, according to his will. What does this mean?

The person has the choice in that his mind's desires reflect different things to him like a mirror, and he says to himself, "If only I could do this or that!" He has not yet done them in actuality, but he has thought about them. So he stands at the fork of two roads, with knowledge of the motives of good or evil; and as he desires so at last he does, and travels upward or downward.

13 Righteous institutions arose in Abraham and Moses

And the other part of the wall, as you see, is like stones joined together; which symbolizes the human race, but also designates the righteous institutions that came from the minds of people like Abraham, Moses and the others, who were the preliminary offshoots of the Law of God and all its just additions up to the end of time. How? God works in Man and through Man; thus He sent His Son to save humanity at the end of the time of the Law, working in a sinless human body. And He took the foundation of faith on Himself, and carried the whole human race with Him, even the first man who was cast out of Paradise for transgressing justice. And He achieved this wondrous deed for humanity through His Law, in which He embraced all Christians; and they make up this building in the goodness of the Father, because Man will live in the celestial Jerusalem.

BOOK THREE

14 Reflective knowledge began in Noah but iniquity reigned uninterrupted

So the two kinds of wall join each other on the east and on the north. For reflective knowledge and human labor join together to end the injustice in which the human race was entangled when it forgot God. From Adam arose the raging injustice of the world before the flood; and because of that world's iniquity, the injustice was drowned with the people in the flood of waters. And then reflective knowledge first appeared, by My inspiration, in Noah's knowledge of good as in the east corner, as was foretold. But though God's admonition flourished in Noah, bold and greedy evil arose again and marched triumphantly to the North. And the iniquity of division from God was not trodden underfoot until Abraham, in whom, as in the north corner, it was choked off and the penetrating light of God's justice arose.

And truly the shining part of the wall goes uninterruptedly from the east corner to the north corner. This is to say that reflective knowledge to fortify human minds first appeared in the east corner, that is, in the days of Noah. Before Noah, iniquity sought to do all it could to mock God, and so people followed their own lusts instead of loving to worship God; and the first descendants of Adam were completely devoured by the Devil, because the knowledge was hidden from them, until in Noah that knowledge was displayed openly. This had been foreshadowed even when the Devil was confident that the whole human race was in his power. But iniquity went on as far as the north corner, that is, until the coming of Abraham and Moses; for before them, iniquity still reigned almost supreme, not yet interrupted or defeated by the established justice of God's Law, since circumcision and the Law had not yet been given. But by these fathers the Devil began to be confounded, where previously he had reigned confidently in the world; in the words of Paul, My light-giving vessel of election:

15 Words of Paul

"Death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over those who had not sinned in the same way as Adam, who was a type of Him Who was to come" [Romans 5:14]. Which is to say: Death reigned, with no competitors or conquerors, from the time of Adam to the time of Moses. How? Before Moses the severity and dignity of the Law had not yet been given, except the small preview of it in the circumcision Abraham accomplished at God's command; and so deathly vice went from error to error as it pleased. But then, by God's will, there arose the strong soldier Moses, and he prepared stout weapons of justice, which destroyed the worship of death by means of the Law, which contained in itself the complete salvation of souls, because it foreshadowed the Son of God. Death indeed even ruled the innocent, who were simple and moderate and did not repeat in their actions the deeds of Adam. And Adam was a type of Him Who was to come. How? God created Adam just and innocent of all thought or deed of sin; and so too the Son of God was born of the Virgin Mary, with no stains of sin.

VISION TWO

16 Righteousness is shown in Abraham and Moses, justice in the Incarnation

But you see that the stone part goes from the north corner around the west and south corners and ends in the east corner. This means that the righteous works of humans, with which God fortified them, came forth from the north corner, which is to say from the circumcision of Abraham and the Law of Moses and the justice they inspired in people. They continued to the west corner, where open justice arose in the Incarnation of the Son of God; went on from there to the south corner, where through baptism and the other just works of the new-chosen Bride of the Son of God ardent deeds were enkindled to restore Adam to salvation; and at last returned to the east corner, to end restored to the Supreme Father. How? The Supreme Father in His mystery ordained every work of justice that would bring the first, fallen man back into salvation by a return to God. How? Man had fallen, and so I arose in mercy and sent My Son to restore salvation to souls, as My servant the psalmist David shows, saying:

17 Words of David

“His will is in the law of the Lord, and on that law he shall meditate day and night” [Psalm 1:2]. Which is to say that the will of the Father to save is contained in the law of justice His Only-Begotten showed to the world: Who is One God with the Father and the Holy Spirit and rules the whole globe. And He, the Son of the Father, was incarnate and seen as a visible Man, and in the flesh was uplifted above all creatures. How? The Son of God was begotten of His Father before all worlds and later, in the last times, born into the world of a mother; but while He was not yet incarnate He remained invisible within the Father as the will is invisible in a person before it is shown in a deed, and then later appeared visibly in the flesh for human salvation.

So the Almighty Father meditates with His Son upon an act of justice to counter the original fall of Adam. Where? In the love of His Son, Who was before time began in the Father in the glory of divinity, and then became miraculously incarnate at the appointed epoch of the world, when the Father sent Him from His heart into the world as the High Priest of all justice.

BOOK THREE

Therefore the Son embodied the law of justice, as He received it from the Father when Christian law was made.

And on that law, which the Father willed to establish and make through His Son, He meditates by day. How? He Himself is the Day; and in that Day, before He made any transitory creature and while no darkness or iniquity existed in any creation of His, He meditated on His Son's law.

And also by night. How? Because when evil arose in His creatures, which is like the darkness of night in angels and people, the Father continued to meditate, and will do so until the last day, as long as His ineffable works shall last; He shows and reveals the law of His Son when in Him He perfects all the good deeds that are to be perfected in Man.

18 Christ's members and the Church still lack the perfection they will have

But you see that the stone part of the wall is interrupted in two places, on the west side and on the south side. This is to say that the work of the human race to fortify its defenses is still unfinished in two areas. The members of the Son of God, His chosen, remain imperfect, which is to say that the west side is interrupted, since from there the Son of God was sent in these last times into the world. And the Church is also still imperfect in virtue, not as she will be set up and established in the celestial Jerusalem, so that the south side is interrupted, for the Church will be perfected in Heaven.

19 The number ten, diminished by Adam, is multiplied again by Christ

This building is a hundred cubits long, which means that the mystical number ten was diminished by humanity when it transgressed, but was restored by My Son and multiplied by ten to a hundred, as virtues were multiplied in the salvation of souls. And from the hundred, again multiplied by the ten, there will come the perfect number one thousand, referring to the virtues that will completely destroy the thousand arts of the Devil, which now seduce the whole flock of Almighty God's lovely sheep. What does this mean?

I, the Omnipotent, in the beginning made lights that burned and lived, shining in splendor, some of which stood fast in My love, but some despised Me their Creator and fell. But it did not befit Me, the Creator, to discard what I had made as useless and ruined. How? A part of the angelic creation grew proud of the good the Creator gave it that it might know Him, and decided that it could take on false glory and be like its Creator; and so it fell into death. Then God foresaw that what had fallen in this lost group could be more firmly restored in another. How? He created Man from the mud of the earth, living in soul and body, to attain to that glory from which the apostate Devil and his followers were cast out. Man is thus exceedingly dear to God, Who made him truly in His own image and likeness; he was to exercise all the virtues in the perfection of holiness, as indeed God formed all creatures to do, and to work in humble obedience to do acts of virtue, and so to fulfil the function of praise among the more glorious orders of angels. And thus, in this height of blessedness he was to augment the praise of the heavenly spirits who praise God with assiduous devotion, and so fill up the place left empty by the lost angel who fell in his presumption.

And so Man symbolizes the full number ten, perfecting these things by the power of God. But in this figure ten is multiplied to a hundred. For Man was seduced by the Devil and fell away from God; but at last he was admonished by divine mercy and inspiration, began to acknowledge God in the law and prophecy of the Old Testament, and then attained more insight by the sanctity and the means of constancy in virtue given by the Church.

And so, starting with Abel, Man began to practice all the virtues, and will continue to perfect them until the day of the last just person; and this is why the length of the building is the number one hundred, which God shows to humanity in a mystical figure that it may not despair if it falls back into iniquity, but rise above it and vigorously do the work of God. For anyone who falls into sin but then rises from it again will be stronger than he was before, as God gave greater and stronger virtues to humanity by sending His Son into the world to raise up the prostrate human race than it had had before.

And therefore people work more strongly in soul and body than if they had no difficulty in doing it, since they struggle against themselves in many perils; and, waging these fierce wars together with the Lord God Who fights faithfully for them, they conquer themselves, chastising their bodies, and so know themselves to be in His army. But an angel, lacking the hardships of an earthly body, is a soldier of Heaven only in its harmonious, lucid and pure constancy in seeing God; while a human, handicapped by the filth of his body, is a strong, glorious and holy soldier in the work of restoration, which he does in soul and body for the sake of God. And so by the number one hundred of his present labor he attains to the one thousand of future repayment; on the last day he will receive his full and eternal reward, and rejoice in soul and body without end in the celestial habitations. And so the diminished ten is recovered through My Son, Who was born of the Virgin and suffered on the cross, and brought back humanity to the realms of Heaven. As My Son says in the Gospel:

BOOK THREE

20 Words of the Gospel

“What woman who has ten coins, if she loses one of them, does not light a candle, and sweep the house until she finds it? And when she has found it, she calls together her friends and neighbors, and says, ‘Rejoice with me, for I have found my coin that was lost’ ” [Luke 15:8-9]. Which is to say: The Holy Divinity had ten coins, namely ten orders of the heavenly hierarchy, including the chosen angels and Man. It lost one coin when Man fell into death by following the Devil’s temptations instead of the divine precepts. Hence the Divinity kindled a burning lamp, namely Christ, Who was true God and true Man and the splendid Sun of Justice; and with Him He swept the house, namely the Jewish people, and searched the Law for all the meaning of salvation, and established a new sanctification, and found His coin, Man, whom He had lost. Then He called together His friends, namely earthly deeds of justice, and His neighbors, namely spiritual virtues, and said, “Rejoice with Me in praise and joy, and build the celestial Jerusalem with living stones, for I have found Man, who had perished by the deception of the Devil!”

21 The five wounds of Christ wipe out human sins

And you see that the building is fifty cubits wide, which is to say that the whole breadth of the vices of humanity, which should have built on and revered the work of God but instead followed its own lusts, is mercifully wiped out and forgiven by the five wounds that My Son suffered on the cross. So the wounds of His hands obliterated the deed of disobedience done by the hands of Adam and Eve, and the wounds of His feet cleared the path of exile for humanity to return, and the wound of His side, from which sprang the Church, wiped out the sin of Eve and Adam after Eve was made from Adam’s side. And therefore My Son was nailed to the tree, to abolish what had been done through the tree that occasioned sin; and therefore He drank vinegar and gall, to take away the taste of the harmful fruit.

22 The Holy Spirit made Man’s five senses able to know good and evil

The wall is five cubits high, which refers to the virtue of divine knowledge of the Scriptures, which imbue Man’s five senses for the sake of the work of God. The Holy Spirit breathed on them for people’s good; for with the five senses people can regard the height of Divinity, and discern both good and evil.

VISION TWO

- 23 Soul and body must work to avoid evil and do good in all circumstances

Thus the two side walls are of equal length; for, contained within the edifice of God's goodness, people must work with great constancy with the two side walls of soul and body flanking them. How? To avoid evil and do good. How? The profound and incomprehensible power of God created Man to worship God with all his strength and all his might and with all the devotion of his intelligent reason; and it is right that the Creator of all things should, before and above everything, be worshipped worthily as God.

- 24 The mind must have the wisdom and discernment to know God

Therefore the front and back walls are of equal length; for in the work of God wisdom and discretion are like two walls, with wisdom as the higher part and discretion as the lower. And God imbues the whole of the human mind with these, an equitable and just gift, that the mind may know Him.

- 25 People should gain devout faith from considering the four elements

But the four walls are equal in height, except for the bulwarks, which are somewhat taller. This is to say that Man, living as he does among the four elements, should hold high the Catholic faith with constant devotion and veneration through the goodness of the Father; he should worship the Son with the Father and the Holy Spirit, as the Son does all Their works in Them. How? Every work that the Son of God has done and is doing, He perfects through the goodness of the Father in the Holy Spirit. What does this mean? According to the will of the Father, the Son in His great goodness redeemed humanity through His Incarnation; for the Father ordained that the Son should be born of the Virgin, conceived by the Holy Spirit, and assume humanity for love of Man to bring him back to restored life. Therefore Man has a part in God, and can enter into salvation with Him, if he has the true Catholic faith and knows the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit as the one true God.

- 26 The faithful person ascends from virtue to virtue

The bulwarks are much higher. How? Because when a person regards the height of goodness in his mind, he then builds a high wall of faith by virtue of the work of God. Then he ascends above that rational faith, which shows him God in the power of His Divinity, and on it he builds bulwarks of virtue higher than the wall. How? He finds that it is not enough to have faith in God, and so builds virtues that rise higher; and so he grows, like a flourishing palm tree, from virtue to virtue, and by these virtues his righteous faith is exalted and adorned as bulwarks do a city.

BOOK THREE

27 The Father sent His Son into the world to do His will and redeem Man

And between the building and the light of the circle, which extends from the height to the abyss, at the top of the east corner there is only a palm's breadth. This is the width of the heavenly secrets that lie between the work of the Son of God when He lived in the world and did divine works, here shown as a building, and the power of the Father, which expands in mighty splendor into the places below and the places above. He sent His Son into the world to be the capstone of the corner that faces east, made up of the justice first prefigured in Noah and perfected in the Incarnation of the Son. Thus these secrets were, so to speak, just a hand's breadth wide, the distance from the thumb to the little finger of the flat hand; and that was the time ordained in the heart of the Father when He willed to send His Son. He sent Him with a strong hand, and surrounded Him with all the joints of His fingers, which are His works in the Holy Spirit, that He might accomplish the will of His Father and suffer upon the cross for the wretched and contemptible disobedience with which the Devil inspired the first man. To redeem that man from that sin God's mercy bent down to earth, and the incomprehensible height of divinity was contained in the humanity of the Son of God.

28 The defeat of evil and the goals of justice are secrets of God's will

But at the north and west and south corners the breadth of separation between the building and the light is so great that you cannot grasp its extent. This is to say that no one weighed down by a mortal body can understand the elation of evil in the heart of the Devil in the North; or its consummation in active creatures in the West of fallen Man; or the beginning or end of the supernal justice, which is the ardent South. Nor can such a one see how these things are worked out and differentiated between the deeds of all peoples and the power of My knowledge. Both the elect and the reprobate are subjected to a just scrutiny and examined most diligently and strictly on their [obedience] to My precepts; and all should trust in Me to feed them in all their needs. But all these things are so hidden in My secret counsels that human senses and understanding can never take in or understand the extent of their profundity, except as far as is granted by My permission.

VISION TWO

But let the one who has ears sharp to hear inner meanings ardently love My reflection and pant after My words, and inscribe them in his soul and conscience.

TOWER OF GOD'S ANTICIPATING WILL

FIVE VIRTUES

VISION THREE

The Tower of Anticipation of God's Will

After this I looked, and behold! In the middle of the shining part of the building's outer wall there stood an iron-colored tower, which was built out from the outer side. It was four cubits wide and seven cubits high. In it I saw five figures standing separately, each in its own arch with a conical turret above it. The first of these faced the East, the second the Northeast, the third the North, and the fourth the pillar of the Word of God at whose foot was the patriarch Abraham; and the fifth faced the tower of the Church and the people who were hastening here and there in the building.

And the five figures resembled each other in being dressed in silk garments and white shoes, except the fifth, who was armored at all points. The second and third were bareheaded, with loose white hair, and wore no cloak; the first, third and fourth wore white tunics; and this was all the difference between them.

The first figure wore on her head a bishop's miter, and had loose white hair; and she wore a white pallium, whose two borders were adorned on the inside with embroidered purple. In her right hand she held lilies and other flowers, and in her left hand a palm. And she said, "O sweet life, O sweet embrace of eternal life, O blessed happiness, in which consist the eternal rewards! For You are always in true delight, and so I can never be filled or sated with the inner joy that is in my God."

And the second was clothed in a purple tunic, and stood like a youth who has not yet attained adulthood but is very serious. And she said, "Neither the dreadful foe who is the Devil nor the hostility of humans nor this world shall frighten me, who stand in the discipline of God and am constantly in His sight."

The third covered her face with the white sleeve that clothed her right arm, and said, "O filth and uncleanness of this world! Hide yourselves and flee from my eyes, for my Beloved was born of the Virgin Mary."

The fourth had her head veiled in womanly fashion with a white veil, and was hung about with a yellow cloak. On her breast was a picture of Jesus Christ, and around it was written, "Through the depths of the mercy of our God, in which the Dayspring from on high has visited us" [Luke 1:78]. And she said, "I stretch out my hands always to pilgrims, and the needy, and the poor and weak, and those who groan."

But the fifth was armed and arrayed with a helmet on her head, and a breastplate and greaves, and iron gloves; a shield hung from her left shoulder; she was girded with a sword and she held a spear in her right hand. And under her feet a lion lay, its mouth open and its tongue hanging out, and some people also stood; some were blowing trumpets, some fooling with instruments used in shows, and some playing different games. And that figure trampled the lion under her feet, and at the same time pierced these people with the spear she held in her right hand. And she said, "I conquer the strong Devil, and you also, Hate and Envy and Filth, with your deceptive jesters."

And inside the building I saw two other figures standing opposite this tower. The first stood on the floor of the building, in a niche of fiery splendor whose inside was painted with pictures of various evil spirits and which was across from the tower. The other figure stood next to this niche but was outside it and had no niche of its own. Both figures looked sometimes at the tower and sometimes at the people who were entering and leaving the building. These figures were also dressed in silk garments and veiled in women's fashion in white head-coverings, and wore no cloaks but had on white shoes.

And the first of these had on her head a three-sided crown, of a glowing red like a hyacinth, and was clad in a white tunic, with green embroideries in all the folds. And she said, "I conquer in the East with the mighty Son of God, Who went forth from the Father and came into the world to redeem humanity, and afterward died in great suffering on the cross, rose from the dead, ascended into Heaven and returned to the Father. Therefore I shall not be confounded, but will flee from the miseries and pains of this world."

And the second was clad in a white tunic, which was slightly tinged with color; and on her right arm she carried a cross with the image of the Savior, over which she bent her head. And she said, "This child bore many sorrows in this world, and therefore I will weep and know sorrow always for the sake of eternal joy, into which the good sheep will be led by the Son of God."

And I saw that all these figures were uttering their individual speeches through the mystery of God, to admonish humans. And again the One sitting on the throne, Who was showing me all these things, said to me,

I The divine virtues put forth by the Law bear fruit in the Gospel

By the strength and constancy of God's will, the divine virtues sprang up gradually in the Old Testament; but to those who revered them almost in ignorance, they did not yet taste completely sweet and delightful. For then, the Law was seen only in austerity, sharply correcting the delinquent; but afterward, these virtues by the grace of God brought forth much fruit in the new Law, showing the hungry the sweetest, strongest and most perfect food, the love of celestial things. Previous to this, as was said, certain hidden things were a sign of what was to come; and so this miraculous vision appropriately shows.

VISION THREE

For this tower you see standing in the middle of the shining part of the building's outer wall is the image of the anticipation of God's will, shown in many different ways and meanings in the circumcision; so that by the sign of circumcision God displayed the Law, and by the Law the grace of the Gospel. For by the faith manifested in Abraham, there arose in him also the circumcision, a true prefiguration of the mystery; beginning in him, the divine power built up strong virtues, as it were in the middle of the road of the knowledge of the two ways, defended by the goodness of the Supreme Father. And these virtues were by God's will destined to appear openly; they foreshadowed His will before He displayed it manifestly in His deeds.

It is iron-colored, and built out from the outer side. This is God's justice, strong and invincible, which first showed itself outwardly in reflective knowledge by means of the circumcision, which was apparent in the outer flesh. And it is established with the blessed virtues among the spiritual things of that spiritual wall that God built within people.

2 Virtues are brought about in people by God's will

The tower is four cubits wide; for these virtues, by God's will, are brought about in people by placing them in the world of the four elements, from which, while they are in the body, they get physical nourishment. It is seven cubits high; for there were seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, which are so firm and tall that the tower raised itself on them until, after the Incarnation of My Son, which was prefigured in the circumcision of the Old Testament, the Church came forth from it.

3 On the states of Heavenly Love, Discipline, Modesty, Mercy and Victory

In it you see five figures standing separately, each in its own arch with a conical turret above it. This is to say that in this tower, that is in the strength of the circumcision, there are five strong virtues; not that any virtue is a living form in itself, but a brilliant star given by God that shines forth in human deeds. For humanity is perfected by virtues, which are the deeds of people working in God.

Hence these five virtues stand in this tower in the likeness of a person's five senses. They seized with great zeal upon the circumcision, and cut it off from all iniquity, as the five human senses are circumcised in the Church by baptism. But they do not work in a person by themselves, for the person works with them and they with the person; just as the person's five senses do not work by themselves, but the person with them and they with the person, to bear fruit together. And so each of them works hard, as much as it can, and thus has a turreted apex of authority, the surpassing dignity of virtuous constancy.

The first of these faces the East; for this virtue looked forward with sobs of love to the Son of God whenever He was to come, and spoke openly about the eternal life the circumcision was hiding.

The second looks to the Northeast; for this figure divided her attention between the East and the North, regarding God in the East with great discipline, but also disdaining the behavior of the people in the North, who manifested undisciplined licentiousness and did not regard God or His Law with worthy reverence.

The third faces the North; for she destroys unlawful fornication with great strength, despising it and shielding herself from it by the Law.

The fourth looks toward the pillar of the Word of God at whose foot is the patriarch Abraham; for she cleaves to the Incarnation of the Son of God, touching it through the beginning Abraham made, that miraculous foreshadowing of the ram caught in the thornbush.

And the fifth faces the tower of the Church and the people who are hastening here and there in the building; for this image rises up victorious, and destroys every injustice that originated in Adam. She looks to the strength of the Church to help her conquer the vices of the Devil; she shows herself to the people who are hastening to and fro in the Church and all behaving differently, inspiring them to be the flock of God's justice and worship Him with reverent zeal.

4 Their dress and what it signifies

And the five figures resemble each other, which is to say that they worship God in human deeds with equal devotion. Each of them is dressed in silk garments; for each of these virtues is sweet and delightful, never weighing people down or constraining them, but softly instilling into their minds the sweetness of the heavenly kingdom as balm distils from a bush, with no crusted filth of injustice. And they are shod in white shoes, for they follow My justice in righteousness and celestial purity, trampling down surrender to the Devil and stamping out his traces in human beings.

But the fifth virtue is armored at all points; for she looks to the Church, where the fiercest wars are waged against the Devil's vice; she extends her victory everywhere in it, wearing the priceless armor, which is God's invincible strength; and this strength slays all injustice and confounds the deceit of the Devil.

VISION THREE

The second and third are bareheaded, with loose white hair. This means that, for love of Me, they avoid assuming burdens of labor or wealth or lust; bareheaded, which is to say with a clear conscience, they open to Me all their secret mind. They cast away all confusion and license of the desires of the flesh; and the first sign of this is their white hair, which symbolizes the purity of the mind that desires good works. And they wear no cloak; for they reject the customs of the pagans and the lust and filth of the Devil, and abandon all secular cares, because the wisdom of the world is foolishness with God.

The first, third and fourth wear white tunics. This means they hold fast to innocence, which prefigures with sweet chastity the Incarnation of My Son, Who withdrew humanity from death and clothed it with life in salvation. And this is all the difference between them; for each gets her strength from the Holy Spirit, but they use different paths of the soul to attain their one desire in God. And so by them the celestial Jerusalem will be perfectly built, for these virtues are the deeds people do to reach God.

5 On Celestial Love's dress and what it means

Therefore the first figure signifies Celestial Love, for this love must exist in people before anything else. She wears on her head a bishop's miter, and has loose white hair; for this virtue was crowned in the High Priest Jesus Christ, but also in the high priests of the Old Testament and in those who called to the Son of God, "Would that You would rend the heavens and come down!" [Isaiah 64:1]. She stands without a woman's head-covering, so that her hair flows free and its whiteness is seen; and by this hair she prefigures the freeing of the priesthood from the ties of marriage through the advent of My Son. For His priests should, for the sake of salvation, imitate Him in chastity; they should always hold to the perfect heavenly love and shake off the evil actions of sin-stained humanity, and thus form the clear, white part of God's spiritual gift.

And she wears a white pallium, whose two borders are adorned on the inside with embroidered purple. This is to say that the grace of God surrounds her in gentle purity, its boundaries of protection fortified and adorned with the beautiful ornaments of charity. For divine grace will extend to every good deed, which is made up of two parts, God's love and the doer's.

And in her right hand she holds lilies and other flowers, which means that for her good works she has the reward of the lilies of eternal life and light and holiness. These are her companions, who have joined themselves to her by heavenly love.

And in her left hand she carries a palm, which has grown out of the secret place of blessed virtue in remembrance of death; and with it she can stop death as if by rolling stones in its path. And this she declares in the words, already quoted, that she speaks to the children of God.

6 On Discipline's dress and what it means

And the second represents Discipline; for after the love of the celestial life has arisen, carnal lusts must be restrained by the discipline of contrition. She is clothed in a purple tunic, for she is surrounded by My Law and the mortification of human flesh, and the purple garment is the example of My Son, Who was born of the Virgin in charity and gave it every means of working.

She stands like a youth who has not yet attained adulthood but is very serious. For Discipline is always full of childlike fear, the fear of a child under restraint who respects his schoolmaster. I, the Almighty, am the Master of discipline; in Me she appears not as an adult, for she does not try to wield power to do her own will, but faithfully and reverently fears. And she shows this in her words, quoted above.

7 On Modesty's dress and what it means

The third represents Modesty, for modesty appears after discipline to blush and drive away sin. Therefore she covers her face with the white sleeve that clothes her right arm; for she protects her inner conscience, which is, as it were, the face of her soul, by flying from fornication and the Devil's pollution. She defends herself with the white garment of innocence and chastity, on the right hand of which is the salvation coming from her deeds. For contempt and utter rejection of the filth of Satan is entwined strongly round her conscience, as she declares in the words of her admonition quoted above.

8 On Mercy

And the fourth signifies Mercy; for after modesty appears the virtue of mercy to help the needy. In the heart of the Father is true mercy of His grace, which He ordained in His eternal counsel and mercifully showed to Abraham in the circumcision. For He led him forth from his land and commanded that he and his race be circumcised, and showed him great wonders in the true Trinity; and through this He symbolically foreshadowed His Son, and foreshadowed mercy to Abraham in the sacrifice of Isaac.

And she has her head veiled in womanly fashion with a white veil, which is the roof and foundation of salvation, inasmuch as one who has mercy can bring back lost souls to the pure protection of the holy veil from out of the exile of death. It makes souls white and people radiant to be covered with

God's mercy; and so those who disdained God while they were in sin will find Him shining on them like a gentle sunbeam when Mercy is brought to them from Heaven. And so Mercy, in the figure of a woman, is a fruitful mother of souls saved from perdition. For as a woman covers her head, so Mercy averts the death of souls; and as women are sweeter than men, so Mercy is sweeter than the rabid insanity of crime in a sinner before his heart is visited by God. And the virtue of Mercy also appears in feminine form because, when one virginal body was enclosed by womanly chastity, sweetest Mercy arose in the womb of Mary; Mercy had always dwelt in the Father, but now the Father showed her as visible through the Holy Spirit in the Virgin's womb.

She is hung about with a yellow cloak; for she is surrounded by the shining sun, the sign of My Son, Who shines on the world from Heaven as the sun's splendor shines on the earth. For My Son is the true Sun, lighting up the world by the sanctification of the Church.

And on her breast she has a picture of My Only-Begotten, which means that I put My Son on the breast of Mercy when I sent Him into the womb of the Virgin Mary.

And therefore, around it is written, "Through the depths of the mercy of our God, in which the Dayspring from on high has visited us" [Luke 1:78]. What does this mean? That everywhere My power extends, the secret of what is on the breast of Mercy shows that My Son is the true Mercy. How? As it was foretold in the words of My servant Zacharias in the Gospel, for it was he who said, "Through the depths of the mercy of our God, in which the Dayspring from on high has visited us." Which is to say that salvation comes from the depths of the Father's mercy; for it was hidden in His heart, as the viscera are hidden in a person, that His Son was to be incarnate and God visit humanity at the end of times. How? In the celestial bread, which is His Son, born in the flesh of the Virgin Mary and come forth from the heart of the Father on high to offer the greatest mercy to those who seek Him, as that virtue tells the children of God in her words quoted above.

9 On Victory's dress and what it means

And the fifth figure foreshadows Victory; for after the mercy I showed by the circumcision when I willed to send My Son into the world, the same circumcision gave rise to victory, which then went on with increasing strength till the coming of My Son, and goes on with Him until the last day. For in My Son I defeated the ancient serpent, which had exalted itself over His head and bound the human race by a thousand evil deeds like a chain. My Son triumphed over those evil deeds with all the arms of war that, like flowers of virtue, arose in His Incarnation. What does this mean? That after mercy arises victory in people too, as soon as they conquer themselves and their harmful vices. How? Among the five virtues the first is celestial love, which consists in a person knowing and loving God above all things. Then the person, because of his faith, is bound by the law of discipline; and from there he goes on to repress his tendency to sin through good and righteous modesty. And so by these three powers the person will attain a just heart, and be able to see the next thing, the suffering of his neighbor; and then he will provide all necessities for him as for himself.

And with these three powers the person soon becomes a strong soldier, perfected in mind by imitating My Son, the true Samaritan, in mercy. And then he wins victory over the power of the Devil with the arms of virtue; he conquers himself and governs his neighbor, and by these virtues slays all evil, rejecting the pride that drove Adam from Paradise.

And this fifth virtue is armed with a helmet on her head; for Man in the fullness of celestial desire should long for God, Who is the Head of all things, and so attain eternal salvation. She is arrayed with a breastplate; this is so that Man may resist the Devil by justly restraining the will of his carnal desires. For he has become subject to God in true fear and trembling, faithfully dreading His stern judgment, as the psalmist David says, instructed by Me:

“Your lightnings lit up the world; the earth shook and trembled” [Psalm 76:19]. This is to say: Your wonders and secrets, O Lord of all, shone forth and miraculously appeared. How? Like lightning, which is partly seen and partly concealed, just as Your mysteries are sometimes understood but sometimes unknown. For throughout the whole world, wondrously created by Your will, there is no race to which the name of Your glory and the power of Your majesty will not come; they will come miraculously by different paths with remarkable signs, even to those whom the light of faith and truth has not yet illumined for their salvation. Therefore, people will turn, shaken by sighs, away from their own will; they will forsake their lusts, trembling at the judgment of Heaven. Formerly Man forgot himself and walked in earthly deeds; but now he will be wise and come to himself.

This virtue is also arrayed with greaves, so that when she sees the right path she can leave the paths of death by way of chastisement of the body. And she has iron gloves, so that through mental circumcision and right faith she may escape the works of the Devil, believe in God and so evade the snares of the cruel enemy. A shield hangs from her left shoulder; for the left is the side of the Devil’s combat with Man, and so she is surrounded there with the grace of God’s mighty precepts. Man by these is surrounded and defended with such strong faith that the Devil cannot corrupt him by temptations, and he will not succumb to the Devil’s vices as long as God’s protection circles his shoulders; for God's grace binds the high and strong soul to Himself with the bond of love of God and neighbor.

And she is girded with a sword, because people must keep themselves in the austere power of God's words by chastising their bodies and cutting away iniquity both from themselves and from others. And she holds a spear in her right hand; which is to say that a person who trusts in God may attack and overcome the Devil's filth with the great peace of the Lord. And this is true justice in the evil combat of Devil against Man, which the latter can hardly win without the help of God.

And under her feet a lion lies, its mouth open; this is the Devil, laid low by Victory at the foot of the righteous path of life and truth as he was gaping with bitter cruelty to swallow the human race. Its tongue is hanging out, which represents his plan wickedly to devour the whole race of people descended from Adam.

And some people also stand under her feet. These people, brought to a standstill by her fighting force, are the flutes of the Devil, who are supple that evil may be played upon them. And she, acting righteously in God's zeal, justly strikes them, because their many and various perverse tricks aid and serve the Devil.

Some of them are blowing trumpets. For they are drunk with the sound of evil, and rave in the exaltation of a burning mind; in great pride they hate God's justice, race upon race. Some are fooling with instruments used in shows; for they try to deceive with the Devil's fantastic illusions, and stubbornly hold to their twisted pride and envy God's discipline. And others are playing different games; they are caught in the perverse filth of vice not by the choice of their own will, as they suppose, but by the snares of the Devil.

And that figure tramples the lion and all these people under her feet; for with great zeal and divine justice she crushes all these vanities of human art and diabolical persuasion. And at the same time she pierces them with the spear she holds in her right hand; for, with the confidence and daring she derives from God, she pierces, conquers and wounds all these uncleannesses. For by God they are mocked and judged as naught, as she says in the words of admonition previously seen.

10 On Patience and Longing and what they mean

And inside the building you see two other figures standing opposite this tower. This is to say that in the work the Heavenly Father did through His Son, which showed clearly and visibly the One prefigured in the circumcision, two other virtues sprang up. One of these was to see the example of Christ and how to follow in His steps, and the other was to anticipate with fortitude and reverence the will of God; and they are the fruit that was foreshadowed in the circumcision.

The first of these stands on the floor of the building, in a niche of fiery splendor whose inside is painted with pictures of various evil spirits and which is across from the tower. For this virtue is perfected amid earthly things and treads them underfoot in the goodness of the Father, when it follows the example of the Son of God and passes beyond the desires of the flesh. How? By great endurance it bypasses the worldly misery, depicted in this niche, which is the might of secular power, fierce and terrible in its detaining pride. The Devil's company follows it, and the Devil himself draws to his will the inner desires of the souls of the secular, who love carnal things; and the niche, in its earthly power, often opposes itself to justice and resists the true testament built on God. But Patience is victorious, and in good people conquers everything with the help of God, no matter how they are opposed and exhausted by the snares of the evil spirits.

The other figure stands next to this niche but is outside it and has no niche of its own. For after the first virtue patiently conquers the power of arrogance, even though it inflicts pains on her, the second one surpasses this power, for it arises outside the range of the pains dealt out by arrogance and escapes its rage. Longing stands next to Patience, in remembrance of the griefs from which she took her origin; but she is outside all niches, for she is free from the power of this world and openly carries the cross of Christ.

Both figures are looking sometimes at the tower; which is to say that the work prefigured in God's provident will is completed in them, and so they regard its roots in the circumcision of the Old Testament. They are greater than their start in the circumcision, because the radiant deed excels the beginning of the thought. And sometimes they are looking at the people who are entering and leaving the building. This means that they are admonishing in the Holy Spirit both those who are treading the path of justice toward God and those who are entering the orbit of the Devil's crimes and leaving the just path; and they are telling the latter to imitate them in good.

II Their dress and what it means

These figures are also dressed in silk garments; for they possess great sweetness, so that people may not groan under a heavy weight of labor when persecuted. They are veiled in women's fashion in white head-coverings; for people should justly be subject to God as their Head, and wrap Him around their minds in pure love, and embrace Him in joy and gladness, as a wife holds her husband according to God's ordinance in fearful and loving honor.

They wear no cloaks; for they lack all care for secular things, but lean only toward the things which are eternal in God and the life to come. But they have on white shoes; for they shine in the path of justice by the purity of faith in human minds, so that people may follow their steps and their example.

VISION THREE

12 On Patience's dress in particular and what it means

The first figure designates Patience, who arose in the horn of Abraham, which is to say in the time his obedience to God began; and this, with his circumcision, was the first sound of obedience that had occurred after the fall of Adam. It preceded the work of obedience in the true Word, which is in the Son of God, as sound precedes a word; and it came in the North, the side facing the wicked deeds and turbulence of the ancient serpent. And she has on her head a three-sided crown, of a glowing red like a hyacinth; for she was first crowned through the faith in the Holy Trinity of the faithful people, who despise their flesh and do not hesitate to shed their blood for the love of God and the true faith. For the Son of God appeared in the flesh to conquer death with the redness of His blood, and it adorned the Church like the glowing red beauty of the noble hyacinth.

She is clad in a white tunic, with green embroideries in all the folds. For she has clothed herself in the garment of God's work in the whiteness of perpetual light, whose folds are embroidered with the sorrows and laments of one who says, "Oh, when shall I come to the sight of the true Light?" And this desire is suffered happily in the present life by thinking of what it foreshadows: The very adversities and calamities of the faithful adorn their souls with greenness, and their suffering them in patience for the sake of God embellishes them. Which, indeed, this virtue declares, in her words already quoted.

13 On Longing's dress in particular and what it means

And the other figure represents Longing. For after patience in adversity, there arises among My elect the longing for the remembered life, springing from My admonition that I sent My Son from My heart because of the longing of My people. For My people of both the Old and the New Testaments had and have this remembrance of mind, which ornaments its longing with groans, for it is true compunction of heart.

And so she also stands in the North quarter, to repulse the dissolute uncleanness of the Devil's snares. And she is clad in a white tunic, which is slightly tinged with color; for the purity of faith surrounds her with good works, but nonetheless she is pale and troubled, because her faith always sighs and sobs for eternal felicity. On her right arm she carries a cross with the image of the Savior, over which she bends her head; which is to say that with her right hand, the hand that strongly does her noble task, she embraces My

Son's Passion. She longs for Him, and bends over Him with her whole desire and intent, imitating Him in suffering and grief; as she shows in the words of her exhortation, already quoted.

And so you see that all these figures are uttering their individual speeches through the mystery of God, to admonish humans; for in all the virtues, God's tenderness sweetly instructs the minds of the peoples and exhorts them to put aside evil and raise themselves up to good.

But let the one who has ears sharp to hear inner meanings ardently love My reflection and pant after My words, and inscribe them in his soul and conscience.

PILLAR OF THE WORD OF GOD

THE VIRTUE OF KNOWLEDGE OF GOD

VISION FOUR

The Pillar of the Word of God

And then, beyond the tower of anticipation of God's will, one cubit past the corner that faces the North, attached to the outside of the shining part of the main wall of the building, I saw a pillar the color of steel, most dreadful to behold, and so big and tall that I could not form an idea of its measurements. And the pillar was divided from bottom to top into three sides, with edges sharp as a sword; the first edge faced the East, the second the North and the third the South, and the latter was somewhat merged with the outside wall of the building.

From the edge that faced the East, branches grew out from the root to the summit. At the root I saw Abraham sitting on the first branch; then Moses on the second; then Joshua on the third; and then the rest of the patriarchs and prophets, one above the other on each branch, sitting in the order in which they succeeded each other in time. They were all looking toward the edge of the pillar that faced the North, marvelling at the things they could see with spiritual vision going on there in the future.

But between the two edges, the one facing the East and the one facing the North, the side of the pillar to which those patriarchs and prophets turned their faces was from bottom to top as round as if turned in a lathe, and wrinkled like the bark of a tree that puts forth shoots.

And from the second edge, facing the North, there went forth a marvellously bright radiance, which shone and reflected as far as the edge that faced the South. And in the radiance which was so widely diffused, I saw apostles, martyrs, confessors and virgins and many other saints, walking in great joy.

And the third edge, facing the South, was broad and wide in the middle, but thinner and narrower at the bottom and top, like a bow drawn and ready to shoot arrows. And at the top of the pillar I saw a light so bright that human tongue cannot describe it; and in this light appeared a dove, with a gold ray coming out of its mouth, which shed brilliant light on the pillar.

And as I looked at this, I heard from Heaven a terrifying voice, rebuking me and saying, "What you see is divine!" And at this voice I trembled so much that I dared not look there any longer.

Then I saw inside the building a figure standing on the pavement facing this pillar, looking sometimes at it and sometimes at the people who were going to and fro in the building. And that figure was so bright and glorious that I could not look at her face or her garments for the splendor with which she shone; I saw only that, like the other virtues, she appeared in human form.

And around her I saw a beautiful multitude, with the appearance and wings of angels, standing in great veneration, for they both feared and loved her. And before her face I saw another multitude, with the appearance of human beings, in dark clothes; and they stood immobile with fear.

And the figure looked upon the people who came in from the world and in the building put on a new garment; and she said to each of them, "Consider the garment you have put on, and do not forget your Creator Who made you." And as I wondered at these things, the One seated on the throne spoke to me again.

1 The austerity of the Law was sweetened by the Incarnation of the Word

The Word of God, by Whom all things were made, was Himself begotten before time in the heart of the Father; but afterward, near the end of time, as the Old Testament saints had predicted, He became incarnate of the Virgin. And, assuming humanity, He did not forsake Deity; but, being one and true God with the Father and the Holy Spirit, he sweetened the world with His sweetness and illumined it with the brilliance of His glory.

Hence, the pillar you see beyond the tower of anticipation of God's will designates the ineffable mystery of the Word of God; for in that true Word, the Son of God, all the justice of the New and Old Testaments is fulfilled. This justice was opened to believers for their salvation by divine inspiration, when the Son of the Supreme Father deigned to become incarnate of the sweet Virgin; and the virtues showed themselves to be powerful in the anticipation of God's will, which was the beginning of the circumcision. Then the mystery of the Word of God was also declared in strict justice by the voice of the patriarchs and prophets, who foretold that He would be manifest in justice and godly deeds and great severity, doing the justice of God and leaving no injustice free to evade the commands of the Law.

2 The patriarchs in a mystery showed that the Law was near

And you see that the pillar is standing one cubit past the corner that faces the North; which symbolizes in human terms how very near the patriarchs who announced the strict justice of the Word of God were in their meaning to the Law, thus resisting the Devil in the North.

3 No pride can resist the strength of God

The pillar is the color of steel, and attached to the outside of the shining part of the main wall of the building; for the power of the Word of God is unconquered and unconquerable, and no one can resist Him by vain rebellion or vile pride. And so the Old Testament fathers were united with the reflective knowledge, as it were, on the outside, by their bulwarks and deeds of justice; but they were not yet imbued with the fiery perfection of the work that arose in the Son of God, and which they but foreshadowed outwardly in their words.

VISION FOUR

4 God's justice is dreadful and exceeds every creature in height

It is most dreadful to behold; for the justice in the Word of God is fearful to humans, who know only the impious judgment of unjust judges judging according to their own whims. It is so big and tall that you cannot form an idea of its measurements; for the Word, Who is the Son of God, exceeds all creatures in paternal majesty by the magnitude of His glory and the height of His divinity, and no human in a corruptible body can fully understand Him.

5 The Word of God has three divisions: Law, Grace and exposition of scripture

And the pillar is divided from bottom to top into three sides, with edges sharp as a sword; which is to say that the strength of the Word of God as prefigured in the Old Testament and declared in the New, circling and turning in grace, showed in the Holy Spirit three points of division. These were the old Law, the new Grace, and the exposition of the faithful doctors; and by these the holy person does what is just from the beginning, starting with the good and moving upward to end with the perfect. For all that is just was, is and will be forever in the simple Deity, which is in all things; and no power can stand firm in malice, if He wills to conquer it by the glory of His loving kindness.

6 The knowledge of Law, the work of the Gospel and the wisdom of the doctors

The first edge faces the East, which signifies the start of the knowledge of God through the divine Law, before the perfect day of justice. The second looks to the North, for after this good and chosen work was started there came the gospel of My Son and the other precepts of Me, the Father, which rose up against the North where injustice originated. And the third faces the South, and is somewhat merged with the outside wall of the building. This is to say that when the works of justice had been confirmed, there came the profound and rich wisdom of the principal doctors, who through the fire of the Holy Spirit made known what was obscure in the Law and the prophets, and showed their fruition in the Gospels. Thus they made these things fruitful to the understanding; they touched on the outward content of the Scriptures in the work of the Father's goodness, and sweetly ruminated on their mystical significance.

BOOK THREE

7 God worked from the beginning of the Law to the manifestation of His Son

And from the edge which faces the East, branches grow out from the root to the summit. This is to say that when God first became known through the just Law, branches appeared on that eastern edge, which was the time of the patriarchs and prophets. For this sharp-edged pillar of Divinity carries on the work from its root, which is the good beginning in the minds of the elect, to its summit, which is the manifestation of the Son of Man, Who is all justice.

And therefore, at the root you see Abraham sitting on the first branch; for the time of inspiration by God began with Abraham, when he obeyed God and with a tranquil mind departed from his country. Then Moses on the second; for after this, God inspired Moses to plant the Law, and so foreshadow the Son of the Most High. Then Joshua on the third; for he afterward had the spirit of the Lord in him in order to strengthen the custom of the Law as God commanded.

And then you see the rest of the patriarchs and prophets, one above the other on each branch, sitting in the order in which they succeeded each other in time; for God inspired each patriarch and prophet in his own time to nurture his particular shoot toward the height of His commands, and all in their day reposed on the disposition and order of the justice He showed them, faithful and obedient to the divine majesty as it showed itself in their times.

8 The patriarchs and prophets marvelled at the Incarnation

They are all looking toward the edge of the pillar that faces the North, marvelling at the things they can see with spiritual vision going on there in the future. For they were all alerted in their souls by the Holy Spirit, and so turned and saw how the Gospel doctrine repulsed the Devil by the strength of the Son of God. They spoke of His Incarnation, and marvelled at how He came from the heart of the Father and the womb of a virgin and showed Himself with great wonders both by Himself and by His followers, who wonderfully imitated Him in new grace and trod the transitory underfoot, greatly thirsting for the joys of the eternal.

VISION FOUR

- 9 The Word of God was hidden by prevision in the souls of the elect of old

But between the two edges, the one facing the East and the one facing the North, the side of the pillar to which those patriarchs and prophets are turning their faces is from bottom to top as round as if turned in a lathe, and wrinkled like the bark of a tree that puts forth shoots. This is to say that between the two edges, which are the manifest knowledge of Me and the teachings of My Son, the One Word, which is My Son, was hidden as a foreshadowing image in the souls of the ancient fathers who abided in My laws, from the first chosen one until the last holy one. Thus they were decorated all around with mystical ornaments, for He carefully arranged and polished all His chosen instruments and showed Himself to them all with swift grace. He was loving to them all, as is prefigured in the wrinkles of the circumcision, which was the shadow of things to come; for it contained, hidden in the austerity of the Law, the apposite meaning of the most righteous offshoot, the high and holy Incarnation.

- 10 The words of the Son go from and return to the Father through the doctors

And from the second edge, facing the North, there goes forth a marvellously bright radiance, which shines and reflects as far as the edge that faces the South. This is to say that from the second edge, which is the New Testament and stands opposed to the Devil, there issue the words of My Son, which come forth from Me and return to Me. For when the sun, which is My Son, stands forth in the flesh, the light of the holy Gospel shines in His preaching, and pours itself out from Him and His disciples as fruits of blessing, and then returns into the fountain of salvation, where it reaches the guides, those who profoundly search into the words of the Old and New Testaments. And they show how wisdom is raised up in that Sun, Who enlightens the world and burns like noonday in His elect.

- 11 The apostles, martyrs and other elect were made so by Christ's teaching

And in the radiance, which is so widely diffused, you see apostles, martyrs, confessors and virgins and many other saints, walking in great joy. For in the clear light in which My Son preached and spread the truth there have grown up apostles who announce that true light, and martyrs who faithfully shed their blood like strong soldiers, and confessors who officiate after My Son, and virgins who follow the Supernal Branch, and all My other elect, who rejoice in the fountain of happiness and the font of salvation, baptized by the Holy Spirit and ardently going from virtue to virtue.

- 12 Gospel knowledge was limited, is now broad and will grow weak at the end

And the third edge, facing the South, is broad and wide in the middle, but thinner and narrower at the bottom and top, like a bow drawn and ready to shoot arrows. This is to say that, as the Gospel was spread, the wisdom of the saints broadened; they burned in the Holy Spirit, seeking It in depth so as to find through It the deepening of their understanding of the Word of God, strengthened by the faith of the Christian people. And so the sense of the Scriptures that went forth from the mouth of the holy doctors broadened too; they searched the depths of the Scriptures' astringency and made it known to the many who learned from them, and thus they too enlarged their senses by knowing more of the wisdom and knowledge of the divine writings. At the beginning of the Church's institution—as it were, at the bottom of the edge—this knowledge was narrower and less studied, for the people did not yet embrace it with the love they gave it afterward. And at the end of time—as it were, at the edge's summit—the studies of many will grow cold; divine wisdom will not be lovable to them as deeds are lovable, but they will hide their knowledge and keep it for themselves, as if they had no obligation to do good works. For they will know it only on the outside, as in a dream.

- 13 People must begin good works timidly, continue strongly and finish humbly.

And therefore the edge is widest and sharpest in the middle. For the austere works of the worship of God were denuded of their Old Testament darkness and grew from their narrow beginning to their middle, which consists of the strongest virtues and the loftiest zeal. For the people were then swifter against iniquity, wounding the Devil with words from God and casting out and trampling down all his vices with the great austerity of God's justice. But then the people forgot themselves and declined, and as the end of the world drew near lived in a narrower fervor for the Holy Spirit. So, as a bow is stretched tight by the bowstring in time of war, a person must rise up against vice in body and soul, more constricted at each end and broader in the middle; so that the beginning and the end of his work may be circumspect with fear and humility, while its middle is strong and constant, sending forth by the gift of the Holy Spirit the darts of good deeds against the ambushes of the Devil. For when a person begins to do good, his strength is fragile; then when he continues to work good he grows stronger, because the Holy Spirit has poured Itself out in him; but since that power cannot come often, at the end of his good work he will be less in strength again because of the weakness of the flesh. And so the bow should always be bent for defense against the vices of the Devil.

VISION FOUR

14 God shows people the mysteries of the Son of God by foreshadowing

But at the top of the pillar you see a light so bright that human tongue cannot describe it. This is to say that the Heavenly Father, in His highest and deepest mysteries, made known the mystery of His Son, Who shines in His Father with glorious light, in which there appears all the justice of the giving of the Law and the New Testament. And the latter is of such clarity and brilliance of wisdom that it is not possible for any earthly person to express it in words, as long as he is in corruptible flesh.

And in this light appears a dove, with a gold ray coming out of its mouth, which sheds brilliant light on the pillar; for in the heart of the radiant Father, in the brilliance of the light of the Son of God, burns the Holy Spirit, Who comes from on high and declares the mysteries of the Son of the Most High to redeem the people seduced by the ancient serpent. And so the Holy Spirit inspires all the commandments and all the new testimonies, giving before the Incarnation of the Lord the law of His glorious mysteries, and then showing the same glory in the Incarnation itself. And the Spirit's inspiration is a golden splendor and a high and excellent illumination, and by this outpouring It makes known, as was said, the mystical secrets of God's Only-Begotten to the ancient heralds who showed the Son of God through types and marvelled at His coming from the Father and His miraculously arising in the dawn of the perpetual Virgin. And thus the Spirit in Its power fused the Old Testament and the Gospels into one spiritual seed, from which grew all justice.

And so you cannot contemplate the divine glory because of the immense power of Divinity; no mortal can see it except those to whom I will to foreshadow it. Therefore take care not to presume rashly to look at what is divine, as the trembling that seizes you shows.

15 The virtue of the knowledge of God

And you see inside the building a figure standing on the pavement facing this pillar. This is to say that a virtue shows itself within the work of God the Father, which declares the mystery of the Word of God, for it has revealed all the justice in the city of the Omnipotent to the people of the Old and New Testaments. She is standing on the pavement, which is to say above all earthly things in the work of the loving Father, for everything in earth and heaven are foreseen by Him.

BOOK THREE

And she looks sometimes at the pillar and sometimes at the people who are going to and fro in the building. This is to say that she is contemplating in the Word of God the mystery put forth by His power, and also the people who are working in the Father's goodness, and which of them are succeeding or not succeeding in the work, for she knows the nature of each one at will.

And this image signifies the knowledge of God; for she oversees all people and all things in heaven and earth. And she is so bright and glorious that you cannot look at her face or her garments for the splendor with which she shines. For she is terrible with the terror of the avenging lightning, and gentle with the goodness of the bright sun; and both her terror and her gentleness are incomprehensible to humans, the terror of divine brilliance in her face and the brightness of her beauty in her garments, as the sun cannot be looked at in its burning face or its beautiful clothing of rays. But she is with everyone and in everyone, and so beautiful is her secret that no person can know the sweetness with which she sustains people, and spares them in inscrutable mercy; spares even the hardest stone, which is a hard and incorrigible person who never wants to turn aside from evil, until it can be penetrated no farther.

But, like the other virtues, she appears in human form. For God in the power of His goodness profoundly imbued Man with reason and knowledge and intellect, that he might dearly love Him and devotedly worship Him and spurn the illusions of demons, and adore Him above all Who gave him such high honor.

16 The angels that surround her and why they are winged

And around her you see a beautiful multitude, with the appearance and wings of angels, standing in great veneration, for they both fear and love her. Which is to say that all the blessed and excellent spirits in the heavenly ministry worship the Knowledge of God with inexpressibly pure praise, as humans cannot worthily do while they are in mortal bodies. These spirits embrace God in their ardor, for they are living light; and they are winged, not in the sense that they have wings like the flying creatures, but in the sense that they circle burningly in their spheres through the power of God, as if they were winged. And so they adore Me the true God, and persevere in proper fear and true subjection, knowing My judgments and burning in My love; for they behold My face forever, and desire and will nothing but those things they see are pleasing to My penetrating vision.

VISION FOUR

17 On the human beings who are called "compelled sheep"

And before her face you see another multitude, with the appearance of human beings, in dark clothes; and they stand immobile with fear. These are people who live in the Knowledge of God. How? That person whom God foresees will belong to Him stands in great honor in His sight, but one who chooses to stay in perdition rather than in God is lost. Those people you see in this multitude are called "compelled sheep"; they have a human form because of their human deeds, and dark clothes because they have done sinful works in doubt, but they fear the judgment of God with a stringent fear. They are called "compelled sheep" because I compel them by many means to come to life and be snatched from death through My Son's blood. Thus "compelled sheep" are those people who are compelled by Me against their will, by many tribulations and sorrows, to leave their iniquities. These they gladly embraced in the desire of their flesh and the flower of their youth as long as they held to the world, wanting to retain the heat of lust until the fire of the flesh departed from them in cold age; but I forced them all in different ways, according to what I saw in them, to cease from their sins.

18 God constrains some gently, some by a strong lash, some by extreme pain

Some of these, in whom desire for the world does not burn so fiercely, I force with a lighter rather than a heavier scourge; for I do not perceive in them the great bitterness I see in others, since when they feel My correction they renounce the pomps of the world and hastily leave their own will and come to Me. Others I correct with heavier blows, since they so burn and yearn for the sins of their vicious flesh that they would not be fit for the Kingdom unless I forcibly compelled them. And My knowledge sees and knows these, and constrains them in proportion to their bodily excesses.

And others, again, I conquer by the greatest and sharpest misery of mind and body; for they are so rebellious and so extreme in their carnal pleasures that if they were not constrained by the heaviest calamity the wantonness of their flesh would lead them to unceasing crime. These never turn to God while their wills prosper; some fall into desperation through timidity of mind, but others are mocked by prideful ambition, and the former allow despair to trample them underfoot, while the latter cannot contain themselves for the overabundance of their spirits. So, when those who belong to Me resist Me by their deeds, I force them as My knowledge of them directs; and so, through the physical and spiritual calamities they suffer, they are compelled to come to Me and be saved. Thus Pharaoh, having been greatly terrified, finally made the Israelites go forth from his land, as it is written:

19 Example of Pharaoh, Moses and Aaron

“And Pharaoh, calling Moses and Aaron by night, said, ‘Rise up, go forth from my people, both you and the children of Israel. Go, sacrifice to the Lord as you say. Take your flocks and your herds as you asked, and as you depart bless me’ ” [Exodus 12:31–32]. Which is to say: The heavy and burdensome crimes inseparable from this world weigh people down with sorrows and miseries; they say in their hearts, “Alas, alas! Whither shall we flee?” Then these sorrows clash and drive the people away from them, and the people hasten to withdraw; for their bodies are shriveling up from the weight of the scourge in the hand of God, and they cannot live with joy amid the pleasures of the world. For God claims them, calling the just by the many calamities of the dark deeds of the night of sin.

Hence Pharaoh, which is to say the vices of the Devil, amid the clamor of grief and misery calls Moses, which means those people whom God constrains by the keenest spiritual or physical sorrows, and Aaron, that is those people whom He compels by lighter adversities and calls out of the night of evil deeds; and the vices say from amid the oppression of human pleasure, “Arise from your carnal habits, and go forth from the ancient dwelling place you had with us; separate yourselves from the common people whom we possess and who worship us. Separate yourselves from the secular affairs to which we gladly cling, you who were terrified by us when you were our prisoners; and take the children of God with you, who see and acknowledge Him.

“Go therefore by another way; leave us, and offer yourselves to God by means of those invincible fights in which you say you have conquered us by your will. In the newness of mind you now seek, assume the gentleness of the sheep, which prevents you from acting with us because you choose the sorrows of following the Lamb; and assume the victorious arms of the strength of herds, which we cannot resist and which have conquered us. Separate yourselves from us, as you wished when you fiercely fought us; go to the country you long for in your minds, embrace the new life that takes you from us, and bless and praise God for that battle by which you have torn yourselves away from worldly matters and cares.”

20 How God, scrutinizing people, chastises and consoles them

And I, Almighty God, in compelling these sheep to come over to Me, strengthen My pillars, which are the strong heirs to Heaven, on a foundation of chastisement. I chastise them according to the degree of wickedness by which they are assailed and implicated in the sin of Adam; for if I do not confirm them by My grace, they cannot stand. Some, who are not weighed down by a very great burden of vice, I punish more lightly; for if I were to correct them with a sharper blow, their spirits would entirely fail and they would fall into desperation. For they are not bound by the force of the great whirlwind of the Devil's temptations.

VISION FOUR

But others, who in the battle with the Devil are burdened with a greater weight and have savage ways and excessive lusts, I constrain harshly with heavy sufferings, so that they will not withdraw from My covenant; for they belong to it, and wish with all their hearts to lay hold on Me and observe My precepts. But if I chastised these as lightly as the first, they would count My corrections as nothing; for they are assailed by the ancient's serpent's most heavy attack.

And there are also certain people whom I do not know, exiles from the heavenly country, for they completely abandon Me, seducing themselves in the greed of their thoughts with devouring rage. These do not seek Me or desire to know Me, but choke off their good desires; and so they ask no help from Me, but greedily feast on their own goods and please themselves in carnal lusts.

Now some of these latter express their will in excesses and pleasures of the flesh, but do not live in hatred and envy; they are simply engulfed in sweet joys and carnal delights. To these I give the fruits of the earth in prosperity, and do not let them lack and be poor; for they were created by Me, and they do not devour My people with malice. And so what they choose is given to them.

But others are fierce and bitter, full of gall and hatred and envy, rendering evil for evil and suffering no injury to be inflicted on them; and if these obtain worldly honor and riches, they destroy the heavenly virtues in others, and do not let them grow. And so from these I take fruits and riches, and throw them into great miseries, so that they cannot do as much evil as they would want to; for, if they could, they would do the works of the Devil.

And so by a just measure I mark out the ways of good and bad people, and weigh their wills according to what My eye sees of their desires, as Wisdom testifies through Solomon, saying:

21 Words of the Wisdom of Solomon

"All human ways are open to His eyes; the Lord is the weigher of spirits" [Proverbs 16:2]. Which is to say: To the sight of Almighty God all roads are open that the living human mind can choose in the present state of its wisdom; for each person possesses the knowledge of fruitful utility and of vain foolishness. Thus God sees all things, and nothing is hidden from His divine sight; He knows and observes all things, and so He can deal rightly with each and every case. How? He is the weigher of spirits; He treats them tenderly with sweet caresses and peace, or He chastises them with the tribulations of misery and sorrow that they may be conformed to the right measure. They cannot escape Him by running or fleeing, unless He so wills it in accordance with their merits; for they are weighed, both in this world and in the world to come, by the way in which they worshipped God.

And so these spirits are weighed justly, and a person's mind is uplifted to higher things or sunk to lower things exactly as far as God's just judgment requires. No soul has enough power to fight against God, Who resists their attempts; for He judges all things most righteously, and opposes them with His irresistible justice, so that they can do no more than He permits.

And as the leaden counterweight weighs money correctly, so God in His equal scales counterbalances the good and the bad with obstacles, so that they can never escape the equity of His judgment; and the good receive for their merits the glory and joy of life, and the bad the pain and grief of death, according to what God's vision sees in them.

22 How the Knowledge of God scrutinizes those clothed in a new garment

And the figure looks upon the people who come in from the world and in the building put on a new garment. This is to say that the Knowledge of God knows those who leave the wickedness of infidelity and, by the power of God's work, put on the new self in baptism for the sake of eternal life. And she warns them not to turn backward and go toward the Devil, or, if they do thus stray, that they should return to God their Creator, as she says to each of them in the words of her admonition quoted above.

But let the one who has ears sharp to hear inner meanings ardently love My reflection and pant after My words, and inscribe them in his soul and conscience.

THE ZEAL OF GOD

VISION FIVE

The Jealousy of God

*A*fter this, I looked, and behold! In the north corner, where the building's two kinds of wall joined, there appeared a head of marvellous form, planted firmly by the neck at the outside of the corner, at the same height from the ground that the wall itself rose to in that corner and no higher, so that the top of the head just equalled the summit of the wall. And this head was fiery in color, sparkling like a fiery flame; and it had a terrible human face, which looked in great anger toward the North.

From the neck down I saw nothing of this figure's body, for the rest of it was hidden by its pressing into the corner. But I saw its head, a bare human head. It was not covered by hair like a man's or by a veil like a woman's; but it was more manly than womanly, and very terrible to see.)

It had three wings of wondrous breadth and length, white like a cloud; they were not raised, but extended straight out from each other so that the head was slightly higher than they were. The first rose from the right side of the jaw, and stretched toward the Northeast; the second and middle one pointed from the throat to the North, and the third stretched from the left side of the jaw toward the West. Sometimes these wings moved, very terribly, and struck these regions, but after a while ceased striking. And I did not hear the head uttering any words; it only remained motionless in body and struck with its wings from time to time in the places toward which they extended. And again I heard the One Who sat on the throne, saying to me:

I The form of the Jealousy of God and what it does

God worked His jealousy very severely on the people of the Old Law; but toward those of the New, for love of His Son, He was mild and sweet. This is not because He overlooked and carelessly dismissed the sins of those who transgressed, but because He was mercifully awaiting the true inner penitence of the pure heart; and at the same time He refused to tolerate the iniquity of the hardened, but punished them with just judgment.

Therefore, the head that you see in the north corner, where the building's two kinds of wall join, symbolizes the Jealousy of the Lord, which punishes that inflexible iniquity that desires no curing. This jealousy was prefigured in the symbols of the patriarchs and prophets, and arose openly in the mystery of the Word of God.

So too the Jealousy of God is in the form of a head; for, of all the fear it inspires, it is known best for the severity of its vengeance, as a person is known by his face. And it flames out against the North because it is most swift and sharp in God to slay the Devil and all evil. For in Abraham and in Moses the defense of those who labor, which is to say the knowledge of the two choices, the ways of good and evil, is joined to the human race in the work of God; for in all things, through the goodness of the Father, Man must work strongly against the Devil in the knowledge of good and evil.

But the Jealousy of the Lord avenges sin, the choice expressed in the deeds of people who do not observe God's precepts; for this work is not deserving of remission. Where does this happen? Where there is no acknowledgment of God and therefore no fear of God or Man. And when a heart is thus hardened and deadened by the filth of iniquity, which fears neither the judgment of God nor the countenance of Man, the Jealousy of the Lord confounds it by just judgment and throws it down by vengeance in the Law of God. How?

2 God examines sins to punish or pardon in a person's body and soul

When the commandments were established, it was jealousy that, by righteous judgment, removed the injustice whenever there was transgression of the Law. In the Old Testament injustice was wiped out by a severe reprisal upon the outer person, in whom transgression of the Law caused bodily sores; after the grace of the Gospel, jealousy works through penance; and, after a person's death, it will work in the pains and torments of Hell. For I so examine human iniquities, conceived and brought forth and twisted by the doers of deeds, that I avenge them either physically in the person's body or in the pains of the world to come; or else the person himself will purge them through penance and remission while he is still living with the soul and body that performed them. As My servant Job says, speaking in My Spirit:

3 Words of Job on this subject

"I change my face, and I am twisted with sorrow. I feared all my works, knowing that You do not spare the offender. But if I am wicked, why have I labored in vain?" [Job 9:27-29]. This is to say: I will change my interior aspect. How? I will overthrow the thing I am: changeable, overcome by the blood in my veins, at one time full of delight and at another time anger and at another time unbearable sadness. For I look into myself as one who sees a delightful face, when I gladly pursue these things. But against my will I will change this, and turn myself to good works. And when I do so, I am tortured as by a scourge, for I am forcing myself and tearing myself away from my familiar face, which is my will toward perverse delights; I am joining myself to meditation, and in my good conscience attaining the vision of God, Who cannot be reached by the lusts of the flesh. And, because of these two choices, I fear all my works. How?

When I do a good work, I fear that it is not perfect before God; for I do not see it clearly, but as in a glass darkly. Sometimes I know it in the spirit, but sometimes I do not know it because of being weighed down by the body. But when I do an evil work, my spirit's conscience is in confusion, for I know within me that those who knowingly sin are not spared; that is, when a person understands that his deed is contrary to God, he must be purged either by a penalty in the body, or by penance, or by punishment through tortures in the life to come. And so a transgressor is not spared if he does not repent; he is not given the power to sin in order to use it, and if he does he must be chastised either here or hereafter.

Therefore, if I am so wicked and obstinate that I do not want to give in and turn from my own things, which are my sins; and if I am so weak that I cannot face the great struggle against myself; and if I am always contrary to God in my motives, conceived in sin and desiring to work iniquity and not fearing the Lord's judgment on me; why am I forced to labor in vain, often opposing the evil in myself through my knowledge of God? For I am not so weak that I do not know good from evil. Thus if I drive out my understanding and say, "I do not know God," I am a liar; for the knowledge of my debt to God convicts me when I start to do wickedness. But when I oppose evil with a good conscience I do not labor in vain; for I am the work of God, and so I turn to Him and receive the good reward.

4 Sinners can receive grace by penance or suffer future punishment

Therefore, I Who am the Lord of all things say again that it is needful that each person pay for his sins, either by groaning sorrow or by contrite penitence or by a proper punishment, in this world or the world to come. How? Those who fear their sins and repent in sorrow deserve to rise by God's grace from the sins to their purgation; and when they are not fully purged in this world, they will have purgation unto life in the world to come.

But those who are so hardhearted that they do not wish to acknowledge their sins or repent them in fear and sorrow, but continue to defy God by their wickedness, are not purged of their sins either in this life or in the life to come, but will suffer pains without the consolation of purgation unto life. For they were created by Me with rational minds, yet did not give the proper reply to disobedience. How?

BOOK THREE

5 Human reason can counter evil with good or good with evil

Human reason can understand two ways to the knowledge of good and evil, and choose two replies, also good and evil. How? Good replies to evil when by God's help it resists it; but evil replies to good when with the Devil's help it attacks it. Those who live in goodness answer evil by refraining from it and taking no pleasure in their own delight. But those who live in evil answer good by not withdrawing from bad deeds; they feast on their own lusts and refuse to answer evil's challenge. How?

6 Man is called two ways, one leading to life and the other to death

Each person has in himself two callings, the desire of fruit and the lust for vice. How? By the desire of fruit he is called toward life, and by the lust for vice he is called toward death. In the desire of fruit a person wishes to do good, and says to himself, "Do good works!" And this is the reply to evil, to avoid it and bring forth useful fruit. But in the lust for vice, a person wants to do evil, and says to himself, "Do the work of your own pleasure!" And this is the reply to good, the refusal to resist iniquity and the delight in attaining to vice, whereby the person despises Me and by not honoring Me treats Me as an impostor. And because he turns away from good, and puts himself into no sorrow or affliction through fear of Me, such a one turns celestial things to scorn, as, enlightened by Me, the psalmist David says:

7 Words of the Psalmist

"They have set their mouth against Heaven, and their tongue has passed over the earth" [Psalm 72:9]. This is to say: Many people are foolish in understanding and unwilling to admit the infinite fear of the Lord. They cast away the good desires they should have for Me and the knowledge of the true God, and refuse assent to the good knowledge that assists people to perform good works in God; and they embrace bitterness and contradict the good, and so despoil themselves and steal from themselves the good treasures, laying up for themselves instead a treasure of multiple iniquities.

And in those iniquities they apply their twisted minds to celestial works, and, opening their mouths in an evil way, destroy those works in rage and mockery, saying in their hearts, "We can do the works of our own will as lawfully as those that are called celestial; for those were established without our knowledge by the people of the Old Testament according to their own pleasure." And thus they mock the words and institutions of the Old Testament fathers, which were established by Me in heavenly works.

And so, tasting wicked deeds as if with their tongues, they excite and surpass themselves in the greatest possible audacity; they boldly fulfil their own wills and have no desire to restrain their bodies from vice. And so, without their minds working, they are, as it were, rolled on the ground by the desires of their flesh, which are the seductions of the Devil.

8 God's wondrous judgments were seen in the Old Testament to make Him feared

So you see this head of marvellous form, which is to say that in the Jealousy of the Lord are marvels and wondrous divine judgments, such as no person weighed down by sins can know.

It is planted firmly by the neck at the outside of the corner; this means that, as was shown through Abraham and Moses in the Old Testament, My jealousy against the Devil is plain to the sight of the peoples in reflective knowledge and in human deeds, that they may fear Me and stand face to face with My terror. And My justice faces the North to threaten Satan's cruel iniquity.

9 God's rectitude in judging is not moved by deceitful or adulatory words

It remains immovable, for God cannot be moved, or His righteous judgment of unatoned sins softened, by deceitful or adulatory words. And so it renders to each person who does not observe the precepts of the Law the punishments he deserves for the evil deeds that have sunk him in filth; it is set up by God to establish laws for humans according to their works, and with its excelling strength, like the strength of its neck, it resists the Devil and his followers and opposes itself to their injustice.

10 Supernal vengeance does not exceed the gravity of the deed it punishes

It is at the same height from the ground that the wall itself rises to in that corner; for God, in His supreme avenging justice, towers above all earthly things, and His vengeance exactly matches human deeds, as shown by the Law in the foreshadowing of Abraham and Moses. For divine judgment is as high as any mystical speculation or deed of the people, to throw down their ignorance if they refuse to know God.

But it is no higher, so that the top of the head just equals the summit of the wall. For heavenly vengeance does not surpass human deeds, or punish their evil more than is deserved; it only judges all things equitably and righteously in excelling justice. This the psalmist David knows in the Spirit, when he says:

II Words of David

“I have known, O Lord, that Your judgments are equity, and in Your truth you have humbled me” [Psalm 118:75]. This is to say: By Your goodness, O Lord, I have experienced in myself that you do not judge the knowing or the ignorant in Your power or Your anger more than they deserve; for you have not slain me for my sins, or taken the power to act from my soul or body.

For I do good to my adversaries, but I do evil in the desires of my flesh; and therefore You reward the good and judge the evil. But You judge only as is equitable and just. How? If You were harshly inflexible about the nature of human deeds, it would not be equity of judgment. But if You carelessly neglected spurring us to penance, and did not try to purge our iniquities, then, O just God, you would be condoning and encouraging injustice. Death, indeed, was a most bitter judgment for the sin of Adam; but now You recall Man to life by the grace restored in penitence, and this would be impossible for anyone but You, Who are God.

And this purgation unto life in grace is Your just and equitable judgment, for Your judgments are meted out in right measure for each case. All that You do is in the truth, and so You never wrongfully exceed the measure; for both excess and deficiency in justice are wrongful. And You use Your power sparingly and in mercy, never slaying anyone just because Your glorious power can do so, but rather choosing to spare by penitence. Therefore I have humbled myself on account of Your mercy, giving glory to Your name; and I am troubled over what my faults deserve in Your judgment.

12 God sees every injustice, and no human can understand His judgment

And you see that this head is fiery in color, sparkling like a fiery flame; this is because God's Jealousy is a fierce obstacle to evil, glowing red in the powerful fire of His vengeance. And it has a terrible human face; for the eyes of the Lord see all injustices face to face, and no guilt of crime is unsearched by His terrible gaze. He examines all by His just judgment, and turns a human face toward the acting of carnal desires because it is human actions that are thus monstrous and horrifying.

And it looks in great anger toward the North; for God in His vengeance scorns all evil that rises from the temptation of the Devil. And from the neck down you see nothing of this figure's body, for the rest of it is hidden by its pressing into the corner; which is to say that the righteous judgments with which the Jealousy of God scatters the evil works of the wicked cannot be fully seen by any human sense, for they are hidden and covered by the corner of reflective knowledge and human deeds. Thus they cannot be seen or understood by investigation, except sometimes when something is shown to be a case of God's judgment, which appears as a human face according to His will. And so in such a vengeance there is nothing automatic, except that people always receive just judgment according to their sins; for their crimes, as was said before, are not left unexamined, but are probed by the Jealousy of the Lord.

13 The Jealousy of God, justly judging human acts, is awful to all creatures

And you see its head, a bare human head; which is to say that the Jealousy of the Lord is not subject to mortality but is bare of all weakness, justly judging human acts. It is not covered by hair like a man's or by a veil like a woman's; for it feels no masculine anxiety about being conquered by one superior in strength, nor has it any feminine weakness as of a timid mind afraid that it cannot conquer its opponents.

But it is more manly than womanly; for the mighty power of God resembles manly virility more than it does soft womanly weakness. And it is very terrible to see; for jealousy is terrible and fearsome to all creatures when they feel its vengeance in their case.

14 The Holy Trinity judges all people rightly according to their intentions

It has three wings of wondrous breadth and length, white like a cloud. This symbolizes the expansion of the ineffable power of the Holy Trinity. No one can comprehend the extent of Its glory and the limits of Its power as It shines with the immense sweetness and brightness of Divinity; in Its righteous vengeance it subdues all human minds, as they flit hither and thither diffusely like clouds.

These wings are not raised, but extend straight out from each other so that the head is slightly higher than they are. For the vengeance of the Lord is not puffed up by any arrogance, but adapts itself to each case according to its merits; and so it stretches forth within the boundaries of righteousness in the just judgment of its correction, and God's potential strength, like the head of His vengeance, exceeds it in power. And so those human deeds, which the true Trinity does not let go unexamined, are not punished or crushed as severely as that power could if it willed.

BOOK THREE

15 God's Jealousy beats the Devil by Christ and the elect, and in Antichrist

The first wing rises from the right side of the jaw, and stretches toward the Northeast; for God in His just judgment conquered the Devil and all evil first by His Son, Who is at His right hand for salvation. The second and middle one points from the throat to the North; for after salvation was wrought by the Son of God, in the middle times when the faith was already strengthened and its sweetness tasted by the elect, God put the roaring enemy to flight by their means, and snatched them from his jaws. And the third stretches from the left side of the jaw toward the West; for Satan, having been put to flight by the elect of God, will be completely crushed and consigned to the perdition on God's left hand, in the person of the son of perdition, when the world approaches the end of its days.

Sometimes these wings move, very terribly, and strike these regions; for the Jealousy of the Lord is moved to vengeance by its terrible and formidable judging of every creature. It exercises its judgments and strikes wherever in their justice it pleases the Divine Majesty. For where fear and love and honor of God are held in faith and reverence, God shows Himself mild and gentle and does not exercise His vengeance; but He chastises terribly those who are hard and rebellious.

16 The hardened who despise God and Man's warnings are lost

And therefore, the first wing of My vengeance strikes and casts into the abyss of perdition those people, hardened more than stones, who ignore their inner faculties and despise My justice; they look to their own intellects, and consent to carnal desire and diabolical temptation rather than seeking true justice. They refuse to turn away from their iniquity by their own decision, or by My admonitions, or by human exhortations; and so they outrage the spirit of their own knowledge, for they seek and perform the injustice of the Devil instead of My justice. They pour, so to speak, melted lead into their hearts, which is to say dissolute desires of evil decadence; and so they make them as hard as iron in forgetfulness of God, and are themselves hardened like iron, and then they spare no one in their wickedness for the sake of God or Man.

17 The elements complain of the hardness of the impenitent, who are punished

And against them the elements and all creation cry out and complain that vile and short-lived human nature is so rebellious against God while they themselves are doing God's will with fear and reverence. And so they are loud and terrible on the subject of Man. How? It is not that the elements cry out with a voice or complain in the words of rational creatures; but that they cry out according to their nature with noisy sounds, and complain by inspiring fear with their terrors. So God's just judgment moves them and the rest of creation to react to humanity, which is ever rebellious; while the elements themselves never go against or swerve from what the Divine Power commands them to do. And so these hardened people cruelly imitate Satan, who in the hardness of his iniquity refused to be subject to God his Creator; and therefore he perished from all beatitude, and those who follow him will perish with him.

VISION FIVE

18 God brings the punishment of past villains on conscious sinners

And the middle wing of My Jealousy strikes people who rave and the presumptuous and evil deeds that they knowingly and rashly commit. The first such deed cried out in the blood of Abel, whom his brother hated because he was dear to God for offering his substance. Another was Pharaoh's, who was warned by My miraculous deeds and terrified by fear of Me, and so let My people Israel go; but then, in his madness, he tried to bring them back, and therefore My Jealousy swallowed him up. Another arose among that same people of Mine; though they knew Me and saw My miraculous deeds, they adored the idol in Horeb, and therefore the crown fell from their head. And the law of God on the two stone tablets was corrupted by them and others like them, and therefore they fell from their glory and happiness, and My vengeance fell on them. For My servant Moses, in jealousy for Me, meted out punishment to this contrary people who opposed Me so often; he sternly told My chosen that every man should kill his brother and friend and neighbor. And later, he forcefully ordered the judges of that same people to kill their neighbors who were initiated into the rites of Belphegor; and so I avenged Myself, and the iniquity that fought against Me was slain.

19 God's Justice, developing from Abel to Christ, is avenged by His Jealousy

And when God's Justice had first arisen in Abel, in all these evil and perverse generations many other elect were found; they collected and honored My smallest precepts like true children of Israel, and among them rose sorrow and longing for the humanity of My Son. And when My Son appeared, born of the Virgin, all the justice of the Law was baked and salted and became pleasing food for all the people who believed in Me when the apostles showed them the truth. And so, in all those generations, My Jealousy has avenged and will avenge My Justice upon its conscious transgressors; for God was and is and will be, and His Justice, which scourges off all the rust of injustice, will not end until all tribes and peoples cease to be.

BOOK THREE

20 The Jealousy of God will cast down all who harm the Church or its property

Therefore, in My Jealousy, I remove and cast out the iniquity of anyone who, like a dog, despises the Church, which flowers in Me, and of anyone who in insane wickedness destroys a place consecrated to Me or any rights which properly belong to My temple. For these rights were instituted by foreshadowing by My servant Jacob, as the Scripture narrates:

21 Jacob's action prefigured the dedication of churches

"And Jacob, arising in the morning, took the stone he had laid under his head, and set it up as a marker, pouring oil upon the top of it. And he called the name of the city Bethel" [Genesis 28:18-19]. That is to say: Jacob arose in the morning, because he got up as a timely lover of true Justice in the newly constituted Temple. On it he conferred a befitting name, since from it was to arise the most upright of temples, the Virgin Mary, from whom the Sun of Justice would shine forth. And he took the stone, which prefigured an altar, which he had placed under his Head, which is Christ, and sanctified it in the name of Him Who is the true rock, and, having sanctified it, named it. For every sanctification of an altar is under the power of Almighty God, the Head of all the faithful. And he set it up as a marker of the Book of Life, to mark out and prefigure the odor of the heavenly Jerusalem; for as in the heavenly Jerusalem Christ is the Head of His members, so every sanctified altar is the most excellent part of the temple, for oil was poured over it to symbolize the chrism, which is the grace of Almighty God outpoured in holy baptism. And he called that holy place the house and temple of God, which is the name of the city of the heavenly Jerusalem, the living temple of the Living God.

22 A sealed stone legitimizes Communion even without a temple around it

Therefore, by this example and foreshadowing, when a temple is planned in My name, a stone must be erected; for the temple itself is signified by a stone, since I am the firm rock of all justice and Christian law. And wherever the body of My Son is to be sacrificed, there must be a sanctified place where a stone is sealed with My Name, even if by some impossible chance there cannot be a temple there. For I am the strength of truth, and My servant Jacob erected his stone in foreshadowing, as was said, of My Son becoming incarnate of his race.

VISION FIVE

23 The work of the people should justify the building of a temple

Such a temple, dedicated to Me, should not lack the activity which was the reason for its being put up, but be associated with the work of the people who minister to it; for the celestial Jerusalem, whose Head is Christ, does not lack His justice, but is always mindful of the works of her children whom she will receive in God. How? They are to withdraw from the service of the Devil, restrain themselves from the desires their flesh craves, and for love of the heavenly cut off their own natures and afflict themselves against their own interests. Thus they should not use all they possess, but withhold some and offer it to God in His honor, as My exemplary servant Jacob appointed tithes of all his substance. For, as again it is written, he said:

24 How and why Jacob gave a tenth of all his possessions

“Of all things that You shall give me, I will offer a tenth to You” [Genesis 28:22]. Which is to say: Of all that You give me, I will offer the tenth part to You, because this is Your law; first I will tithe my soul, O my God, and cut away my own will from it, offering You Your own justice against myself, and then I will tithe all the goods I have on earth. What does this mean? That every faithful person who is numbered in the tenth order of the citizens of Heaven should give My temple the tenth of his substance, to reflect the redemption by which he is counted in that tenth order of those numbered in God’s knowledge; for they live in and belong to the true temple, that of the celestial Jerusalem.

25 Woe to destroyers, defilers, despisers and cheaters of churches

But those who forget their fear of Me and in insane wickedness destroy temples dedicated in My name, or defile that dedication originated by Jacob by polluting holy places with murderous blood or the impure seed of adultery or fornication, or when offering the supernal sacrifice ignore the Old Testament fathers and neglect to do it in the presence of a sealed stone like Jacob’s, or fail to give the tithes or the property to My temples that I justly decreed: O woe to those wretches! O woe to those wretches! O woe to those wretched people who so shamefully misguide themselves and so perversely before My face neglect My institutions, translated out of the old Law! For the new Law was brought forth out of the Old Testament by My Son in the mercy of grace, and all the justice of the Law and the prophets was increased in My Son, since all the signs the ancient fathers uttered secretly in obscurity were in Him shown clearly in total justice.

BOOK THREE

26 Those who share church property with the wicked are thrown down by God

Those who divide the property of the Church with dogs and swine and other beasts, which is to say with evil people, shall be cast down by the Jealousy of God from the highest to the lowest degree. As for those who despise and disdain the food of life derived from both Testaments, treading it underfoot like mud and using it for their own purposes, I will also despise them and their posterity, casting them down from the highest to the lowest and from riches to poverty in the vengeance of My Jealousy.

27 How God's vengeance strikes both believers and unbelievers

The third wing of My vengeance strikes both believers and unbelievers in their wicked and unjust works. It strikes believers who do not use their will to do good and just works; who clearly see the faith and know God's justice, but nonetheless sit in the gloom of evil deeds, foolishly long for the darkness of iniquity, and perversely will to give themselves to madness. But God does not let them do their will, for He cuts it off from them by His vengeance as long as they forget Him and cover themselves in obscurity and freely avoid Him.

But it strikes unbelievers in their unbelief, so that even their iniquity is taken from them by the retribution of vengeance, and they cannot do the evil they would gladly do. And so the malicious Devil, conquered by the blessedness of the fruitful souls who shine before God's eyes, wants in his wickedness to draw the faithless into the darkness of death; but he has no hold on them greater than their deeds warrant.

28 How fearfully God's vengeance consumes those who gain power by injustice

And there is another kind of people on earth who are rich in a spirit of intelligence; since their minds are illumined they are wise enough to remember God if they would. But because of their intelligence they presumptuously seek to know wisdom for themselves and do whatever they want with it; and so they mingle justice with iniquity. But they are fools in their wisdom, for they think of themselves as completely able to possess and lay hold of and acquire their full wishes, whatever they are.

But as they are seeking to lift their wings in power in the provinces and the cities and the other places and things they are busy governing, and wilfully ignoring the fact that God watches and measures what they do, they are dismissed and cast out from before God's eyes; for they judged with wicked and unjust judgments, and did not make the wise choice of fearing the Lord.

And so, through this My Jealousy, they will become a great lamentation, and speak tearfully before all people, who will see and hear the day when their iniquity is judged. Some of them will go on living in great misery and deprivation, and some will die a terrible death with diverse sufferings. By such a variety of fates, My Jealousy punishes and consumes all injustice, for it is repugnant to Me.

29 God's Jealousy does not loudly warn, but firmly and justly judges

But you do not hear the head uttering any words; it only remains motionless in body and strikes with its wings from time to time in the places toward which they extend, as was mentioned. This is to say that in the Jealousy of the Lord there is no clamorous voice of warning raised in its pride, but a motionless persistence in strength and righteous judgment. It punishes the mad deeds that merit its vengeance, deeds done without fear of the Lord; it confounds and crushes them to the full extent of its justice, as was shown to you, O human, in this most true vision. And because God is just, it is needful to examine all injustice by the standard of His justice; for God Himself knows well the capacity of Man's knowledge to scrutinize all things.

30 Man's knowledge is like a mirror reflecting the desire for good or evil

For knowledge in Man is like a mirror in which lies latent his desire to do good or evil. And each person, standing between these two choices, inclines himself by his will toward the one he desires. The person who turns toward the good and with God's help embraces it in works of faith will be praised and blessedly rewarded, for he has spurned evil and chosen good. But the one who turns toward evil, and absorbs its nature into himself by the perverse conduct suggested by the Devil, will wretchedly undergo a just retribution, for he has neglected good and done evil. Therefore, one who submits himself to God in devotion and humility will faithfully work out his salvation, which comes from the Supreme Good; his soul will be joyfully filled with inner holiness, for he is serving his Creator in well-disposed and ordinate single-heartedness. How?

31 Compunction leads to fear and fear to trembling, and they work justice

Compunction, which is the beginning of anguish, causes fear; fear produces trembling; and by these three a person should do what is just. How? The person feels compunction, and therefore begins to be in anguish, for by the gift of the Holy Spirit his reason tells him to; it means that he cannot refuse to know God, and his knowledge of God causes fear in him so that he respects the things that are of God. And if he knows God and desires these things, the fiery grace of Christ strikes him and tells him to tremble and be terrified in his conscience; and then he may faithfully work God's justice.

32 The first root of human choice and the fiery grace of Christ

Now, therefore, O human, understand and learn. From whence do these things come? What does this mean? It is God Who works in you what is good. How? He has so constituted you that, when you act with wisdom and discretion, you feel Him in your reason. For the irrational animal does all its deeds without intellect or wisdom, without discretion or shame; it does not know God, being irrational, though it feels Him, being His creature. But the rational animal, which is Man, has intellect and wisdom, discretion and shame, and does rational deeds, which is the first root fixed by God's grace in every person given life and soul. These powers flourish where there is reason, for all of them make people know God, so that they may choose what is just. Therefore, the deed that a person embraces in his Savior, the Son of God through Whom the Father does His works in the Holy Spirit, is productive and perfect and prosperous; and the fiery grace of Christ Jesus calls this to the person's mind and kindles his enthusiasm anew.

33 No sinner may murmur against his Creator

Therefore let each person perform works of justice in the joy of the Holy Spirit, and not hesitate and perversely murmur; let him not say that he lacks anything, when he has the first root placed in him by God's gift and the fiery grace of the Holy Spirit, which touches that root by admonition. For if he were thus to fall into perversity, his reprehensible urge would bring him into anguish; his interior root would be diminished, and he would fall farther into compulsion. And then he would truly murmur to himself, "Alas, alas! What have I done, not being able to discern my works in God?" So let him also go forward without the burden of unbelief; let him not distrust God in his works, but avoid evil deeds and thus be safe from tearful lamentation.

VISION FIVE

But let the one who has ears sharp to hear inner meanings ardently love My reflection and pant after My words, and inscribe them in his soul and conscience.

VISION SIX

The Stone Wall of the Old Law

And after this I saw the wall of the aforementioned building, which ran between the north and west corners, and its inner side was all arched like a chancel, except that it was not open like chancel arches but unbroken, and each arch had the picture of a human being in it. And on the outer side of this wall I saw two smaller walls, extending from the north to the west corner, and joined to these corners at each end like a vault. The height of these two lesser walls was three cubits. The distance between the inner, arched wall and the middle one was one cubit; between the middle one and the outer one it was one palm, and that a child's.

And inside the building I saw six figures standing on its pavement before the arched wall: three were grouped together before the wall near the north corner, and three were together at the end of the wall that looked to the West. And they were all looking at the pictures in the arches of the wall.

And at that same end of the wall I saw another figure within the building, sitting on a stone resting on the pavement for a seat, and leaning against the wall to her right, but turning her face toward the pillar of the true Trinity. And at the same end I saw another figure, standing on the wall above the first, also turning toward the pillar of the true Trinity.

And in these figures I saw the following resemblances. The last two were clothed in silk garments and white shoes, as were the first six; except that the right-hand figure in the group of three standing at the end of the wall was so pure and bright that I could not discern any detail about her because of her great splendor, and that the one who was standing on the wall was wearing black shoes. And none of these wore a cloak except the middle one of the three who stood at the beginning of the wall; she was wearing a cloak.

And two of these same three, the ones to the right and the left of the middle one, and two of the other three, the middle and the left figures, did not have women's veils on their heads, but stood with bare heads and white hair. But the middle one of the first three and the one who sat on the stone next to the wall had white head-veils in the manner of women. And the middle and the right-hand ones of the second three were clothed in white tunics. And I saw the following differences between them:

The figure who stood in the middle of the three first ones had a yellow circlet like a crown on her head, with this inscription carved on the right side: "Always burn!" And I saw that a dove was flying at the right side of this figure and breathing out this writing from its beak. And that figure was saying:

1 Words of Abstinence

"I am poured forth from inner compassion, from which springs the river of mercy, which never tries to hide money or precious stones or pearls from the poor and needy under any pretense, for they do not have the necessities of life and thus are weeping. I will console them and forever refresh their poverty for the love of the sweet and mild Son of God, Who distributes His goods in the souls of the just, and heals the wounds of their sins because of their penitence."

And the second figure, standing at her right, had a lion on her breast that gave off light like a mirror; and hanging from her neck to her breast on a twisted, flexible rod was a pale-colored serpent. And she said:

2 Words of Liberality

"I contemplate the light-giving Lion, and I give for the sake of His love. I flee from the fiery serpent, but I love the serpent hanging from the rod."

And the third figure, on the left, was clad in a tunic of hyacinth red. On her breast was the picture of an angel, a wing out on either side, so that its right wing stretched to the figure's right shoulder and its left wing to her left shoulder. And this figure said:

3 Words of Piety

"My companionship is with angels, and I do not choose to walk with dissembling hypocrites, for I feast with the just."

Now the figure who stood in the middle of the three second ones was dressed in a yellow tunic. Above her right shoulder hovered a dove of exceeding whiteness, breathing into her right ear. On her breast was the picture of a monstrous and shapeless human head; beneath her feet lay the likenesses of people trodden down and crushed by her. In her hands she held a document, fully unrolled; on one side, the side that faced Heaven, there were seven lines of writing. I tried to read it, but could not. And she said:

4 Words of Truth

"I choose to be the rod and scourge of bitter correction against that liar who is the son of the Devil; for the Devil is the persecutor of the ineffable justice of God. Hence I oppose him and trouble him; I am never found in his mouth, and I spit him out of my mouth like a deadly poison, for with all his cunning he has never found me. He is to me the worst and most troublesome of all evils, since all evil originated from him. Therefore, I cast him out and tread him underfoot in the lovable justice of God, which I love unceasingly and without end, and support and lead. For on me the whole edifice of God's virtues, which build on high, is stabilized and will stand. O God, Who art strongest and noblest, hearken!"

The second figure, on her right, had an angelic face and wings capable of flying stretched out to each side. But she was in human form, like the other virtues. And she said:

5 Words of Peace

"I rebuff the attacks of the Devil, which come against me saying, 'I will not suffer tribulation, but I will rid myself of all my adversaries. I am not willing to fear any. Whom should I fear?' But those who utter this evil speech are cast out through me; for I have been appointed always to be glad and rejoice in all good things. For the Lord Jesus abates and consoles all pain, He Who bore pain in His own body.

"And, because He is the restorer of justice, I choose to unite myself to Him and sustain Him always, free of hatred and envy and all evils. And I also choose to present a joyful face to Your justice, O God."

And the third figure, on the left, was clothed in a white tunic, picked out with green; she had in her hands a small vase, pale and shining, which gave off bright light like lightning, and this light shone on the face and neck of the figure. And she said:

6 Words of Beatitude

"I am happy. For the Lord Jesus adorns me and makes me beautiful and white, because I have flown from the deadly counsel of the Devil, which always reverts to misery, seeking by evil deeds what God rejects. I fly from this Satan, I reject him, and I hold him as an enemy forever, for I desire that Lover Whom I may fervently embrace and joyfully possess in and above all things."

Now the figure who sat on the stone at this end of the wall was clothed in a black tunic. On her right shoulder she bore a small cross with the image of Jesus Christ, which turned hither and thither. And as from the clouds there shone on her breast a wondrously bright light, divided into many rays as is the splendor of the sun when it shines through an object's many small openings. In her right hand she held a small branch like a fan, from the top of which three twigs had wonderfully sprouted forth into flower. And in her bosom she carried some minute stones, jewels of all kinds, which she looked at very carefully and diligently as a merchant looks over his goods. And she said:

7 Words of Discretion

“I am the mother of virtues, and I have God’s justice in all things. In spiritual war and in secular tumult, within my conscience I always wait upon my God. I do not condemn, I do not trample, I do not spurn kings and dukes and counts and the other secular ruling powers who were ordained by the Ruler of all things. How were it lawful for ashes to spurn ashes? The crucified Son of God turns Himself to all people, admonishing them by His justice and mercy; and I choose to submit to each of His ordinances and institutes according to His will.”

And the figure that stood on the wall at the same end was bareheaded, with curly black hair and a swarthy face. She was dressed in a tunic of many different colors. And I saw that she took off the tunic and her shoes, and stood naked; and suddenly her hair and her face gleamed newly white, like a newborn baby, and her whole body shone like light. And then I saw on her breast a splendid cross with the image of Christ Jesus; it was depicted above a little bush with two flowers on it, a lily and a rose, which reached upward toward the cross. And I saw her vigorously beat the tunic and shoes she had taken off, so that a great deal of dust flew out of them. And she said:

8 Words of Salvation

“I take off the Old Testament, and I put on the noble Son of God with His justice in holiness and truth. And thus I am restored to my good deeds and stripped of my vices. Therefore, O my God, I beseech you, ‘Do not remember the sins of my youth and my ignorance, and take not revenge on my sins’ ” [Psalm 24:7, Tobias 3:3].

And as I looked attentively on these things, the One seated on the throne again spoke to me:

9 No Christian should refuse to submit to government, prefigured of old

Let none of the faithful who humbly wish to obey God hesitate to submit to human institutions of government. For through the Holy Spirit the authority of the Church has been ordained for the use of the people while they live; and it was prefigured in the people of the Old Testament that human government is included in churchly authority and should be kept faithfully and firmly.

VISION SIX

Hence you see the wall of the aforementioned building, which runs between the north and west corners, and its inner side is all arched like a chancel, except that it is not open like chancel arches but unbroken. This symbolizes the time from Abraham and Moses, who resisted the Devil, as it were, in the northern corner, until the open declaration of the true Trinity in the true and Catholic faith, when the Son of God was sent into the world by God the Father in the last days and set forth His doctrine in abundance, as it were, in the western corner. In that period the wall, which is to say the Israelite people, was set up in the law of God's justice, which built the building of the goodness of the Almighty Father. That is, in the Old Testament the Israelite people were curbed and united, and after the harshness displayed by the Jealousy of God because of the deeds of the early rulers, the reign of the new dignities was foreshadowed.

For the Old Testament extended till the time of the New, and from it sprang the greater precepts of the law of the New Testament. Thus from the lesser the greater was born, the greater and broader new doctrine from the lesser doctrine of the old commands; for the Old Testament was only the foundation, laid down that the profoundest wisdom of all might be built on it, the wisdom manifested in the Incarnation of the Son of God. So the old wisdom lasted from the law of circumcision to the new rule of baptism, which was adorned with greater commands.

10 The Incarnation made clear by the grace of the Spirit what the Law hid

And the wall, which is to say the Jewish people in their inner understanding by which the human soul knows God, was all arched, which is to say surrounded on all sides by their predecessors' wisdom which proclaimed the commands of the Law of God, and walled in and protected by that wisdom, as lesser people are wont to be guided by greater ones. This is the meaning of the structure of the chancel, which is to say the foreshadowing in a type by the Holy Spirit. For, by the Incarnation of the Son of God, Who manifested the archways of His mercy as a refuge to all who ask, the Spirit elucidated the difficult writings.

But the wall was not opened by the Doorkeeper, that is to say the Holy Spirit, Who laid bare the spiritual meaning of the old Law; the archways of mercy were opened in the flesh of the Son of the Most High when He was made manifest, but the old wall remains closed in the harsh precepts of the Law, even though that Law was later made clear through the Holy Spirit in the Fountain of Living Water.

BOOK THREE

- 11 A person invested with a government dignity represents God

And each arch has the picture of a human being in it. For as these pictures show human images, so a person in a triumphal arch, which is to say a government dignity, stands in the place of God. How? Because, by the grace of God, profound and excelling wisdom is placed in the mouth of human reason, and so a human being, in the name of God, can exercise an office of instruction as a representative of the justice and mercy of the Most High Himself.

- 12 A spiritual office is the greater, one which rules the people is lesser

And on the outer side of this wall you see two smaller walls; which is to say that in outward affairs there is an intermittent establishment of greater and lesser people set up by God's authority like two walls. The outer one is people of high birth who by My ordinance have the might of secular power; the middle one is the lesser people who live under the power of both spiritual and secular persons, and thus are between the arches of the inner wall, which is spiritual government, and the outer wall, which, as said, is secular power. And so there are two walls outside the circumference of the inner arched wall; for secular persons in earthly affairs have more outward than inward qualities. And yet they are part of My appointed order. How?

- 13 The outer authority is an allegory of the inner

Through outward things the inner ones are understood; and so, when people see from the visible and exalted dignity of one in power how he should be feared and honored and loved, they should also understand by the same insight how the invisible and most high God is to be dreaded and worshipped and loved above all things. For by outward and secular dominion people are taught about the inward and spiritual power of the Divine Majesty, which is so concealed and hidden from humanity that no fleshly eye can see it unless faith grasps it. So God is invisible to mortal creatures; but at least through visible authority people can learn to fear and worship the Most High, Who established it. How?

- 14 Why God lets one kind of person excel and another be subject

God's inspiration gave the human mind, by means of its reason, a sense that great persons should rule the people and be feared and honored by them.

VISION SIX

For God has allowed one kind of person to rule and another to be subject so that people would be divided into groups and so would not kill each other off and perish; or because if the example were not given by fearing and honoring human beings, the people would be lazy, and not know how to acknowledge God.

Therefore, the Holy Spirit led the people to the inner spiritual law, which could rule them inwardly and outwardly until the Fountain sprang up and flowed forth in the world in the fullness of justice to rule both body and soul. So secular powers are set up to order earthly things, that the body may seek refreshment and not faint; and spiritual authority is established that the soul might long for celestial things and aspire to the service of God. And so both these things are established by My order, as Isaac said to his son Jacob:

15 Words of Isaac to Jacob

“Be the lord of your brethren, and let your mother’s children bow down before you” [Genesis 27:29]. Which is to say, be the lord of your brothers, powerful over them in honors and triumphs, blessed by the benedictions given me by God; and let all the children of your mother’s children bow down before you, subject to you because of your exceeding blessing. For out of you shall come forth the great race from which will arise the man most strong and mighty, whom his brothers shall persecute and drive away. But he will escape them like a lion in his strength and rule them with most excellent rule. And he will restrain them in the name of his power, and never dwindle into a mere appendage like a tail; his brothers will become the tail.

And thus too I, the Heavenly Father, said to My incarnate Son, “Be the Lord of all who are born of human seed, who were created by Me through You. For You were born miraculously of a virgin, not conceived by the seed of a man; You went forth from Me as a flaming fire, and appeared on earth as a true man, but the seal of the untouched and chaste Virgin remained closed.

“You, therefore, in the supernal light of divinity, are the Lord of those who by Your Incarnation as a man are Your brothers. And so let the children of the mother of Your Incarnation bow down and be subject to You, and all people born of humanity serve You in loving devotion.”

And since the Son of God is thus Lord of all creatures, by the will of the Father and the touch of the Holy Spirit He also established the order of the different powers in the world. How? Thus: There was excess and vaunting because no people honored any other people, and everyone was doing as he pleased; and this would have continued if God, in His infinite wisdom, had not done away with it. Therefore, He made distinctions between one people and another. He made the lesser subject to the greater in the service of obedience, and made the greater help and serve the lesser with intelligence and devotion; just as it was granted to Jacob by his father, inspired by the Holy Spirit, to be lord of his brothers.

16 This means that there are three orders: rulers, free people and servants

And by his being made lord, it was shown that in secular affairs there is a kind of person who is to rule over others' freedom. They honor him for his authority, and thus he spares them and does not oppress them by claiming service from them, but cherishes them with fraternal love. But when it says they are made to bow before him, it symbolizes the services due from those who are released from the bonds of servants, but remain children of the flesh with fleshly cares.

But later, Jacob stole the lordship from his brother through his father's blessing. He then gained heavenly renown by the stone he set up as a sign, and the tithes he vowed to give, as was said; and so he symbolizes each protagonist in the spiritual army. For every faithful person must ascend from the lowest rank to the highest; that is, he must learn from the secular power the higher authority and clearer light of the spiritual life. For in the latter is fulfilled the office of ruler by the way of the immaculate Lamb, Who has lifted Man on high in the plenitude and goodness of justice, raising him up from the snares of the wicked robber who laid him low.

17 How secular and spiritual people are each divided into four categories

And hence the two ways of life, concerned with earthly and with heavenly things, are divided into four parts each. And God gave Man the great power of reason that, inspired by the Holy Spirit, he might know these parts in himself by the pattern of the four elements. And thus he adds variety to the two ways, which I do not spurn or reject; for he who in My name multiplies what is less is worthy of reward and not of rejection. And these four parts pertain as much to the secular as to the spiritual life. For in secular affairs there are lesser and greater nobles, servants and followers; and in spiritual matters there are the excellent and the superior, the obeyers and the enforcers.

18 No one may seize, steal or buy either a spiritual or a secular office

And I do not will that these offices, which I established, should be seized or stolen or put up for sale; I want them given for reasonable cause, that those who receive them may be useful to God and humanity. But there are poisonous scorpions who ignore My justice, and in the deadly venom of their avarice and their pride usurp these positions; and this not just in secular but also in spiritual offices.

The usurping of secular offices, in which the earthly confronts the earthly, will be harshly judged in the wrath of the Jealousy of God; but the usurping of spiritual ones is more serious and more punishable. For secular people are flesh of flesh in outward things, but spiritual people are inwardly joined to the Spirit. Secular people indeed, though occupied with outer things and earthly cares, should seek to be guided by the inner Spirit in their duties; but spiritual people are within the ranks of religion and must scorn earthly things and rest fully in the heart of the Almighty Father, and so they have a much greater obligation to be ardent in imitating the priesthood of the Son. For as the Son went forth from the heart of His Father, so the Father in His Son set up people to be His officials, arrayed in their high rank to serve the Church and be united to God in good works. How?

- 19 Those worthy of office are intelligent, moral, eloquent and modest

There are those who have compunction and well-searched hearts and mature minds, and all else that is good to Me. They have good consciences, so that they do not seek office wickedly by conflict, or try to obtain it by devilish arts, or buy it with money or with secular power, or seek it for the sake of fleeting words of human praise. Rather, they receive it in humility by My true choice and the election of the people. And these are My most dear and proved guardians, and My surest friends.

- 20 Those who flee God and seize office devilishly will be punished later

But there are those who go backward and get power in the dark, not caring how; they snatch the celestial mysteries by craft, by secular and earthly means. And such people fly from My face and in bitterness slay their own souls; they deride Me and deny Me, and kick against My will. How?

By despising Me; they do not desire to attain to office through Me, or raise their inner heart's vision to Me and say, "Does this please God or not?" But each of them says within himself, "Even if this is bad in God's sight, I will accept it; I will trust in the Lord, and at some point while I still live I will repent." And thus they get the authority without Me, the Living God, and never ask Me for it or trust to attaining it by My will; in their impatience they flee before My face, snatching at office and running aground from the sea of My mercy.

These people therefore are not inside the heart of the Supreme Father; they are outside, wandering in the region of the North, which rules them in these matters. They choose not to seek Me, the Creator of all, but to seek their own will and hold it in place of God, and follow it and abandon Me. They do not wish to know Me, nor I them; their desires prompt them to do what they wish. And, because they refuse to fear Me, I choose not to stop them at once by the terror of My wrath; and so their deeds will be held against them on that day when they can no longer prevail. If I let them go in this life, they will have to answer in the fearful Last Judgment for what they have done; for they had knowledge of Me in faith, yet chose to ignore Me in the deeds they did.

- 21 By the ordination of Providence, these human distinctions exist forever

But you see that the two lesser walls extend from the north to the west corner. This is to say that when the greater and lesser orders of people were established, from the time of Abraham and Moses as in the North to the manifestation of the Catholic faith of the true Trinity taught by My Son as in the West, the distinction between people and their rulers was set up in My Law. And this was the germ and the prototype of the people of the New Testament, shown in advance and lasting till the time My Son by My Zeal was born in the flesh. So these distinctions were and are and always will be, between people of inner and outer life, spiritual and secular people, and greater and lesser people.

They are joined to these corners at each end like a vault; for the peoples are united in honor and teaching to the Old Testament at the beginning and the New Testament at the end. And it is like a vault because, by the workings of divine Providence, they are well and worthily conformed to the structure of the heavenly Jerusalem.

- 22 There are three kinds of secular people, greater and lesser

The height of these two lesser walls is three cubits, which indicates that when the two secular conditions are rightfully upheld, there are three divisions between the people: the rulers, those who are free from bonds of servitude, and the common people who are subject to their governors.

VISION SIX

23 Spiritual rulers should excel in unity of faith

And so the distance between the inner, arched wall and the middle one is one cubit; for that is the distance between the dignity of those high in spiritual authority and those who hold the lesser titles of earthly government, appointed in the unity of faith according to God's will to hold in check those subject to them.

24 The secular rulers and the people must have innocent and loving relations

And between the middle one and the outer one it is one palm, and that a child's; for between the lesser power of the secular government and the servitude of its subjects there must be thoughtful justice, and the two must touch each other with the hands of their joint labor in the single-minded and simple devotion of childlike innocence.

25 In the work of God, six virtues prefigure all the others

And inside the building you see six figures standing on its pavement before the arched wall. This is to say that when God works goodness six virtues appear, which prefigure all the other virtues, as in six days God created His creatures. These virtues stand before the wall as a preview of things to come; they stand before the Israelite people, who were bridled by the divine law and walled about by the authority and defense of their forerunners, and they tread underfoot the pavement of earthly cares, which forms the floor of the Supreme Father's building, to signify that the army of Christians through them can fight the Devil.

26 The positions of these six virtues and the other two

Therefore, three are grouped together before the wall near the north corner; for when the Old Testament was begun by Abraham and Moses to oppose the Devil, the holy and inseparable Trinity, in the power of Its majesty, was symbolized by divers secret figures.

And three are together at the end of the wall that looks to the West; for when the Son of God was born in the flesh at the end of the time of the Law to redeem the people who looked to the West, the Trinity, which reigns in the Unity of the Divinity, was preached openly by name.

And they are all looking at the pictures in the arches of the wall; for all with equal devotion look to the authority of God's decrees for humanity, designated by His power in the law of the Old and the New Testament, and ponder how those decrees may be perfected in them.

But at that same end of the wall you see another figure within the building, sitting on a stone resting on the pavement for a seat. This is to say that, when the old law of the Old Testament was laid by and the new faith in the true Trinity was begun, and God established all the constant virtues of the Church, this virtue also appeared to do His work and will work through Him in humans until the end of the world.

And therefore she sits on the strongest of rocks, which is to say on God's only Son; for He is the seat and the repose of all the faithful who despise the transitory and with pure faith believe in Him.

And she leans against the wall to her right; for she rightfully reposes on the hope that this people, both the greater and the lesser, who by God's disposition have been placed under authority, may honor her in their works.

But she turns her face toward the pillar of the true Trinity; for she directs her intention toward that Trinity in everything, with sharpest vision and mental powers, as all who worship God must contemplate Him in their deeds, diligently and ceaselessly, as the eternal Trinity inviolably in Three Persons.

But at the same end you see another figure, standing on the wall above the first. This is to say that when the shadows of the old Law were transmuted by the faith of the Holy Trinity into the true light of justice, this virtue was elevated by the authority of rulers and the faithful people to the higher place, the desire for heavenly salvation. She stands there fighting against vice, upright in the Son of God, for she had her origin from Him, and she shall remain with Him in the heavenly Jerusalem when the world has ended.

And she also turns toward the pillar of the true Trinity; for it is in her strength derived from the holy and ineffable Trinity that she brings back souls to their true country.

27 On the virtues' clothing and what it means

And in these figures you see certain resemblances, for the virtues are of one mind though diverse in the gifts of God. The first six and the last two are clothed in silk garments, which are the sweet works the worshippers of God offer to Him in divine law and true justice; and white shoes, which are their eagerness to follow in purity the example of good human actions.

But the right-hand figure in the group of three standing at the end of the wall is so pure and bright that you cannot discern any detail about her because of her great splendor. For this virtue, by the gift of the Holy Trinity, rose up in the true strength of salvation at the end of the ancient severity; so she is completely translucent and pure, devoid of all devilish impurities and shining with the joy of human gladness, and she has in the heavenly places such abundance of glory and honor that no exercise of reason by any mortal can comprehend her incomparable harmony, unless God wills to reveal it.

And the one who is standing on the wall is wearing black shoes; for, before My Son's Incarnation, the sign and footprint of death were in all people both of the higher dignity and of the lesser.

And none of these wears a cloak, which means that they have cast off care for the things of Earth and the outer garments of the Law's commands, and are inwardly contemplating true justice. But the middle one of the three who stands at the beginning of the wall is wearing a cloak, for she did her work under God's protection at the beginning of the period of severity. But she is surrounded by the love of God and hides in it her heavenly treasure, rejecting the desire for carnal things.

And two of these same three, the ones to the right and the left of the middle one, and two of the other three, the middle and the left figures, do not have women's veils on their heads, but stand with bare heads and white hair. For Law and Prophecy, which came forth from the power of the Supernal Majesty, displayed in their strength life and death, followed the twofold ways of love and in their inner wisdom were constant against adversity and rejoiced in sweet divinity; and in their Head, Who is Christ My Son, they were faithfully freed from subjection to pain or the noose of death. Their hair is bright with the purity of virginity, for the Divinity greatly loved the virginal nature in the Virgin Mary.

But the middle one of the first three and the one who sits on the stone next to the wall have white head-veils in the manner of women; which is to say that in the height of Heaven and in the constancy of blessed repose they are pleasantly and sweetly bound by the strong bond of subjection. They venerate God, the Head of all the faithful, with a pure and loving devotion, as with sincere love a wife should venerate her husband.

And the middle and the right-hand ones of the second three are clothed in white tunics; for their shining and pure works go forth among people by the power of the Divine Majesty in sweetest beatitude, ordained by the law of the Lord to Whom they are united.

But you also see differences between them; which is to say that, although they worship God in concord, He has given them different powers.

28 Abstinance and her appearance

Therefore, the figure who stands in the middle of the three first ones symbolizes Abstinance; for she, in the fight, is like a city and a foundation and an ornament to the virtues near her. By her grave conduct she keeps herself from sin, and having no wantonness in herself she scrutinizes and reproves all childish wrongdoing. She appears like a mother in the midst of those virtues, which showed the glory of the Trinity at the beginning of the time of the Law in the Old Testament.

And she has a yellow circlet like a crown on her head, with this inscription carved on the right side: "Always burn!" For she was crowned by the Supreme Head with the yellow ray of the brilliant sun, the Son of God. In His brightness she exists totally, desiring no one but Him; and indeed, He always inflames her from the direction of salvation, which is the right.

And thus, as you see, a dove is flying at the right side of this figure, and breathing out the writing from its beak. For the right hand of heavenly bounty gives the gift of true simplicity, which is the Holy Spirit, and It enkindles all good things in Abstinence by divine inspiration, for the purpose of saving souls; and so this virtue shows in the words of her admonition, already quoted.

29 Liberality and her appearance

Now the second figure, standing at her right, symbolizes Liberality; she is of childlike simplicity, with no over-subtlety or hardheartedness with respect to human suffering. Together with Abstinence she withdraws herself from all harshness and takes the right path to God; for when Abstinence decides on a work, Liberality begins to carry it out.

She has a lion on her breast, which gives off light like a mirror; which is My Son Christ Jesus, the mighty lion, enclosed in her heart like a tender and wonderful mirror of affection.

And hanging from her neck to her breast on a twisted, flexible rod is a pale-colored serpent. This symbolizes the fact that My wise Son bent His neck, which is to say His patience, to bear the pale agony of the body and the twisting of His pains when He was raised on the cross to heal all wounds. Liberality impresses this upon her heart with heavenly love and causes it to be contemplated in human minds; and so she says in the words of her already quoted declaration.

30 Piety and her appearance

And the third figure, on the left, manifests Piety, who never cherishes hatred or envy of human happiness, but always rejoices at and embraces human good fortune. By her freshness and her outpouring of generosity, Abstinence is able to resist the Devil, who whispers to her from the left. For in the struggle for the banner, Piety is the full work of Abstinence, and always is the victor.

VISION SIX

Hence she is clad in a tunic of hyacinth red; for her splendid work surrounds her, yet in her beautiful patience she hides bloody injuries beneath it, suffering all of them according to My Son's example in His Passion. On her breast is the picture of an angel, a wing out on either side. This means that each person should imitate the angels in his mind by loving each of God's ordinances, and lift himself up into flight on one wing and on two, which is to say by the One God and by twofold virtue; meeting the good and the bad on both sides, not unduly exalted by the good or prostrated by the bad. He should gaze on God in purity of heart, and therefore rise upward and not cast himself down to earth.

And therefore its right wing stretches to the figure's right shoulder; for on the right, the side of salvation, human happiness comes to the help of Piety, because My Son brought back Man to his true country. And its left wing stretches to her left shoulder; for on the left, the side of the Devil's snares, a faithful person casts off the work of darkness by extending his wing for a flight upward to the refuge of My Son. And thus he is strong against all adversity and imitates the life of the just, as this virtue declares in her already quoted words.

31 Truth and her appearance

The figure who stands in the middle of the three second ones depicts Truth; for in every case, after Abstinence and the virtues that cleave to it have been established, Truth arises. The other figures stand by her because she is their tower and their strong protector; she is at the heart of the virtues that prefigure the Holy Trinity when Jewish custom sets and true faith rises.

Above her right shoulder hovers a dove of exceeding whiteness, breathing into her right ear. This signifies the amazing power of the Holy Spirit, Who appears at the upper right, the direction of the blessed restoration through the Incarnation of the Son of God; Its touch breathes into her right ear, which is to say into the hearts of believers, that they may understand the divine power of God.

On her breast is the picture of a monstrous and shapeless human head; which is to say that God allows the hearts of His elect to be troubled by the miseries and persecutions of rulers, just as His Son chose to suffer at the hands of the chief priests. And, because God is in the hearts of the faithful, they should suffer persecution patiently for the love of God; and, because death arose from the fall of the Devil, they must sustain many struggles and sufferings, often hard and adverse for the body, against the Devil's villainies. For something clings to Man that the ancient serpent always pursues. What is this? The lust of the flesh, which can be ensnared from ambush by that malignant enemy.

BOOK THREE

And beneath her feet lie the likenesses of people trodden down and crushed by her. This is to say that the lies of the Devil, which reside in human deeds, are reduced to naught under the feet of Truth. She loves the edifice of the Church, where all the virtues shine clearly to be tested by her; before all ages she was hiding invisibly in the heart of the Father, but at the end of time she appeared visibly in the true flesh of the Son of God.

And therefore in her hands she holds a document fully unrolled, and on the side that faces Heaven there are seven lines of writing. For in all works of Truth, by God's grace a pattern is unrolled of the law established for the Christian people; and it should be observed with open worship on the side turned toward heavenly desire, and feared on the side of carnal lusts. And it contains the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, the unassailable bulwark against the Devil's snares of death. And you try to read it, but cannot. For though Man yearns to know the mysteries and secrets of God's gifts, it is not possible for him to understand or grasp God's will in His wonders as long as he is burdened with a mortal body. But let Man embrace and truly comprehend those mysteries by faithfully following God's precepts, as this virtue says in her words already quoted.

32 Peace and her appearance

The second figure, on her right, symbolizes Peace, which has the heavenly mark and the company of angels. For she puts forth buds in the full fruitfulness of Truth. Truth is surrounded by marvellous gifts of Heaven, which come from the right, the side of salvation, and so, through the Son of God, she brings Peace. How? As it is written in the angelic song: "Glory be to God on high, and on earth peace to people of good will" [Luke 2:14]. Which is to say: Because the Son of God was miraculously incarnate, humanity shines forth in the Most high God and God in humanity. And therefore God is worthy to be praised and glorified in Heaven by His whole creation. And so will there also be on earth the peace of salvation to those who receive the will of the Father with devotion and faith; for the peace of good will is the will of all the goodness of the Father, His Son, Who is God and Man at once.

And how is He peace? He is the Peace of humans, and defends them from the snares of the ancient serpent. That serpent was the first false one, and lost the light of life and was cast down into darkness; and then the true Peace, which is the true Son of God, brought light to people, so that they became partakers of the Kingdom of God and stood in the blessed place that the Devil had lost.

So, as you see, this virtue has an angelic face; for she flies from all evil, and beholds God, as it were, face to face with holy mind and angelic desire. Hence too she has wings capable of flying stretched out to each side; for, faced with either tranquillity or trouble, she flies upward to God. She does not deal in terror or bitterness, but remains calm and harmonious; by the joint effort of her two wings she embraces the one God, and persists only in serenity, which is not shaken by changeful tempests either in good or in evil case.

And she is in human form, like the other virtues. For she shines miraculously through the Son of God, and all the other human virtues are made true in her. For she never seeks contention or dispute, but always leniency; and so she opposes the attacks of the Devil, as is manifested in the words of her discourse above.

33 Beatitude and her appearance

And the third figure, on the left, depicts Beatitude, yearning for eternal life. By her faithfulness and quiet gentleness Truth can oppose on her left hand all the craft of the serpent's temptations, which deceive the person who consents to him. For Beatitude is the unconquered serenity of true glory, and fears no miseries in death. Therefore she is clothed in a white tunic, picked out with green; for she is surrounded by faithful works, which are bright with celestial desire and fresh with the freshness of the gifts of the Holy Spirit.

She has in her hands a small vase, pale and shining; which is to say that her deeds depict the way Man apprehends God by faith in a small container, the interior of his contrite heart. It is pale with the weakness of human flesh, because faith must be held to even in this mortal life where misery is always with humanity. Therefore it gives off bright light like lightning, and this light shines on the face and neck of the figure. For knowledge of eternal light is diffused by both fear and love of God, which reaches from a person's inner heart to his face, which is to say it makes him begin righteous deeds that show his good intent. And then it shines on the neck, which means that the completed work includes strength, and through Beatitude shines before God more brilliantly than the sun, as this virtue declares in her speech quoted above.

34 Discretion and her appearance

But the figure who sits on the stone at this end of the wall denotes Discretion. For when the Old Testament observances were fulfilled, she appeared in Christ; she is the wise sifter of all things, holding what should be held and cutting off what should be cut off, as the wheat is separated from the tares.

And she is clothed in a black tunic; for she is surrounded by mortification of the flesh, and has cast off all vain levity. And on her right shoulder she bears a small cross with the image of Jesus Christ; which is to say that, when Almighty God gave His Son to be miraculously incarnate and humbly suffer, this virtue was firmly rooted in the power of God's strength, which is the right. Discretion united with His love when she was manifested by Him, and through her all justice is decided. And as God determines the stature that best befits Man, Discretion's office is to imitate Him; that is, she fulfils her works in the Giver, His crucified Son, and exists in both His states, divinity and humanity.

BOOK THREE

It turns hither and thither; for in the sign of the holy cross Discretion moves unceasingly in a round among good and bad people. And as from the clouds there shines on her breast a wondrously bright light; which is to say that from God's mercy, the brightest cloud above, divine love is instilled and enkindled in human minds, waking discretion and enlightenment in them.

Therefore, this light is divided into many rays as is the splendor of the sun when it shines through an object's many small openings. For the Holy Spirit, with heavenly power, emits diverse rays, which are gifts to humans; and these rays, more brilliant than the sun, diffuse and penetrate the recesses of humility in the clear vision of faithful souls. And thus It enlightens their minds and senses, that they may gain a deep understanding in everything of what they should rightly do in God.

In her right hand she holds a small branch like a fan; which is to say that Discretion, on the right side, which is the side of salvation, contemplates her work in humans through the gifts of the Holy Spirit. These humans are in the flesh, which is fragile like wood; but the flesh has in it her sign, and so by God's help drives away the Devil's temptations, which come like a cloud of flies. Thus Discretion is not dissipated in them by vanities. And so from the top of this wood three twigs have wonderfully sprouted forth into flower, that the faithful may believe above all that the Holy Trinity perpetually flowers in wonder and gloriously reigns in the Unity of the Divinity. Thus they must not rashly contemplate the celestial secrets in themselves, but dispose all their actions well and rightly through the power of Discretion, as God disposes His works justly and with discretion in all His creatures.

And in her bosom she carries some minute stones, jewels of all kinds, which she looks at very carefully and diligently as a merchant looks over his goods. This is to say that in the bosom of the human mind she encloses everything that is apt and suitable, that its most minute thoughts and deeds may be jewels of virtue. And with cautious and diligent scrutiny she seeks all God-ordained justice, and influences all human hearts with a sharp awareness of the reward of their work, the recompense from God, which indeed she herself says, as mentioned above.

35 Salvation and her appearance

And the figure that stands on the wall at the same end signifies the Salvation of souls, which appeared in the authority of the new grace when the old severity had set. Thus Discretion is the foundation, and Salvation appears above her, who arose in the Son of God when He was born of the Virgin for human salvation. She is bareheaded, with curly black hair. For she is bare of subjection or servitude, and remains free in status, because she openly cleaves to the Son of God, Who mercifully raised her up; but her hair is black, because among the Jewish people Salvation was obscured, not shining in true brightness but existing in great diversity of observance, like curls in hair.

She also has a swarthy face; for before the Incarnation of the Son of God, she was in the shadow of death, and seemed not to hope for the happiness of eternal salvation. Therefore, too, she is dressed in a tunic of many different colors; for among the people of the Old Testament she was surrounded by many works, including many vices.

But you see that she takes off the tunic and her shoes, and stands naked. This is to say that when death was banished by the Passion of My Son, and when the Holy Spirit came and the sound and words of the apostles were heard in the world, Salvation awoke; she spurned evil works and rejected wrong paths and stripped herself bare of the Devil's power. And thus she spoke within herself: "O you most shameful Devil! You would never leave me, except that I am redeemed in the blood of the Lamb. For you wanted to keep me in the pit of Hell, but now by God's grace I am delivered."

And thus suddenly her hair and her face gleam newly white, like a newborn baby. For after the Incarnation of My Son, the people represented by her hair increased, well-enlightened in the inner face of their souls. They grasped true and splendid justice and sought eternal happiness, trusting in life's brightness and the liberation of the faithful members who adhere to Christ the Head; and so they are saved in celestial life through regeneration and the innocence of childhood. And her whole body shines like light; for she in all her members, the faithful people subject to her through My Son, was made pure in dovelike simplicity and bright in the lucent beauty of the justice of God.

But you see on her breast a splendid cross with the image of Christ Jesus, which is depicted above a little bush with two flowers on it, a lily and a rose, which reach upward toward the cross. This is to say that in the Passion of Jesus, this virtue became the strong heart of the believing people. For the Savior Jesus, by His martyrdom and the steps of His righteous example, cast down and broke the tree of Adam's death and perdition, against which the two Testaments had also fought, the Old in white and the New in red. By God's will, then, and in the lofty understanding of the spirit, they turned from the perdition of death to the Passion of that noble and loving Redeemer and all His justice.

So you see her vigorously beat the tunic and shoes she has taken off, so that a great deal of dust flies out of them. For Salvation shows, in new and righteous human deeds, that the tunic of early custom and old vice is removed and the evil example of Adam's transgression beaten out of it. She brings these things to naught by vigorous scrutiny, and despises and rejects the dust of vainglory and other sins, as she makes known about herself in the words given above.

But let the one who has ears sharp to hear inner meanings ardently love My reflection and pant after My words, and inscribe them in his soul and conscience.

PILLAR OF THE TRINITY

VISION SEVEN

The Pillar of the Trinity

Then I saw in the west corner of the building a wondrous, secret and supremely strong pillar, purple-black in color. It was so placed in the corner that it protruded both inside and outside the building. And it was so great in extent that neither its size nor its height was clear to my understanding; I only saw that it was miraculously even and without roughnesses.

The outside part had three steel-colored edges, which stood out like sharp sword-edges from the bottom to the top. One of these faced Southwest, where a great deal of dry straw lay cut and scattered by it; another faced Northwest, where a lot of little wings had been cut off by it and had fallen; and the middle edge faced West, where lay many decaying branches that it had cut away. All of these had been cut off by those edges for their temerity.

And again, the One Who sat on the throne and showed me all these things said to me, "To you I explain these mystical and miraculous unknown gifts in all their fullness, and grant you to speak of them and show them; for, O human, they appear to you clearly in the true light. This I do to enkindle the fiery hearts of the faithful, who are the pure stones that will build the celestial Jerusalem."

I The Trinity is to be believed humbly and not pried into more than is licit

For the holy and ineffable Trinity of the Supreme Unity, which was hidden from those under the yoke of the Law but manifested in the new Grace to those freed from servitude, must be believed by the faithful with simple and humble heart, One True God in Three Persons; and it must not be rashly scrutinized, nor must anyone be dissatisfied with the gift he has received from the Holy Spirit. If such a one seeks more than is fitting, in the temerity of his self-exaltation he will fall into a worse state, not find what he improperly seeks. And this is shown by the present vision.

For this pillar you see in the west corner of the building symbolizes the true Trinity; for the Father, the Word and the Holy Spirit are One God in Trinity, and that Trinity is in Unity. It is the perfect pillar of all good, reaching from the heights to the depths and governing the whole terrestrial globe.

BOOK THREE

It stands in the west corner because the Son of God was incarnate in the sunset of the world; and He glorified His Father everywhere and promised the Holy Spirit to His disciples. So too, the Son, in undergoing death by the will of the Father, gave a noble example to humans, so that they too could rightfully enter the edifice of the Supreme Father by performing true and just works in the Holy Spirit.

And it is wondrous, secret and supremely strong. For God manifests Himself in His creatures so wondrously that they can never exhaust His presence; and so secretly that they cannot scrutinize him by any willful knowledge or sense; and so strongly that all their strength is directed by Him and cannot be compared with His strength.

2 Christ's blood saves the world and shows the Trinity, but incomprehensibly

It is purple-black in color, and is so placed in the corner that it protrudes both inside and outside the building. This is to say that, by the will of the Father, His only Son poured out His purple blood on behalf of humans with their black sins; and thus He saved the world by His Passion and brought the true and right faith to believers. And when the old rituals failed and the new holiness arose, the worship of the Holy Trinity was most plainly proclaimed; for it was openly believed that the Heavenly Father sent His Son, conceived by the Holy Spirit, into the world. And the Son sought the glory of His Father and not His own, and disclosed the profound consolation of the Holy Spirit, as had been foretold; and thus it was hidden on no side, but was proclaimed both to the faithful, who abode in God's work, and to the unbelievers, who stood outside the faith.

But it is so great in extent that neither its size nor its height is clear to your understanding; which is to say that the Trinity is of such ineffable glory and power that its greatness of majesty and its altitude of divinity cannot be bounded by any twist or presumption of the human mind. But it is miraculously even and without roughnesses; for, wonderful to relate, it is mild and benign in grace, and smooth in its sweet justice to all those who hasten to it, so that no rough place of injustice is in it, but justly and beautifully it confers salvation.

3 The Trinity is manifest in power and pierces even unbelievers' hearts

The outside part has three steel-colored edges, which stand out like sharp sword-edges from the bottom to the top. This is to say that the ineffable Trinity stands against the darkness of the world, appearing openly in the Unity of

VISION SEVEN

Deity. Its sovereignty and power are hidden from none of its creatures except the hearts of unbelievers; from them it is concealed because of their unbelief. Therefore, God's judgment in due recompense deservedly slays them like sharp steel; it yields to no prideful opposition, but extends from one end to the other, which is to say from the creation to the end of the world. And all that exists it has penetrated and does penetrate like a sword of division, in profound Divinity and in all wisdom and power.

4 Unbelief opposes the Catholic faith, and God cuts it down in confusion

And one of these faces Southwest, where a great deal of dry straw lies cut and scattered by it. This is to say that among the Christian people the just and divine Trinity cuts down and burns up all who raise the aridity of heterodoxy and negation and rejection against the righteous Catholic faith. They are utterly confounded, like the grass that is trodden underfoot and burned in the fire, separated from the fruitful grain of the wheat. For faith and works stem from knowledge of Scripture; and all that is contrary to the true faith, though the foolish people follow it like stupid cattle, is scattered and annihilated.

5 God casts down the boasting of the Jewish people

And another faces Northwest, where a lot of little wings have been cut off by it and have fallen. This is to say that the Divinity rejected the high vanity of the Jewish people, which was flying in great pride and mental exaltation, trying to be just in itself and not in God; like the Pharisees, who tried to ascend into the heights of the heavens, trusting with confidence in themselves. But by God's just judgment they fell, rent in pieces for their presumption and their bad conduct.

6 The devilish divisions of the Gentiles are cut down by God and destroyed

And the middle edge faces West, where lie many decaying branches that it has cut away. For by the Trinity the heinous and diabolical schisms of the pagans, who stray from the right faith into the sunset of infidelity, are cut off. And as decaying branches are a nuisance, unfit for human use, so this people, who followed the Devil's lies and not the divine commands, was cut off and rejected from the joy of life.

And therefore all of these have been cut off by those edges for their temerity. For in all these cases, the true and holy Trinity allows the unfaithful people who boldly try to break away from it or stubbornly do not believe in it to cut themselves off from it and go to perdition; for in their madness and ignorance they attack the Divinity, and choose not to yield to the faith that the Son of God brought in Himself. This faith He transmitted to humanity through His disciples, as the following parable shows:

7 Parable on this subject

A certain lord who owned a fire-producing flint decided to command a numerous people to do a necessary thing, both personally and through messengers. But the messengers did not understand their lord's words, and were foolish and inexperienced at fulfilling his command, stupidly nattering. So while they were trying there arose a tumult; there was a great tempest, with rain and violent thunder, so that the earth quaked and the rocks were rent. And a vessel that had lain in the earth with its mouth facing away from the heavens, and which had a lot of small vessels within it, was rooted out of the earth with great force and its mouth turned to face Heaven.

And then the lord used his flint to produce a violent fire, which ran through those messengers with such heat that all their veins were inflamed and all timid indolence was stricken from them, as quickly as something poured over a dry skin runs off it. And so at last they remembered all the things they had learned and heard from their lord; and they went forth to the rootless people, whose cities had been destroyed, and announced to them their lord's command. For some of these they reconstructed their roots and rebuilt their cities; but others they did not treat so, but slew them like pigs and divided them. And therefore that flint is respected by the whole world, and terrifies and slays all the sins of human flesh.

This means the following. That lord is the Father Almighty, with Whom is His Only-Begotten, the cornerstone conceived by the ardent Holy Spirit and born as a man from the intact Virgin, the fairest and most beautiful flower of all fair and beautiful holiness. For the Son of God in His Divinity was before all time and all creation with the Father and the fiery Comforter; and then, when it pleased the Father, He was sent as was foretold, that he might be conceived by the Holy Spirit, truly incarnate and born of the Virgin, and bestow on believers the fairness and beauty of life.

When He was incarnate, the Father benignly proclaimed through Him and His disciples the necessary thing, the deliverance and salvation of those who believed in Him. But His disciples, while the Son was with them in the world in His body, were foolish and unknowing and unresponsive, slow to understand His words in the Spirit and to fulfil them in work. For they heard them only as in a dream; they were simple, timid and frightened, and had not yet been strengthened.

And meanwhile there came the time of the raging hearts; the Jews, causing a tumult, sought to stir up many charges against the Son of God and in that great tempest kill Him. And they carried out their malignity even as they wished; in that violent storm a murder was done such as was never seen before and will never be again. And the earth quaked, which is to say that earthly human minds and all of creation were terrified, and because of their criminal deed the laws of the Jews, written on stone, were cracked.

VISION SEVEN

Then the first man, in whom is signified all of creation, and who lay buried in death, bending all his will toward the things of earth and turning his back on Heaven and God, was uprooted from the dust of death, in which he slept with his children, by the great power of the Son of God. And thus he sighed with all his heart and mind and turned to face the celestial country; for he heard Christ, the Son of God, Who was slain for his sake.

But after the Son of God had ascended to the Father, through the Son and according to His promise the Holy Spirit descended. For now the whole earth was full of heavenly dew because the Bread of Heaven had been in it; the faithless had ignored Him like a false rumor, but the faithful had received Him with all their devotion. And so, because the true Word had become incarnate, the Holy Spirit came openly in tongues of fire; for the Son, Who converted the world to the truth by His preaching, was conceived by the Holy Spirit. And, because the apostles had been taught by the Son, the Holy Spirit bathed them in Its fire, so that with their souls and bodies they spoke in many tongues; and, because their souls ruled their bodies, they cried out so that the whole world was shaken by their voices.

And the Holy Spirit took their human fear from them, so that no dread was in them, and they would never fear human savagery when they spoke the word of God; all such timidity was taken from them, so ardently and so quickly that they became firm and not soft, and dead to all adversity that could befall them. And then they remembered with perfect understanding all the things they had heard and received from Christ with sluggish faith and comprehension; they recalled them to memory as if they had learned them from Him in that very hour.

And so, going forth, they made their way among the faithless peoples who did not have roots, which is to say the sign of the knowledge of holy innocence and justice, and whose city, which is to say the instruments of God's law, had been destroyed by faithlessness. And to these they announced the words of salvation and of the true faith in Christ. And thus they brought back many of this throng to the knowledge of God and led them to the center, which is to say the font of baptism, where they received the holiness they had lost by their proud transgressions. And they built the holy city of the commandments of God, thus rebuilding the city which that seducer the Devil had taken from them in Adam, and restored it to them in the faith that leads to salvation.

BOOK THREE

But there were some who did not believe, and did not choose to receive the faith of baptism and the protection of God's command; and these, reading the signs, the apostles passed by and condemned to death for their hardness and unbelief. For in their crimes and the filth of their carnal pollutions, wallowing in fornication and adultery as a pig wallows in the mud, they were not willing to be converted to the true faith, and therefore they were divided and separated from life.

And thus the Son of God was shown throughout the whole world by many and wondrous signs, ineffably begotten of the Father in His Divinity and then miraculously born of the Virgin in time. And so the hearts of all who hear these things should be alarmed and agitated by fear and trembling, so that the vain and deceitful works they have been pleased to do may be negated in them by contempt of death. For the true Word of God bears testimony to the Holy Trinity and to life-giving salvation through the water of regeneration, as the beloved John shows in the words of his exposition, when he says:

8 Words of John

"And it is the Spirit Which testifies that Christ is the Truth. There are three that give testimony on earth: the spirit, and the water, and the blood; and the three are one. And there are Three Who give testimony in heaven: the Father, the Word and the Spirit. And the Three are One" [1 John 5:6-8; Hildegard has reversed the order of the heaven and earth parts]. This is to say that the human spirit is spiritual; it does not come from the blood, nor is it born out of the flesh, but it emerges from the secret places of God, invisible to the mutable flesh. Therefore it bears testimony to the Son of God, Whose glory is wondrous in mystical breath; no person can perfectly understand that glory, or know how the Only-Begotten of God was conceived by the Holy Spirit and born into the world, just as no person can fully know how the soul permeates the human body and blood to make up one life.

And, as the human spirit is the certain cause of the knowledge granted a person by God, and permeates everything else God gives him, being true and faithful life and not false or deceptive; so too Christ is the perfect Truth, in Whom life has risen and the light of salvation has shone, and from Whom death, which is deceptive, has fallen away.

So three, which signify the Holy Trinity, give testimony on earth, showing and granting in this world the remedy of life-giving salvation; for through that salvation the heavenly things without end must be attained, and in mortal flesh they are only awaited in hope and not possessed in actuality.

Thus the human spirit in itself testifies to Me, for it will not live fully in restored salvation unless it rises again through Me in the water of regeneration. For humanity is deficient in the light that shines in Me, since it was expelled from felicity because it was corrupted into crime and increasingly bloody deeds.

VISION SEVEN

And water testifies to Me, for it purifies all filthy things in it, and clearly purges the fatal pestilence of death; it is joined to the spirit before the blood is, because as the spirit is spiritual, so the water brings spiritual sanctification. It stands in the middle between the spirit and the blood, because its confirming carries both soul and body through spiritual regeneration to life.

And blood too testifies; for it alters its poisoned course toward the house of holiness through the water of salvation, which is the medicine that arises in My Son and remains in His life. For blood by itself carries shameful crimes and turbulent injustice, and runs through uncertain paths, in a twisted sweetness that leads to burning lust and frightful vices, which choke innocence, increasing in appetite by what they feed on; all this by the temptation of that seducer the Devil.

And these three are one. For the spirit without the bloody material of the body is not the living person, and the bloody material of the body without the soul is not the living person; and these two are not strengthened unto life in the grace of the new Law except through the water of regeneration, or perfected in salvation as long as they are separated from this saving water. For then the transcendent honor of life is wanting to the person's reason; the redeemed must always make perfect praise resound in the presence of God, Who gave him that reason.

For God by His own will created Man for that honor, which is consummated in the body of His Son in eternal life; when lost Man lives again in the honor of life, redeemed in God by healing grace. And the spirit, which is invisible to bodily eyes, symbolizes the Father, Who is incomprehensible to every creature; and the water, which purges filth, symbolizes the Word, the Son of God, who by His Passion wiped out human stains; and the blood, which surrounds and warms people, is a symbol of the Holy Spirit, arousing and enkindling the brightest human virtues. So these three, the spirit and the water and the blood, are in one and one in three, and, as was said, one in salvation; and they signify the Trinity in Unity, and the Unity in Trinity. How?

The holy and heavenly Trinity gives heavenly testimony; It is not taken from something else but originates by sure faith in Itself. How? The Father testifies that before the ages He begot His one fruitful Word, through Whom all things were made; and then, at the appointed time, the Word gloriously flowered in the Virgin. The Word testifies that He went forth from the Father and stooped to enter a human nature, becoming incarnate in the purity of virginity. He went forth from the Father a Spirit and returned again to the Father in fruitful flesh; and so He stands in the middle, since He was invisibly begotten by the Father before time began, and conceived in the body within time by the Holy Spirit in the womb of the Virgin. And the Holy Spirit testifies that It quickened the intact Virgin so that she conceived the Word of God, and that It strengthened the doctrine of the same Word in tongues of flame, permeating the apostles so that they proclaimed the true Trinity throughout the world. How?

They cried aloud that God the Father had completed the work whereby He created Man for heavenly happiness, of which he was then robbed. Man was made from the mud of the earth to stand upright, but by his own will had bent down toward the earth again; but now by grace he is able to stand upright a second time through the incarnate Son of God. And, enlightened and confirmed by the Holy Spirit, so as not to perish in perdition but be saved in redemption, he has been restored to eternal glory.

9 On the distinction and unity of the Three Persons

Thus the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit testify that they are in no way disunited in power, even though they are distinguished in Persons, because they work together in the unity of the simple and immutable substance. How? The Father creates all things through the Word, Who is His Son in the Holy Spirit; the Son is He by Whom all things are perfected in the Father and the Holy Spirit; and the Holy Spirit is He by Whom all things flourish in the Father and the Son. And so these three Persons are in the unity of inseparable substance; but They are not indistinct among themselves. How? He Who begets is the Father; He Who is born is the Son; and He Who in eager freshness proceeds from the Father and the Son, and sanctified the waters by moving over their face in the likeness of an innocent bird, and streamed with ardent heat over the apostles, is the Holy Spirit.

For the Father had the Son before time began, and the Son was with the Father, and the Holy Spirit was co-eternal with the Father and the Son in the Unity of Divinity. Hence it must be seen that if one or two were lacking of these Three Persons, God would not be in fullness. How? They are one Unity of Divinity; and so, if any of Them were lacking, God would not be. For though these Persons are distinct, They are nonetheless one substance, whole and immutable and of indescribable beauty, and remain undivided in unity. How?

10 Three similes for the Trinity

Power, will and fire are the three peaks of a single height of work. How? The will is in the power, and the fire is in the will, and they are inseparable, like expelled human breath. How? The indivisible emission of human breath is the whirling air currents, the moisture and the warmth. So too is the complete human eye. How? The circuit of your eyesight has two transparent parts, but they form one housing for all that is within them. Hear and understand, O human.

VISION SEVEN

Even so there are Three Persons in one immutable essence of Divinity. In the Father is the Son, in both the Holy Spirit, and They are one, and work inseparably with each other; for the Father does not work without the Son, nor the Son without the Holy Spirit, nor the Holy Spirit without Them, nor the Father and the Son without the Holy Spirit, but They are undivided unity. Thus God is Three Persons, eternal before all ages; and the assumption of the flesh by the Son did not occur before the beginning of the world, but at the preordained time near the end of times when God sent His Son. And when the Son became incarnate and the virginal flower blossomed in her intact virginity, God was still in Three Persons and willed to be so invoked; and therefore, no Person was added to the ineffable Trinity, but the Son of God simply assumed flesh.

Hence also these Three Persons are one God in Divinity. And whoever does not believe this will be cast out of the Kingdom of God, for he tears himself away from the wholeness of Divinity in faith, as it is written:

II Words of the Book of Kings

“And on the third day there appeared a man who came out of Saul’s camp with his garments torn, and dust strewed on his head” [2 Kings 1:2]. This is to say: On the day when the Catholic faith arose by the manifestation of the Holy Trinity, humanity, which had now emerged from the camp of the army of death, broke out into many schisms and perversely sought what it was not possible for it to know. Therefore, seduced by the Devil’s artful persuasions, some now imagine that they are ascending above the heights, and choose to know more than they should about the incomprehensible Divinity. And therefore the garment of salvation and justice is torn from them, because they oppose God, and they are defiled by the strewing of divisions on the head of their faith. For they lack complete faith, but scatter among many sects the honor due solely to the Deity, and they diminish His high honor by mocking it in schisms. And so God will judge them all, as is clear from the following verses:

“And David said to the young man who told him, ‘Where do you come from?’ He answered, ‘I am the son of a stranger, an Amalekite.’ And David said to him, ‘Why did you not fear to put out your hand to kill the Lord’s anointed?’ And David called one of his servants and said to him, ‘Go near and fall upon him.' And he struck him so that he died. And David said to him, 'Your blood be upon your own head; for your mouth has spoken against you, saying "I have slain the Lord's anointed." ' ' [2 Kings 1:13-16].

This is to say: The Victorious One, incomprehensible to every creature, speaks to the childish and self-exalting ignorance of humanity, which tries to know what it should not know; for in its folly it accosts God and announces to Him with temerity, "Lord, I know You well!" And God answers it thus: "Where do you come from, who, having a beginning, seek to know the Whole, which lacks a beginning?" And the folly that has arisen in the creature with a beginning says, as if it knew: "I am the son of a stranger, who comes from the accursed land; for the first man fell by the taste of the fruit, and journeyed into exile from his country, and I am his descendant."

Then God says to him: "Because you are a person from the accursed land, driven out as an exile from your country, why did you not fear presumptuously to seek out what is not for you to know? This madness chokes your deeds and makes them unable to give hope, and approaches in wickedness to murder. For anyone who rashly searches out what God was before the creation of the world, or what God will do after the last day, is to be cut off from a share in the blessed communion, which is not to be known by a creature with a beginning who is in a state of sin. And so he will be miserable, torn away from the good knowledge that saves, because he obstinately sought out what he should not have sought out.

"And so you, who do these things with presumption and the cruelty of murder, are slaying within yourself the blessed understanding of King David's prophecy; for your soul should seek only pure knowledge, and believe faithfully in God with appropriate simplicity."

And then God commands the Jealousy of His pure justice, which has in it no spot of iniquity, and says to it in the righteous unity of His judgment: "Make haste and fall on him, and take from him the knowledge of good, which he had; let him never repose in any happiness of the senses, since he never prepared his heart for Me to repose in."

And so the blow of the Jealousy of the Lord strikes that creature, so that no spark of eyesight remains to him to see and know God. And so he dies to the justice of life-giving comfort, because he was not able to rule himself. And then God says to him, "Your bloody wickedness, by which you raise yourself to heights you cannot understand, recoil upon your own mind, which you unjustly raised against Me. May evil trample you underfoot in the mud, from which you cannot raise yourself to a right measure of faith, for you did not follow the right paths but sought division in your mind. May words of wisdom forsake your mouth, which spoke against your salvation when you deceitfully sought out the secret and incomprehensible Divinity, and presumed to know what is not to be known. You said rashly within yourself, 'I know well what God is!' and through this temerity you destroyed your inner salvation; you did not choose to believe in God with discretion, but proudly raised yourself against Him."

But let the one who has ears sharp to hear inner meanings ardently love My reflection and pant after My words, and inscribe them in his soul and conscience.

PILLAR OF THE SAVIOR'S HUMANITY

VISION EIGHT

The Pillar of the Humanity of the Savior

And then I saw, on the south side of the wall of the building beyond the pillar of the true Trinity, a great and shadowed pillar, which protruded both inside and outside the building; and it was so obscure to my sight that I could not tell its size or height. And between this pillar and the pillar of the true Trinity there was a gap three cubits wide in the wall, as mentioned above [p. 325]; only the foundation had been laid.

Thus this shadowed pillar was standing in the same place in the building where I had previously seen, in the celestial mysteries vouchsafed by God from above, a great four-sided radiance of brilliant purity [p. 109]. This radiance, which signifies the secrets of the supernal Creator, was shown to me in the greatest mystery; and in it, another radiance shone forth like dawn, with a deep purple light glowing in it, which was a mystical manifestation of the mystery of the incarnate Son of God. But in the pillar, there was an ascent like a ladder from bottom to top, on which I saw all the virtues of God descending and ascending, laden down with stones and going with keen zeal to their work.

And I heard that Shining One Who was seated on the throne say, "These are God's strongest labourers!" And among these virtues I saw seven in particular whose form and appearance I especially noted. They resembled each other in this. All of them, like all the other virtues described so far, were clad, as it were, in silk. All of them went with white hair and bare heads, and without a cloak except the first, who wore a woman's head-veil and a mantle like transparent crystal, and the second, who had black hair, and the third, whose form did not seem human. The first, fourth and fifth were wearing white tunics. All had white shoes except the third, who, as mentioned, did not seem to be in human form, and the fourth, who was wondrously shod in shoes of shining crystal.

And the differences among them were as follows. The first figure wore a gold crown on her head, with three higher prongs; it was radiantly adorned with green and red precious stones and white pearls. On her breast she had a shining mirror, in which appeared with wondrous brightness the image of the incarnate Son of God. And she said:

BOOK THREE

I Words of Humility

"I am the pillar of humble minds and the slayer of proud hearts. I began at the lowest point and ascended the steep slope to Heaven; but Lucifer raised himself above himself and fell beneath himself. Whoever wishes to imitate me and be my child and embrace me as a mother and carry out my work, let him start at the foundation and gradually mount upward from virtue to virtue, with a sweet and tranquil mind. For anyone who tries to ascend by taking hold of the highest branch of the tree first will more often than not swiftly fall. But anyone who begins his ascent at the root will not fall so easily, if he proceeds with caution."

And the second figure was a deep sky-blue like a hyacinth, both in person and in tunic. Into her tunic two stripes were marvellously woven and incomparably adorned with gold and gems, so that one stripe descended to the figure's feet over each shoulder in both front and back. And she said:

2 Words of Charity

"When Lucifer in Heaven devoured himself with hatred and pride, I was provoked to indignation. Oh! Oh! Oh! Humility would not tolerate this; and therefore he was cast into great ruin. But when the human race was created, oh! oh! oh! the noble Seed, and oh! oh! oh! the sweetest Offshoot, the Son of God, was born human at the end of times for the sake of humanity. Lucifer wanted and intended to rend my garment and my integrity, but I appeared as a most brilliant splendor in God and in Man. Nowadays the blind and the dead declare that the reality behind my name is brothels and harlots and incest; but just as filth cannot touch Heaven, this filthy accusation cannot touch my will. And so I will make myself wings of the other virtues, and cast out these harmful things Lucifer has scattered throughout the world. Where, O Virtues, is Lucifer? He is in Hell. So let us arise and draw nearer to the true Light, and build high and strong towers throughout all provinces; so that when the Last Day comes we may bear much fruit, both carnal and spiritual. And when the full number of the Gentiles has come in, then we too shall be perfect on earth and in Heaven. O shameful Lucifer, what did your hasty temerity avail you? In the primal splendor in which God created you, you raved and gave yourself over to madness, and tried to tread me underfoot and cast me out of Heaven; but you fell into the abyss and I stayed in Heaven, and later descended to earth in the incarnate Son of God. And through me is perfected the multitude of the faithful, armed with a thousand soldierly arts of justice and goodness; though, had you been able to, you would long since have snatched them away. O Humility, who lifts to the stars the oppressed and the crushed! O Humility, glorious queen of the virtues! What a strong and victorious protector you are to all who are yours! No one falls who loves you with a pure heart. And I too am a valuable and desirable defense to those who are mine; for I am very slender and subtle, and I seek out in those who revere me the smallest openings, and deeply penetrate them."

The third figure I saw in the same form as I had seen her in my previous vision: greater and taller of stature than the other virtues, and non-human in form. She was covered with eyes all over her body, for she lived wholly in wisdom; she wore a shadowy garment through which the eyes could look out. And she trembled in fear before the Shining One seated on the throne. And she said:

3 Words of Fear

"Oh, woe to the miserable sinners who do not fear God but hold Him as an impostor! Who can evade fear of the incomprehensible God, Who allows the wicked who do evil to perish? Therefore I will fear the Lord God much and much. Who will help me in the presence of the true God? And who shall deliver me from His fearsome judgment? No one at all, except God Himself. Therefore I will seek Him, and fly to Him for refuge."

And the fourth was wearing a snow-white chain around her neck, and her hands and feet were chained together with white fetters. And she said:

4 Words of Obedience

"I cannot run in secular paths according to my will, or be infected by human desire; but I choose to return to God the Father of all, Whom the Devil rejected and chose to disobey."

And the fifth had a red chain around her neck. And she said:

5 Words of Faith

"God is One, to be adored in Three Persons of one substance and equal glory. Therefore I will have faith and confidence in the Lord, and never blot out His name from my heart."

And the sixth was clad in a pale-colored tunic. Before her in the air was the cross of the Passion of the crucified Son of God; and toward it she raised her eyes and hands with great devotion. And she said:

6 Words of Hope

"Spare those who sin, O loving Father! You have not forsaken the exiles, but have raised them up upon Your shoulders. And so we do not perish, who have hope in You."

BOOK THREE

And the seventh was dressed in a tunic more brilliant and pure than crystal, which shone resplendent like water when the sun reflects from it. And a dove was poised over her head, facing her with its wings spread as if to fly. In her womb, as if in a clear mirror, appeared a pure infant, on whose forehead was written "Innocence"; and in her right hand she held a royal scepter, but she had laid her left hand on her breast. And she said:

7 Words of Chastity

"I am free and not fettered, for I have passed through the pure Fountain Who is the sweet and loving Son of God. I have passed through Him, and I have come forth from Him. And I tread underfoot the Devil with his limitless pride, who has not prevailed to fetter me. He is alien from me, because I am always in the Heavenly Father."

Now at the summit of the shadowed pillar I saw another beautiful figure, standing bareheaded; it had curly black hair, and a manly face so ardently bright that I could not look on it clearly like a human one. It was clad in a tunic of purple and black, with a stripe of red over one shoulder and a stripe of yellow over the other, which fell to its feet in front and back. Around its neck it had a bishop's stole, wonderfully adorned with gold and precious gems. But a pure radiance so surrounded it that I could not look at it, except from head to foot in front; its arms and hands and feet were concealed from my sight. And that radiance around it was full of eyes on all sides, and was all alive, changing its form like a cloud and becoming now wider and now narrower. And the figure cried with a loud voice in the world, and said to humanity:

8 Words of the Grace of God, to admonish humans

"I am the Grace of God, my little children; therefore hear and understand me, for my admonition makes radiant the souls of those who do. I keep them in blessedness, so that they will not return to iniquity. And because they have not despised me, I choose to touch them with my admonition so that they will do good works; those, that is, who seek me in simplicity and purity of heart.

"So I admonish and exhort humanity, and grant it pearls of goodness; when a person's mind is touched by me, I am his beginning. That is to say, when a person understands my admonition with his sense of hearing, and his senses consent to my touching his mind, I initiate good in him. And it is needful that he begin thus, with me helping him. Then a struggle follows: Will my gift attain its end or not? How? Understand thus. When I admonish a person, so that he begins to lament and weep for his sins, then if his will consents to my admonition—for he will feel the change in his mind, and according to his mind's desire he will raise his eyes to see and his ears to hear and his mouth to speak and his hands to touch and his feet to walk—his mind will raise itself to conquer his senses, so that they will learn things their habits could not teach them. How?

“They will change themselves, for they must, though unwillingly, follow the will that is set over them. They are subject to it in service, being its inferiors; they will follow it, willing or not. Thus I initiate good, and kindle it in the mind, and give the will work to accomplish; and this I do by admonition, exhortation and the fire of the breath of the Holy Spirit. But if the will resists these gifts, all that I have mentioned comes to naught. And therefore, while a person can still make a start, inflamed by the pre-eminent gifts that come from me, let him hasten to do so; let his will quickly come to good and end its work in splendor.

“For this is why Man has the knowledge of good and evil, that he himself in all his works may know God better by avoiding evil and doing good. For thus he worships God with fear and embraces Him with perfect charity. How? Thus: by opening the inner eyes of the spirit to good, and denying and cutting off the evil that the outer person can do. And so the earthly creation is subject to his power, that he may understand and love God the more, and with that understanding do in Him the work of his knowledge; by which knowledge he fears and loves the Almighty, Who has given him this great honor of having the creatures serve him. Thus Man must wisely distinguish between the creatures, knowing which are to be loved and hated, which are useful and which are useless; and thus all his works will be concluded in faith, through which he understands God, and pleases God and His angels.

“And sometimes I touch a person's mind to warn him to begin to work justice and avoid evil, but he disdains me and thinks he can do what he wants. He postpones the time of repentance until his body is reduced to old age enough to obey him, and he is so old he is tired of sinning. And then I admonish and urge him again to do good and resist in his mind. If he ignores me, he is often brought to the pass of doing good as it were unwillingly and in spite of himself, by monetary and other troubles that come upon him. And, with his mind thus troubled, he has little delight in doing what he planned to do when he was prosperous and unopposed, when he thought he could act as and when he pleased. And such a person receives me in doubt; but yet I choose not to forsake him, for though it was thus he received me, he did not wholly despise me. And so I do not labor vainly in him.

“For I do not find it loathsome to touch ulcerated wounds surrounded by the filthy, gnawing worms that are innumerable vices, stinking with evil report and infamy, and stagnating in habitual wickedness. I do not refuse to close them gently up, drawing forth from them the devouring poison of malice, by touching them with the mild fire of the breath of the Holy Spirit. But often, such a wound grows hardened by old irritation, so that sin grows hot and burning in the person's mind; and in the clotted mass of this filth new wounds of sin appear, swelling and rising from the defilement of worms and the application of dark muck, from which come the deadly poisons of scorpions, serpents, frogs and other poisonous vermin. And such wounds become as hardened as stone, a hardness no one dares try to break open. These things burden such people with insupportable loads; and what happens then? People of little faith cannot believe it is possible for such a one to be converted to God from his iniquity; they see him as already food for the Devil. But I will not forsake this person; I choose, by my help and action, to be on his side in the struggle. I start by gently touching the strong and stony crust of his sin, which is so hard to break, for it stinks so vilely of horrible crimes, which have caused his great filth and wickedness and are like a rotting corpse and the food of the Devil; and he has certainly swallowed them into his stomach. How? The Scripture states that the Son of God said, 'My food is to do the will of My Father' [John 4:34]; and so the opposite is the Devil's food, by which he pulls people down into death, inspiring those who consent to his will and turn aside to follow him. And this is the desire and the continual study of the Devil, for from this filth all evil arises.

"But many of these people recognize me. How? When I begin to touch them, one of them may say to himself, 'What is happening to me? I know nothing of good and am incapable of thinking of it.' And then, in his ignorance, he sighs and says, 'Alas for me, a sinner!' But he feels nothing more, because he is weighed down by his huge weight of sin, and the darkness of iniquity troubles him. Then I touch his wounds again. And, having been admonished by me before, he understands me better this time, and looks at himself, saying, 'Woe is me! What shall I do? I do not know and cannot think what will become of me for my many sins. Oh, where shall I turn, and to whom shall I flee, who can help me cover over my shameful crimes and efface them by repentance?'

"And again he looks at himself, with the same turbulence that formerly propelled him into sin; and then he turns to true repentance, with a desire as great as his former eagerness to sin. And as this person, by my warning, thus wakes from the sleep of death, which he had preferred to life, he no longer desires to sin by thought, word or deed, which before were ardently directed toward crime. And in strong repentance he rises to me; and I wholly receive him, and from henceforward discharge him as free. He will no longer be troubled by the aforesaid things, which I use to warn my dearest children to hold out against the fiery arrows of the Devil's persuasion; for he no longer needs them. For he will always sorrow at the sins he has committed, and in his self-scorn he will do such severe penance that he will deem himself unworthy to be called human. And this victory comes out of the stench of those filthy people, whom I choose not to cast out; for after sinning they have sought me. I am prepared to do anything they ask for those who do not spurn me but receive my admonition and devoutly seek me. But those who despise and reject me are dead, and I do not know them.

“For there are many people who, feeling my presence and understanding that my admonition has touched their minds, fly from me by the evil ways of the sins they conceive, which they have swallowed by their choice, consent and deeds. And therefore they are to God as nothing, with no being at all, since they choose not to know what they can do when I touch them. I do not want to be near the pollution of those sinners, who will not receive my admonition or purify themselves by my exhortation and turn from their sins; they do not desire to eat that food which is the Scripture of the Gospel, with which all the faithful should be satisfied, or to taste the gift of its savor. They flee from the Grace of God; for they do not want to see or hear or think of what they should do when goodness admonishes them. They flee the good admonition like a worm burrowing into the earth. The worm hides itself from all the beauty of the world; and so do the wicked, flying from the commands of God and wrapping themselves in ordure, pollution and death, and hiding in it, afraid to come out of the stench of evil into the light. Such as these do not belong to me, for I do not choose to be apportioned here and there amid the mire. How? I choose to be with those who understand me and repent in purity; and then I join myself to human corruption in order to purge it. But those who refuse to receive me I cast from me, choosing not to be with them; I have no part with them, for their part is that of stupid folly, which will not hear me. And I have no wish to take part in the work that builds up the obdurate perversity that ends in death.

“And those who spurn me thus imitate the lost angel, who saw God but did not want to contemplate and humbly acknowledge Him; and thus suddenly fled from heavenly glory and, trying to gain equal honor with God, fell into death. These people despise me because their deeds are wicked and their pleasures call for illicit carnal desires. And because they despise me, they do what they will. They set little value on God, and so neglect His command. And therefore, I often condemn them in my indignation to do their full will, and so the life of eternal happiness eludes them as if they counted for nothing. And often they fall short in happiness both in this life and in the life to come, because they are hard and unmoved by the happiness that comes from good. For I forsake the obstinate sinner who perseveres in his evil deeds, but I impart life to one who looks at himself and in pure repentance turns to me from his sins.

“For I am the firmly founded pillar, and I never forsake one who seeks me; one who understands me and intimately and faithfully unites with me will never fall into perdition. But one who forgets me in his mind and in his pride raises himself above me is trusting in himself rather than me; he scorns to have faith in me, counting the Grace of God as nothing. I inhabit his mind like a whirlwind, but he regards me with careless mockery, desperately exalting himself in pride. And because of his pride, not because of the gravity of his sins, he mocks me thus: "What is the Grace of God?" And I will cast him down and slay him and never raise him up by my choice; for he is dead to eternal joy.

"And people who do not have confidence that they can rise from a grave state of sin reject Almighty God and His grace; they despair miserably as if they cannot be saved from the enormity of their crimes, and so they fail and are rejected by me. And they run bitterly into death, and live their eternal death in the lowest part of Hell.

"But now I shall speak of my beloved children, who receive me with open senses and willing mind and clear intellect, and touch me with sighs and tears, and follow me with joy to embrace me. O my flowers, who when they feel my presence rejoice in me, and I in them! They are more sweet and pleasant to me than precious stones and pearls to the people who most fervently desire them. They are to me, indeed, the finest cut stones; for in my sight they are always lovable. I will polish and refine them without ceasing, that they may rightly and fitly be placed in the heavenly Jerusalem, for in their minds they are always feasting with me in goodwill, never sated with my justice. When they feel my touch, they hasten to me like the hart to the water-brook. I often withdraw from them, so that it seems to them that they are without help; this I do that their outer person may not be puffed up with pride. Then they weep aloud and lament, thinking I am offended with them; but it is thus I scrutinize their faith.

"And I still hold them with a strong hand, taking away their pride and forcing them to be ignorant of what they are in their secret good deeds; for thus I will to produce in them the fruits of grief and sorrow. And sometimes I let the Devil try to seduce them with the fiery arrows of impurity and burning fornication, which wound their frail bodies; this I permit that they may be imbued with the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, and so become great messengers, glorious in virtue. They are tested like gold in the furnace, tried by mockery and provocation and set at naught; very often they will be stripped of their substance by robbers, and torn like lambs by wolves in the adversities of popular dissensions. But as sheep scattered by the wolf do not die, so these people do not perish in soul but live more fully, purified by their troubles. For a good tree is watered and pruned and dug about that it may bear fruit, and worms are removed from it lest they eat the fruit. What then?

"Let good people, then, not grow hardened or embittered toward God's justice; let them be mild and prepared to receive every good, cutting off evil from themselves and scrutinizing their works so as to repel the hurtful attacks of their enemies. For before a person feels me in his mind and his intellect knows that I am within him, I am his Head, planting fruitfulness and power within him; I establish in him the strength of the city built on the firm rock. Let every faithful person therefore hear me saying to him:

“O human! Is it proper and fitting that a rational person should be mindless like an irrational beast, which does nothing but what it wants? O wretched people, who refuse to know the great glory that God gave them when He made them in His likeness! But they cannot have their wish and freely do all the evil they desire by right, as if their bodily nature gave them permission; they forget that they have that nature so that they can do good. God in His ordinances established all things justly; and who can oppose Him? What then? Can anyone compare himself with God’s ordinance, or compete with Him in wisdom or discretion about anything? And why then do they wish to give up the ability that was given them to act rightly or wrongly? How? When I warn those who understand me with my touch, and they feel my presence, by my help they can carry out their good desires; but those who despise me fall into weakness and evil. But the wicked try to excuse themselves, and claim they cannot do good works, so that they can freely work the will of their outer persons.

“So now, my dearest children, sweeter in fragrance to me than spices, hear me admonishing you. While you have time to do good and evil, worship your God with true devotion. Again, O my dearest children, who are rising like the dawn, and who must burn in charity like the sun; run and make haste, dearest ones, in the way of truth, which is the light of the world, Jesus Christ, the Son of God, Who redeemed you in the last days by His blood so that when you die you may joyfully attain to Him.”

And again I heard the One Who was seated on the throne saying to me:

“Those who desire heavenly things must faithfully believe, but not wrongfully examine, the Son of God’s being sent into the world by the Father and born of the Virgin. For the human mind, weighed down by the frail mortal flesh and the grave burden of sin, cannot know the secrets of God, beyond what the Holy Spirit reveals to those It wills.”

9 The humanity of the Savior appears in the works of the faithful people

So, in a mystical mystery, the pillar you see on the south side of the wall of the building beyond the pillar of the true Trinity signifies the humanity of the Savior, Who was conceived by the Holy Spirit and born of the sweet Virgin, the Son of the Most High; for He is the strong pillar of sanctity and holds up the whole edifice of the Church. His humanity is manifested in the ardent faith of its stones, which are the faithful people who work hard by the goodness of the Supernal Father when the Trinity has been revealed to them. For when the Trinity in One God was made known to the believing people, the belief also appeared that the incarnate Word of God must be worshipped as true God with the Father and the Holy Spirit in the unity of the divinity of the One True God.

BOOK THREE

- 10 The Incarnation, shadowy to the mind, is known to faith and works

It is a great and shadowed pillar, which protrudes both inside and outside the building. For the great and incomprehensible holiness of the true Incarnation is so obscure to human minds that it cannot be contemplated, except insofar as it can be done by faith. It can be understood in faith and works by those who labor in the divine cult, that is, inside the building; and those who stand idle outside can know it by words and sounds.

And it is so obscure to your sight that you cannot tell its size or height. For My Son came among humans in the mortality of the flesh to undergo death for the people, and thus was in shadow because He was mortal; but He came without any spot of sin, so that His true incarnation exceeds all the power of the human intellect, incomprehensible in the mystical greatness of God's mysteries and incalculable in the might of His divine power.

- 11 God alone knows who and how many will make up the body of Christ

And between this pillar and the pillar of the true Trinity there is a gap three cubits wide in the wall, as mentioned above. This is to say that the incarnate Son of God, Who is true God with the Father and the Holy Spirit, is now inherent in His members; that is, the faithful people who will be born up till the end of the world and made members of their Head through living works, as miraculously and symbolically you were shown above. But who, how many and what kind of people they will be in the long ages to come, who will adore the Trinity in the Unity of Divinity with faithful and devout worship, resides in the mystery of the ineffable Trinity; for the place of those yet to be born is empty, and the wall of their good works has not yet been built.

But the foundation has been laid, which is to say that they are in God's foreknowledge, and the faith that will save them is already strongly established; and so Man must not hope and trust in anyone except God, and never despair of His mercy, since He is the strong foundation of the faithful soul.

VISION EIGHT

12 All the works of the Son and the Church are in the Father's will

But this shadowed pillar is standing in the same place in the building where you had previously seen, in the celestial mysteries vouchsafed by God from above, a great four-sided radiance of brilliant purity. This radiance, which signifies the secrets of the supernal Creator, was shown to you in the greatest mystery. This is to say that the incarnate Son of God did all His works and suffered all His injuries in the body in the world according to the Father's secret will. That great radiance expresses this, in that its four-sidedness is a symbol of God's mysteries; for many who are born in the four corners of the world are to attain to the knowledge of Christ. So does its brilliant purity, for no darkness can obscure the lucent Divinity; and so here the nature of the supernal and glorious Majesty, the Creator, Who made everything in His profound and mysterious knowledge, is revealed to you in symbols. Thus you see that no one helped that Creator, and no one resisted and opposed Him; He created everything through His Word by His will and goodness. So in it another radiance shines forth like dawn, with a deep purple light glowing in it, which is a mystical manifestation of the mystery of the incarnate Son of God. For thus God displays in His secret places the purity of the dawn, which is to say the Virgin Mary, who bore in her womb the Son of the Celestial Father. And the Son shed His purple blood, which glowed with the light of salvation, so that by this secret vision, the Incarnation of the Son is shown to you in mystical obscurity.

13 In Christ all virtues work fully and are openly manifested

But in the pillar, there is an ascent like a ladder from bottom to top. This is to say that in the incarnate Son of God all the virtues work fully, and that He left in Himself the way of salvation; so that faithful people both small and great can find in Him the right step on which to place their foot in order to ascend to virtue, so that they can reach the best place to exercise all the virtues. How? In the fine places which are good hearts, the virtues join in the holy work of perfecting the Son of God in His members, the people who are His elect. And so in Him is the example of perfection for all the faithful who concern themselves with the law of God and try to ascend from good to better. They see the manifestation of the true Incarnation, in which the Son of God was truly shown in the flesh; and that is where the certain ascent to the heavenly places is to be found. Therefore, you see all the virtues of God descending and ascending, laden down with stones; for in God's Only-Begotten the lucent virtues descend in His Humanity and ascend in His Divinity.

BOOK THREE

They descend through Him to the hearts of the faithful, who with good heart and eagerness leave their own will and betake themselves to righteous deeds, as a workman bends down to lift a stone that he must carry to a building site. And they ascend through Him when they offer to God the heavenly works that people have done with rejoicing, that the body of Christ may be perfected as quickly as possible in His faithful members. And so they carry stones to the higher places; these are the winged and shining deeds people do, with their help, to win salvation. For each action is given wings by God to rise above the filth of the human mind and gain bright splendor with which to shine before God; for what flows from the fountain of eternal life cannot be obstructed or hidden. And as a fountain should not be concealed, but in plain sight, so that everyone who thirsts may come to it and draw water and drink, so too the Son of God is not obstructed or hidden from the elect, but is in plain sight, preparing to requite all deeds and show by just rewards which ones are done for the sake of His will. Therefore let the faithful person walk to God in his faith and seek His mercy, and it will be given to him. But those who do not seek it will not find it, as a fountain does not flow for people who know of it but do not come to it. They have to approach it if they want to draw its water. Thus let Man do. Let him approach God through the law God established for him, and he shall find Him, and the bread of life and the water of salvation will be given to him, that he may no longer hunger or thirst. Therefore, these virtues are going with keen zeal to their work; for they run zealously to their divine labor like torrents of water, that the members of Christ may shine brighter than the sun and be nobly perfected in splendor and united to their Head. And therefore, as you have heard, they are called God's strongest laborers, because they are always active in the good deeds of the faithful.

14 The seven virtues represent the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit

And among these virtues you see seven in particular whose form and appearance you especially note. This is to say that among all virtuous deeds these seven virtues best designate the seven fiery gifts of the Holy Spirit. For it was by the overshadowing of the Holy Spirit that the glorious Virgin conceived the Son of God without sin, sanctified by these holy virtues; they were clearly shown in God's Only-Begotten and illumine the hearts of the faithful as if in His form. And by this appearance they take their place in the unity of faith, as My servant Isaiah testifies, saying:

15 Words of Isaiah

"And there shall come forth a branch out of the root of Jesse; and a flower shall rise up out of his root. And the Spirit of the Lord will rest upon him; the spirit of wisdom and of understanding, the spirit of counsel and of fortitude, the spirit of knowledge and of piety; and the spirit of the fear of the Lord shall fill him" [Isaiah 11:1-3]. This is to say: The Virgin Mary came forth from the troubles of earthly oppression into the sweetness of moral life, as a person might come forth from a house in which he was imprisoned, not by rising above the roof but by walking in the designated path; or as a trickle of wine is pressed from the winepress, not by spurting up above the winepress but by flowing gently down in its proper channel. And why a branch? Because it is not thorny in its manner, or knotted with worldly desires, but straight, unconnected with carnal lusts; arisen, therefore, from the root of Jesse, who was the foundation of the royal race from which the stainless mother had her origin. And so from the root of that branch arose the sweet fragrance of the Virgin's intact fecundity; and when it had so arisen, the Holy Spirit inundated it so that the tender flower was born from her. How? Like a flower born in a field though its seed was not sown there, the Bread of Heaven arose in her without originating in a mingling with a man and without any human burden; it was born in the sweetness of divinity, untouched by unworthy sin, without the knowledge and utterly without the influence of the devious serpent. Hence this Flower deceived the serpent; He ascended on high and lifted up with Him the sinful human race, which the serpent had seduced and drawn down with him into perdition. And because this Flower was the Son of God, the Spirit of the Lord rested upon Him; which is to say, the Spirit of the eternal Divinity. How?

When Humility was exalted by the ascent of the Flower, scorn and disaster overtook Pride; for the first woman had listened to it when she strove to know more than she should have, but the second woman submitted to God's service and confessed Him, acknowledging herself to be small and humble. And so the Holy Spirit ardently rested on Him in Whom was hidden the surpassing charity that saved the lost people and effaced human crime and wickedness. For the fullness of sanctity was in Him, and the living light shone upon Him, and that light withered the fruit of sin and the evils that followed from it; and in that light the dead were healed, and the banner that conquered and destroyed death was raised. Sanctity was completely fulfilled in Him, because He was conceived with no mixture of sin, unlike human children who are born in many different sins. And when that Flower breathed forth a perfume of justice by deed and word, the Holy Spirit brought forth its fruit in fullness; for the Son of God, now clothed in flesh, clearly showed in His deeds what in time past the Holy Spirit had awakened in human minds by Its inspiration mystically and secretly.

The Holy Spirit is said to have rested on the Flower in a sevenfold manner, as God created all things through His Word in the Holy Spirit and on the seventh day rested from His work. But these gifts go in pairs in their meaning; for body and soul are joined together in twofold love by the unction of the Holy Spirit, yet should work as one in fear of the Lord, since fear venerates charity with trembling and adores One above all. And so the Spirit of the Lord is known by the strong virtues that shine forth from It, as branches grow out from a root; so also there is one God from Whom all good things come and through Whom all things are wisely disposed. And, since the Spirit of the Lord rested upon that Flower, the spirit of wisdom was also with Him; for where the Spirit of the Lord was present, wisdom could not be lacking.

And so the spirit of wisdom and understanding was in Him; for when God created all things by His Word, great wisdom appeared, for it was so diffused in the Word that He was Wisdom. That Word was invisible when He was not yet incarnate, but when He was incarnate, He became visible; the Word, Who was in the heart of the Father before all creatures, by Whom all things were made and without Whom nothing was made that was made, shone forth within time as a Flower, visible as a human being and offering good understanding to all humans by His words. What then? Understanding and wisdom should go together; for Man was created by God with wisdom and should worthily have understood his Creator. Thus, before the Virgin Birth, God was to be understood as God without qualification; and after the Virgin Birth, which brought forth the Flower in the flesh, he was to be understood with amazement as both God and Man. And thus what was previously invisible to the intellect became visible and was seen in the Flower; for He was the tangible reason why Man can now understand God in His actions. How? When a person wisely worships his God, his wisdom is the origin of good works. And understanding follows; for when a person does a good work through wisdom, that work shines forth to others, and they apprehend with joy the sweet scent and taste it has because of him.

And in this virginal Flower counsel follows understanding; for Man, who had understanding, had to be freed by divine counsel. Therefore the spirit of counsel and of fortitude rested upon Him; for the Father held the counsel outside of time that His Word would be incarnate within time, perfecting all His works according to the Father's will and showing in Himself obedience, so that when it shone on people through Him they might learn to imitate Him in their actions.

And so, in the great virtue arising from His Divinity, fortitude arose; but by counsel it lay concealed in Him, that it might the more strongly vanquish the Devil. How? Fortitude rightly follows counsel; for God's counsel destroyed the kingdom of the Devil through the fortitude of His Son. The Son of God, the strong Lion, crushed fatal infidelity by the shining light of faith; for it is by great fortitude that people believe through counsel what they cannot see with their bodily sight. What does this mean? Counsel united to fortitude pierces the hardness of stony hearts obdurate in their evil habits; it so overrides that senseless hardness that the work of the flesh is abandoned and the work of God fittingly performed. And so, in the aforesaid Flower, knowledge accompanies fortitude; for, by the fortitude God gives them, people attain to the knowledge of Him. And in His supernal sweetness, the spirit of piety resided in Him along with the spirit of knowledge. For He knowingly has compassion on human miseries, and is the hope by which people enter into salvation; and He knowingly wiped out the sin of the world in great piety by His death. What then?

Piety is rightly linked with knowledge; for the Son of God fulfilled the will of His Father knowingly and in great piety. For He, the only Son, born of the Virgin, scattered among the peoples the seed of heavenly virtue; and so He made it possible for them to follow the company of the angels in the modesty of chastity, since this virtue arose in supernal piety. And so, in the branch that came forth from Jesse, the virtues of this Flower put forth buds. The first woman had fled from these virtues by consenting to the counsel she heard from the serpent, and the whole human race fell in her and was cut off from supernal joy and glory; but the blossoming of this branch uplifted the human race in knowledge through piety to the holiness of salvation. How? The fortitude that conquers the Devil and is joined to knowledge is inspired by the Holy Spirit when faithful people devoutly acknowledge God with ardent desire and embrace Him eagerly in the very depths of their souls.

And in the virginal Flower piety is followed by fear of the Lord; for when the faithful have piety, they fear the Lord in order to fulfil His commands. And so the fear of the Lord filled that Flower. For He Himself was so full of virtues that there was no room in Him for deathly pride or pleasure in honor or transgression of the Law; he was completely full of fear of the Lord, and never sought what was not His like the first of the angels and Adam, but honored his Father in all His works and offered Him fitting obedience. And thus the fear of the Lord is the beginning of all justice, for it is the end and the beginning of the other virtues; as the seventh day of rest was both the end and the origin of all the creatures. How? Fear releases trembling, and trembling stimulates the growth of the buds of fruitful virtues. And therefore this Flower is full of fear of the Lord; for all the buds of good works are attached to Him and draw their material from Him. And the Flower gives fruitfulness in all virtues, filled as He is beyond all others with their fruit and able to perfect all good things, as the Scripture says of Him:

16 Words of Solomon

“As the apple tree among the trees of the woods, so is my beloved among the children. I sat down under the shadow of him whom I desired; and his fruit was sweet to my palate" [Song of Songs 2:3]. Which is to say: The Son of the Virgin is the sweet Lover in chaste affection; and the faithful soul grasps Him to crown her integrity with His sweet embrace, renouncing an earthly husband. She unites herself to Christ, loves Him with binding certainty and regards Him in the mirror of faith. He is the most beautiful fruit of the fruitful tree; which is to say that the Son of the Virgin comes forth from virginal modesty as its fruit, giving refreshing food to those who hunger and sweet drink to those who thirst. And thus He excels all the trees of the woods, which is to say the human children who are conceived and live in sin, not yielding the fruit He yielded; for He came from God bearing the fruit of the sweetness of life, while others have no fruit or fecundity of their own, but only that derived from Him. How? He gave salvation to the world through his Incarnation; he appeared as the beloved Son of God among the sons of men, who through His fervor flourished and bore fruit, but were not fruitful with His great fullness. For He came from God, all-holy, and was born of a virgin. And why is He beloved? Because he treads underfoot whatever obstructs the faithful soul, which is hastening to the heavenly places.

And therefore the faithful soul most rightly calls Him beloved; for she denies herself in faithful love, and strives after Him with devotion, struggling against carnal pleasures and rebuking herself for her desires. And she is close to Him, like a wife to a husband whom she married willingly and joyfully. And so, when she begins to keep herself chaste and sigh for the Son of God, she says to herself, "I want to overthrow carnal desire and unite with this Bridegroom; He has fired me with ardent desire for Him and so kept me from the opposite fire, and under the shadow of His love I sit down." How? "Because my desire is inflamed by His love, my soul consents to my keeping down the fiery love of the flesh. And therefore His sweetest fruit, which I tasted in my soul when I sighed for God, is sweeter to me than all the sweetness of carnal delights I used to feel." And why sweet? Because He was born of the Virgin, and so has the sweetest savor and the strongest unguent, which He distils like balsam; which is the resurrection unto life, by which the dead have been raised. And that unguent has the healing in it that through His incarnation cleanses the wounds of sin; for the Incarnation is full of sanctity and sweetness and all the virtues of virginity.

Therefore, O Virginity, which by the ardent enkindling produced the greatest fruit, which shone in the star of the sea and fights the savage darts of the Devil and despises all shameful filth, rejoice in celestial harmony and hope for the company of angels. How? The Holy Spirit makes music in the tabernacle of Virginity; for she always thinks of how to embrace Christ in full devotion. She burns for love of Him and forgets the human frailties, which burn with carnal desire; she is joined to the One Husband Whom sin never touched, without any lust of the flesh, but flowering perpetually with Him in the joy of the regal marriage.

17 On the appearance and dress of the aforesaid virtues and what it means

So, now, you see a resemblance in the aforesaid virtues: All of them, like all the other virtues described so far, are clad, as it were, in silk. This is to say that each of these shining lights in its own rank prepares a devout unanimity in human minds; and, like the rest of the virtues in God, they have soft garments, which is to say gentleness and affection in judging holy souls and an absence of the thorns or hardness of vice. Some of them go with white hair and bare heads, and without a cloak; which is to say that the virtues, which are joined in pure innocence in human minds, are without a veil of evil habits, and are not surrounded by worldly leanings, but entirely flee the influence of vice.

But the first wears a woman's head-veil and a mantle like transparent crystal; for she wears the chains of humble subjection to God and throws down the pride of the Devil with supernal care. She cleaves to the merciful Head, Who is Christ, and imitates in lucent purity that humble and pure Priest; and so she is without any taint of sins, restrained and humble and pure as befits the priests of that Most High Priest.

And the second has black hair; which clearly shows that through Christ her Head she cleanses the blackness of human sins.

And the third seems to have a non-human form; for her function is to alarm people and make them tremble in terror. And therefore she does not have a human appearance; for humans often disregard God and forget to fear Him, and she never does.

The first, fourth and fifth are wearing white tunics. For they are surrounded by the garment of innocence, which Adam lost when he transgressed the righteous command; it was recovered for salvation in the white Lily, Which flowered from virginity, Who assumed the work of obedience to God. And that work shines before God as the brightest star in the sky to human eyes.

All have white shoes, except the third, who, as mentioned, does not seem to be in human form. For these virtues are the most beautiful deeds of humans, who nullify in themselves the desires of the flesh, following the most splendid example of their Savior. But one does not resemble a human being, because a human is often careless and forgets himself in arrogance, but she is always careful and never takes refuge in audacity; and so she is the dispenser of just warnings, that the faithful may carefully heed God's judgment. And the fourth is wondrously shod in shoes of shining crystal; for she constrains herself by her own will to pursue the shining path of Christ, and chokes death within her by the ardent flame of the Holy Spirit.

But there are differences among these virtues; which is to say that, though they are unanimous in their desire, they work diverse works in people.

18 Humility and her appearance

So the first figure designates Humility, who first manifested the Son of God when God, Who holds heaven and earth in His power, did not disdain to send His Son into the world. Thus she wears a gold crown on her head, with three higher prongs, because she surpasses and sweetly precedes the other virtues, and so is crowned with the gold crown of the precious and resplendent Incarnation of the Savior. For He adorned her head with this mystery when He became incarnate. The crown is triangular, for the Trinity is in the Unity and the Unity in the Trinity; the Son with the Father and the Holy Spirit is One True God, excelling all things in the height of Divinity. It is radiantly adorned with green and red precious stones and white pearls. For the Humanity of the Savior manifests the high and profound goodness of His works; the Son of God wrought them in the greenness of the blossoming of the virtues in His teachings, and in the redness of His blood when He suffered death on the cross to save humanity, and in the whiteness of His resurrection and ascension. And with all of these the Church is lighted and adorned, like an object set with precious stones.

And on her breast she has a shining mirror, in which appears with wondrous brightness the image of the incarnate Son of God. This is to say that in Humility, who stands in the heart of the sacred temple in blessed and shining knowledge, gratefully and humbly but splendidly and permanently, there shines forth the Only-Begotten of God, in all the works He performed in the body in which He showed Himself to the world. And so the noblest impulses of the hearts of the faithful elect are sealed by this figure, who sets up her tribunal in them and rules and directs all their actions. For she is the solid foundation of all human good deeds, as she shows in the maternal admonition already quoted.

19 Charity and her appearance

And the second figure designates Charity; for, after the Humility with which the Son of God deigned to become incarnate, the true and ardent lamp of Charity was lighted when God so loved humanity that for its love He sent His Only-Begotten to take a human body. She is a deep sky-blue like a hyacinth, both in person and in tunic; for through His humanity, the incarnate

VISION EIGHT

Son of God enlightened faithful and heavenly people, as a hyacinth illumines any object on which it is put down. And so He inflamed them with Charity that they might faithfully assist all the needy, and this virtue is clothed with the tunic of God's sweetness that she may shine upon all people with true light for their devotion, use and profit.

Therefore, into her tunic two stripes are marvellously woven and incomparably adorned with gold and gems. These are the two commandments of Charity, which issue from the sweetness of God; they are adorned with His good and noble will as if with gold, and by just works as if by bright gems, by the wonderful gift of the Supreme Giver. So that one stripe descends to the figure's feet over each shoulder in both front and back; for she carries those commandments very carefully, the one regarding God as on her right shoulder and the one regarding one's neighbor as on her left. As Scripture says, "You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your strength and with all your mind; and your neighbor as yourself" [Luke 10:27]. This is to say:

You should love the Lord your God, Who is your Lord because He has dominion over every creature, and Who is your God because He has no beginning but only is, the Creator of all things. For the sake of the love of Him in your heart, you should overcome and throw down your material body, which is exceedingly hard to do, because if the flesh has been conquered, the spirit will reign in you, and then you will understand God in your soul. And then you will wisely keep His commandments, and not fulfil them grudgingly. And thus all the powers of your soul and body will be subject to God; for when the first victory is gained in your body, you will understand God securely in your mind in everything you propose to do. For He is a firm bulwark for you against the snares of your enemies, so that no enemy can surpass His strength; and your mind should contain these things, to confirm and consolidate everything you do.

You shall therefore do these things with all your heart, and all your soul, and all your strength, and all your mind, that nothing may be wanting to you in faith, and you may not consent to anything contrary to God; you shall not waste yourself in matters alien to Him, but collect yourself in the sweetness of His love. You shall also love yourself. How? If you love God, you love your salvation. And, loving yourself in all this, you shall also love your neighbor, who is each faithful person who is joined to you by the Christian name and faith; you shall rejoice in his righteous prosperity and heavenly salvation, and his steadfast preservation in faith, in the same way you rejoice in your own salvation.

And this therefore is the double work of Charity in humans, descending to their very feet, which is to say to the appointed end; and it shows before them in loving God, and behind them in helping other people and thus following Charity. And then Death is rejected, and the people may attain the perfection of life, as Charity declares in her words already quoted.

20 Fear of the Lord and her appearance

And the third figure signifies Fear of the Lord, who arose in the minds of the faithful after the Charity God showed humanity when He willed His Son to undergo death for its sake. And this Fear arose that people might understand the heavenly commands more fully and perfectly than they previously had when doing them. Now you see her in the same form as you did in your previous vision; for the immutable God, as was declared to you before, must be held in equal and similar honor and reverence in every thing and creature of His. And she is greater and taller of stature than the other virtues, and non-human in form; for she above all the others brings people anguish and trembling. They look with sharp vision upon the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the loftiness of His Divinity, and they grow afraid; for God is to be dreaded and venerated by all people, since they were created by Him and not another. For which reason this virtue does not resemble a human being; for, as was mentioned, she rejects the perverseness that opposes God with evil deeds, and fixes her inner eye on God alone and walks the righteous paths of His will. Thus she is covered with eyes all over her body, for she lives wholly in wisdom. For, with the eyes of good understanding, she looks all around her and contemplates God in all His wonders, so as to pick out the right path of good works and bypass the Devil's morass of evil works by that knowledge of God. She shines with wisdom, for she despises the deadly things that harm the spirit; she flees death and abandons iniquity, and wisely builds herself a house in life.

She wears a shadowy garment through which the eyes can look out. For she is surrounded by the severe abstinence that destroys carnal desire in humans; and in that abstinence she looks toward the light of life, in which Man is wondrously brilliant in beatitude. And she trembles in fear before Me. For into the hearts of ardent people she infuses anguish and trembling, so that they will always hold in dread the turbulence and weakness of their flesh; and thus they will not slide into sin, or place their confidence in themselves or other people, but in Him Who reigns for all time. And so she avows in her speech already quoted.

21 Obedience and her appearance

And the fourth designates Obedience; for when Fear is shown to Me in reverence, it is next fitting that My commands be obeyed. Thus she is wearing a snow-white chain around her neck; for when people forsake the strength of the neck of their own wills and join with the innocent Lamb, My Son, she makes their minds pure by the subjection of faithful obedience. And her hands and feet are chained together with white fetters; for she is bound by the purity of true faith to the work of Christ and the way of truth. And she does not act or walk as she wishes, but as God the Ruler tells her, as she demonstrates in her words already quoted.

VISION EIGHT

22 Faith and her appearance

And the fifth designates Faith; for when the people have Obedience, and obey My commands upon hearing them, they will become believers in Faith, and faithfully fulfil in deeds what they learn by wisdom and admonition.

She has a red chain around her neck; for she perseveres faithfully and steadily, and is adorned with the martyrdom of blood. So she trusts not in deceptive vanities but in God, and this, as already quoted, she declares about herself.

23 Hope and her appearance

And the sixth represents Hope, who rises to life after Faith and belief in God. Her life is not on earth, but hidden in the heavenly places until the time of the eternal reward, for which Hope longs with her whole desire, as does a servant for his pay or a youth for his inheritance. Thus she is clad in a pale-colored tunic; for her trust is as yet pallid, because she has not yet been rewarded, but wearily awaits the coming of her longed-for desire.

But before her in the air is the cross of the Passion of the crucified Son of God; and toward it she raises her eyes and hands with great devotion. This is to say that she causes in the minds of the faithful a celestial desire, as if it hovered in the air, for the martyrdom of My Only-Begotten, so that they may raise to Him with humble and sincere minds this inner vision of faith and the glorious results of their labor. And so she says in her prayer already quoted.

24 Chastity and her appearance

And the seventh designates Chastity. For after people have placed their hope fully in God, the perfect work increases in them, and then by Chastity they start wanting to restrain themselves from the desires of the flesh. For abstinence in the flower of the flesh feels strongly, as a young girl who does not want to look on a man nonetheless feels the fire of desire. But Chastity renounces all filth and longs with beautiful desire for her sweet Lover, the sweetest and loveliest odor of all good things, for Whom those who love

BOOK THREE

Him wait in timid beauty of soul. Thus she is dressed in a tunic more brilliant and pure than crystal, which shines resplendent like water when the sun reflects from it. It is brilliant because of her simple intent, and pure because not covered with the dust of burning desire; miraculously strengthened by the Holy Spirit, she is enwrapped in the garment of innocence, which shines in the bright light of the Fountain of living water, the splendid Sun of eternal glory.

And a dove is poised over her head, facing her with its wings spread as if to fly. This is to say that Chastity at her beginning, at her head, as it were, is protected by the extended and overshadowing wings of the Holy Spirit; and so she can fly through the Devil's snares, one after another. For the Spirit comes with the ardent love of holy inspiration to wherever Chastity shows her sweet face.

Therefore too, in her womb as if in a pure mirror appears a pure infant, on whose forehead is written "Innocence." For in the heart of this purest and brightest of virtues there lives inviolable, beautiful and sure integrity. Its form is immature because it is simple infancy that has integrity; and its forehead, which is to say its knowledge, shows no arrogance and pride but only simple innocence.

And in her right hand she holds a royal scepter, but she has laid her left hand on her breast. This is to say that on the right, the side of salvation, life is shown in Chastity through the Son of God who is the King of all people. And through Him as defender, Chastity confounds the left, the side of lust, and reduces it to nought in the hearts of those who love her. How? She allows no liberty to lust; as a fierce bird snatches a rotting corpse and tears it and reduces it to naught, she rejects and crushes stinking lust in God's sight. And, defeated by her, it cannot survive, as she hints in her words, already quoted.

25 The Grace of God and its appearance

But at the summit of the shadowed pillar you see another beautiful figure. This is to say that, by the supreme and surpassing loving kindness of the Almighty in the Incarnation of the Savior, another resplendent virtue was manifested, namely the Grace of God. And it is powerful and full of God, admonishing people to repent, so that all their villainies may be forgiven through it.

It stands bareheaded; for its dignity and glory are revealed to all who seek it. It has curly black hair; for the Only-Begotten of God clothed Himself in virginal flesh without a stain of sin in the time of the Jewish people, who were tangled and knotted up in their black unfaithfulness.

And it has a manly face so ardently bright that you cannot look on it clearly like a human one. For God's Grace, in the powerful might of Divinity, appeared to give life in life, and it burns so ardently in that glorious Divinity that no human being can see it with inner or outer sight while he is still weighed down by the heaviness of the body. So it does not stand with its secrets revealed to human judgment, but is mysterious; for the judgments of divine grace are hidden.

It is clad in a tunic of purple and black, which is to say that the work of Grace, which burns in charity, leans down over the blackness of sins as if it were clothing people. How? It warns people toward salvation, and lifts them from the mire of sin toward the vision of the light by means of penitence. For, as day puts the darkness to flight, it builds up sinners toward life by taking away their misdeeds through repentance.

This tunic has a stripe of red over one shoulder and a stripe of yellow over the other, which fall to its feet in front and back. For the Grace of God, in its strength and piety, bends down to the faithful and lifts them on high to heavenly places. How? By the two ways of the stripes. It grasps the anguish of the frail flesh, worn out by bloody battle, and the strength of the soul, grown tepid in the body, and draws them up to love of heavenly things by the red and yellow splendor of the Humanity and the Divinity of the Son of God, the most serene Sun. And so the faithful person who is touched by the integrity of Grace can resist his own sinful desires; he can put virtue in front of him and mortify vice behind him, and thus courageously consummate his works and be clothed in them as in lovely and delightful clothes.

And around its neck it has a bishop's stole, wonderfully adorned with gold and precious gems. This is to say that Christ, the Son of God, Who is the High Priest of the Father, has the high power of the priestly office everywhere in the world; and so that office should be adorned by the Grace of God with the gold of wisdom and the gems of virtues by the faithful who are His imitators and members. But a pure radiance so surrounds it that you cannot look at it, except from head to foot in front; for the Grace of the Omnipotent is surrounded by the serene whiteness of His mercy. In the times before the Humanity of the Savior, Grace was hidden, invisible and unknown, in the mystery of the Divinity; only from the time of His Incarnation down to the last of His members, who will live at the end of the world, does Grace show forth as far as possible to human understanding, openly manifested in its works.

But its arms and hands and feet are concealed from your sight; for the true power and deeds and goal of the Grace of God working in humans can be fully known to no one who is weighed down by a body.

And that radiance around it is full of eyes on all sides, and is all alive. This is to say that the divine pity, which dwells in the Grace of God, manifests His many mercies and His abundant compassion in the form of many eyes, which look upon the sorrows of the people who try to follow God. And that radiance is all alive to console and save their souls, and does not prepare perdition for them, but life.

BOOK THREE

And that radiance changes its form like a cloud; for Grace goes before the just, that they may watch themselves and not fall, but follows sinners, that they may repent and rise again. And it becomes now wider and now narrower; for to the miserable and weeping hearts of the faithful Grace comes in great abundance and fruitfulness, while in the profligate and hard minds of sinners it often contracts itself to a trickle because of their aridity.

And so God's Grace precedes and follows, touches and warms people, as was said; and those who desire to be the children of God can ardently receive and fulfil its words, despising fleeting things and embracing lasting ones. And so this virtue encourages the children of God to do, in its exhortation already quoted.

But let the one who has ears sharp to hear inner meanings ardently love My reflection and pant after My words, and inscribe them in his soul and conscience.

THE TOWER OF THE CHURCH

VISION NINE

The Tower of the Church

After this I saw, in front of the pillar of the humanity of the Savior, a tower of brilliant splendor, set into the stone wall on the south side of the building so that it was visible both inside and outside the building. Its breadth was five cubits across any radius of its interior, but its height was so great that I could not make it out.

And between that tower and the pillar of the humanity of the Savior there was nothing but a foundation laid, on which the wall had not yet been built. Thus there appeared an empty gap, as mentioned [p. 325], which was one cubit long. And this tower was not yet finished, but was being diligently constructed, with great skill and speed, by a great many workers. Around its summit there were seven bulwarks, built with wonderful strength.

And I saw a ladder, which reached from the inside of the building to the summit of this tower, with a multitude of people standing on the rungs from the bottom to the top. They had fiery faces and white garments, but black shoes; and among them were some who were similar in form but taller and more splendid, who looked at the tower with great concentration.

And then, to the north of the building, I saw the world and the people who descended from Adam going to and fro between the building's shining wall of reflective knowledge and the circumference of the circle that surrounded the One seated on the throne. Many of these people went into the building, between the tower of the anticipation of God's will and the pillar of the divinity of His Word, entering and leaving through the wall of reflective knowledge like clouds, which are diffused here and there. And each one who entered the building was clothed in a white garment. Some of them rejoiced with great joy in the smoothness and softness of this garment, and kept it on; but others seemed bothered by its weight and confining nature, and tried to take it off. And that virtue whom I had previously heard called the Knowledge of God often graciously stopped them, and said to each one, "Consider, and keep the garment with which you are clothed."

And I saw that some of them accepted this rebuke, and though the garment seemed to hinder them, they made a great effort and kept it on; but others scoffed at these words, furiously pulled off the garment and threw it away, returning to the world from which they had come. And there they tried out many things and learned a lot about useless worldly vanities. And some of them at last returned into the building, took up the garment they had thrown away and put it on again; but others did not try to return, but remained ignominiously in the world, stripped of it.

BOOK THREE

And I saw that some, who were very dirty and black and acted insane, came from the North and burst into the building; they invaded the tower, carrying on and hissing at it like serpents. And some of them left off this madness and were made pure, but the others persevered in their wickedness and filth.

And I also saw, inside the building facing the tower, seven white marble pillars, completely smooth and round, seven cubits high. They supported a round dome of iron, which rose nicely to a fair height. And on top of this dome I saw a very beautiful figure standing and looking out at the people in the world. Her head shone like lightning, with so much brilliance that I could not look directly at it. Her hands were laid reverently on her breast; her feet were hidden from my sight by the dome. She had on her head a circlet like a crown, which shone with great splendor. And she was clad in a gold tunic, with a stripe on it from the breast to the feet, which was ornamented with precious gems; they glittered in green, white, red and brilliant sky-blue. And she cried out to the people in the world, saying:

I Words of Wisdom

“O slow people, why do you not come? Would not help be given you, if you sought to come? When you begin to go in God’s ways, gnats and flies buzz and hinder you; but take up the fan of the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, and drive them away as fast as possible. You should run, and you should hope for God’s help. Show that you are unfeignedly in God’s service, and you will be strengthened by His hand.”

And on the pavement of the building I saw three other images; one of them leaned against the marble pillars, and the other two stood before her on each side. All of them were directing their attention toward the pillar of the humanity of the Savior and the tower that was being built. She who was leaning against the pillars seemed to be as broad as five people standing side by side, and so tall that I could not take in all her height; and thus she could see everything in the building. She had a large head and clear eyes, with which she was looking acutely into the heavens; and she was as white and translucent as an unruffled cloud. But I could see no other human attributes in her. And she cried out in a voice that rang through the whole building, saying to the rest of the virtues:

2 Words of Justice

“Let us swiftly arise; for Lucifer is spreading his darkness through the whole world. Let us build towers, and strengthen them with heavenly bulwarks, for the Devil is the adversary and opponent of the elect of God.

VISION NINE

Lucifer began by wanting and trying to get too much in his glory; and now he wants and tries to get too much in his darkness. For he blows and scatters his malice and wickedness all over, and never ceases. And we are the soldiers of Heaven against him, to conquer him in his malice and wickedness; for otherwise, because of his enmity, people will not be able to be saved in the world. And as he, when he first revolted, tried to resist the Divinity, so too will his imitator, the Antichrist, try to resist the Lord's Incarnation in the last days. Lucifer was thrown down at the beginning of time; Antichrist too will fall, at the end of time. Then it will be known Who is the true God; it will be seen Who He is, Who has never fallen. But as Lucifer had demons as supporters, who followed him from the height of Heaven as he fell to damnation, so even now he has people on earth who follow him to the ruin of perdition. So we virtues are appointed to fight his subtleties and mockeries, which he sends into the world to devour souls; and so we will reduce all his arts to naught in the souls of the just, until he is confounded in every respect. And so we acknowledge God, Who is just in all things, and so must not be concealed but made manifest."

And the first of the figures who stood before this one on each side appeared to be armed; she was arrayed in a helmet, breastplate, greaves and iron gloves, and held an unsheathed sword in her right hand and a spear in her left. And she trod a horrible dragon under her feet, sticking the spear into its mouth so that it vomited forth unclean spume. And she held the sword as if to strike with it, brandishing it vigorously. And she said:

3 Words of Fortitude

"O mighty God! Who can resist or oppose You? The ancient serpent, the devilish dragon, cannot. Hence, with Your help, I too choose to resist him so that no one may prevail over me or throw me down, be he strong or weak, prince or outcast, noble or baseborn, rich or poor. I choose to be the strong steel that makes all the arms to be used in God's wars unconquerable; I am the sharp edge of those weapons, and because of You, O mighty God, no one can dash me in pieces. Through You I arise to overthrow the Devil. Hence I am a sure refuge for weak humans, and give their softness a cutting sword for their defense. O merciful and benevolent God, help the broken-hearted!"

The other figure had three heads; one was in the normal place and one was on each of her shoulders, but the middle one was a little higher than the other two. The middle and the right-hand one shone so brightly that their brilliance dazzled my eyes, so that I could not quite see whether their faces were masculine or feminine; the one on the left was a little bit shadowed, and veiled with a woman's white veil. The figure was dressed in a white silk tunic and white shoes. On her breast was the sign of the cross, about which a great radiance shone like the dawn. In her right hand she held a naked sword, which she laid with great devotion against her breast and the cross.

And I saw written on the forehead of the middle head, "Sanctity," and on that of the right-hand one, "The root of goodness," and on that of the left-hand one, "Self-sacrifice." And the middle one looked at the other two, and said:

4 Words of triple-headed Sanctity

"I spring from holy Humility, born of her as an infant is born of its mother. By her I was raised and strengthened, as a child is cherished and strengthened by a nurse. My mother Humility bears down and conquers all opposition, even that which is unbearable to others."

And the right-hand head looked at the middle one, and said:

5 Words of the right-hand head

"I rise from my root in the lofty-headed mountain Which is God. And therefore, O Sanctity, I must be attached to your body to enable you to stand."

And the head at the left also looked at Sanctity's middle head, and said:

6 Words of the left-hand head

"O woe, O woe, O woe! How could I be so rigid and inflexible as not to conquer myself, O Sanctity, and come to your aid? For if I fled, you could not stand without me. Alas, alas, alas for the neglecter of good! I must root out the painful thorn that would prick me toward perdition, and pluck it out before it is completely buried in me and inflames me with foul corruption. O Sanctity, I seek to evade and break, with God's help, the Devil's entangling snare, that you may freely persevere in your work."

And again the One Who, as described above, was seated on the throne, showed these things to me and said:

7 After the Incarnation a new people built a new wall of virtues

When the Son of God became incarnate, a new people was called and arose, supported by His doctrine of salvation in the Holy Spirit. They were fortified against the fearsome enemy, whom no one can resist without the help of God's grace, by the exhortations of the strong toward blessed virtue. And, with God's help, they were so unconquerable that no art of that seducer could tear them or take them away from God. Therefore, this tower you see in front of the pillar of the humanity of the Savior represents the Church. It arose when My Son's Incarnation was accomplished, newly built out of all good works and the lofty strength of heavenly deeds; it is a strong and fortified tower, standing against the Devil and resisting his iniquity.

VISION NINE

8 The Church, illumined by Christ's humanity, displays all human knowledge

Therefore this tower is of brilliant splendor, set into the stone wall on the south side of the building so that it is visible both inside and outside the building. For the Church is illumined by the steady light of the humanity of the Son of God. To construct the divine edifice, she joins together living stones enkindled by the fire of the Holy Spirit; and thus her part in the work the Supreme Father is doing through His Only-Begotten is manifest both to believers and to unbelievers, to the inner understanding that comes from heavenly knowledge of Scripture and to the outer foolishness of secular affairs.

9 The Church gives all her adornments to her Bridegroom

Its breadth is five cubits across any radius of its interior; for the Church honors the Lamb, her Bridegroom, by giving Him all her inner thoughts and meditations, which ornament her by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, on what she receives through the five senses. And she also gives Him all the virtues the true Lamb shows her.

10 The human heart cannot comprehend what divine wisdom works in the Church

But its height is so great that you cannot make it out; for the height and depth of divine wisdom and knowledge in the work of the Church is too great to be understood by the fragile mortal human heart.

11 The Church is moving toward perfection but only God knows what it will be

And between that tower and the pillar of the humanity of the Savior there is nothing but a foundation laid, on which the wall has not yet been built; thus there appears an empty gap, as mentioned, which is one cubit long. This is to say that the knowledge of God, that firm foundation, conceals from the Church, the betrothed of My Son, that great praise she will have; for she is not yet radiant in complete perfection, and lies in human hearts without fully flowering in them. But the gap is one cubit long, narrow enough to reach across; for the human senses are in the power of the One True Almighty God, and thus people can know good and evil and grasp through their intellect whatever is useful for them. And this was clearly shown you above.

And this tower is not yet finished, but is being diligently constructed, with great skill and speed, by a great many workers. This is to say that the Church has not yet come to the direction and status she will have; but, with great diligence and industry, she incessantly hastens toward her full beauty through swiftly passing time and by means of her children.

12 The Church is surrounded by the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit

And the tower has around its summit seven bulwarks, built with wonderful strength. For the Church is surrounded in her high celestial labors by the seven impregnable gifts of the Holy Spirit; and they are so strong that no adversary can destroy them, or even lift his mind so far as to touch them.

13 The Church is fortified by its doctors, flowering in apostolic doctrine

And you see a ladder, which reaches from the inside of the building to the summit of this tower. This is to say that the work the Supreme Father worked through His Son in His divine counsel had many stages by which the Church was set up and progressed. These stages, by the simple unity of the plan for the Church, lead to the height of the secret places of Heaven, strengthening and fortifying the Church as they go.

So a multitude of people are standing on the rungs from the bottom to the top. For throughout the Church's progress, from her first betrothal to the nuptial day when she will openly rejoice with her Bridegroom in the full number of their children, the shining apostles stand on the rungs of God's commands, giving light and protecting her from the darkness of infidelity.

14 The doctors of the Church have brought back the erring to true faith

And thus they have fiery faces and white garments, but black shoes. For in the minds of these apostolic guides the flame of the Holy Spirit kindled wondrous faith in the One God, so that they were resplendent before God and the world in the bright garment of good works. But they have black shoes, because they walked on the roads of infidelity and the filthy crimes of the unbelievers; and they won them over by their example, and finally, with great difficulty, converted them to the way of justice.

VISION NINE

15 The apostles and their successors tenderly care for the Church

And among them are some who are similar in form but taller and more splendid. This is to say that the apostles stand out among those defenders of the Church as its first founders; after the Son of God, they built her by their preaching. They and their followers who imitate them had the same ideas, which the apostles preached and their successors believed; but the apostles are outstanding, since they had no predecessors from whom to draw the example of the new grace except the Son of God Himself, from Whose mouth they heard the words of life. And they also surpass the others in glory, because it was they and not the others who saw the splendor of the Incarnation. And they are looking at the tower with great concentration; for they are always there to help the Bride of God in divine love and solicitous piety, so that she can continue in perfect strength. As it is written:

16 Words of Solomon

“Your neck is like the tower of David, which is built with bulwarks; a thousand bucklers hang upon it, all the armor of the valiant” [Song of Songs 4:4]. This is to say:

The Incarnation of the strong Lion, the Son of the Supreme Ruler, Who arose from the blooming of the Virgin, is the strongest instrument of the new grace; and so too the strength of your incorrupt faith, O Bride, is set as the sure rampart of the faithful people. How? All your children stand and join themselves into walls around your strength, nourished by the new light that trickles from the pure living Fountain. And in this strong joining they hold you as the neck holds the head to the rest of the body; and so you cannot be destroyed or dismembered, anymore than the victorious weapons of true David could be defeated. How?

The strong tower is the strength of Christ Jesus the Son of God, and in it the conquering hosts of the faithful are tested without defeat. No adversary can boast of prevailing over them, for they hold fast to Christ, true God and Man, through Whom in the Second Coming all your children will gloriously attain adulthood in salvation. To this end the pure Incarnation was foretold by the prophets and adorned by precious gems of virtue. And it was manifested through the world for the salvation of believers through those bulwarks of apostolic doctrine who planted the justice of the True Light, as the following parable shows.

BOOK THREE

17 Parable on the same subject

A certain lord had a marble city; he cried out upon it with a loud voice, and inscribed writings on its inner walls, from which the scrapings of the stone trickled down. And he spoke a single word to the waters of the sea, commanding them to rise above the mountaintops. And, this being done, he told the flames of the fire to burn on the altars of small tabernacles; and when they did, the tabernacles grew so high that they rapidly overtopped the city. Which is to say:

This lord is the One Whom no other ever excelled in dominion. He alone is over all things and in all things, for nothing is before Him or after Him; and so He is Lord of all. He had in His power this noble city, the company of the prophets, who were strong and constant against the raging tempests of the world. And when the Lord cried out upon them, He filled them with the Holy Spirit, and stirred them up to bring forth His mysteries in obscure words, as a distant sound is heard when the words cannot yet be made out. But the true Word, the incarnate Son of God, followed on the sound of their prophecy. And when the Lord infused their understanding richly with the spirit of wisdom, He inscribed many things in their hearts; and thus they prophesied by their sense of the Spirit the mysteries of God in the present and future, and uttered in the Spirit harsh words against wicked human behavior. And so they moved the hard hearts of the Jews to mildness and compassion and good works.

But after the Word of God became incarnate, the Heavenly Father gave a sign to His apostles, who, though human, were set apart from the common people, like pure streams diverted from the other waters that flow in a plain. He told them to flow forth into the world in a flood of true faith, overturning and wearing away the great divisions of pride and idol-worship, that all by their preaching might know the true God and forsake their infidelity. And when this faith was strengthened in the people, the Provider for all gently spoke to His elect, whose minds glowed with the flame kindled by the glowing hearts of those touched by the fiery tongues of the Holy Spirit. And He told them to despise the world and contemplate celestial life, and not to refuse to be humble and poor in spirit, but to dwell in humility so as to prepare for themselves treasure in Heaven. And those martyrs and virgins and other self-rejecters who did despise transitory things and worked in humility, meditating in lofty zeal on God's wise precepts, ascended in that self-denial to the love of heavenly things. And so in the eagerness of their good works they surpassed the vinedressers who worked in the vineyard of the Old Testament, for they counted themselves as nothing and strove with their whole desire toward Heaven.

And so a thousand bucklers, perfect defenses of the perfected faith, hang from the Son of God. And the first shepherds of the Church follow His example and despise themselves for the hope of Heaven; they pour out their blood to protect the Catholic faith from the fiery darts of the Devil, which wound human souls. And the other elect, who follow them, also form a heavenly militia and take arms to establish the love of God in this world. How? The ancient serpent infused into the first man the evil stench of contempt for God, and so the Devil himself is now pierced with the darts of Heaven: the perfume of the spices of charity and continence, and the fetters of God's commandments, and the yoke of Christ's company. And thus, cast out from the city of God, confounded and trodden down into his clear damnation, he is abhorred by all the faithful.

VISION NINE

18 Those who live according to the flesh await the knowledge of God's power

But now to the north of the building you see the world, and the people who descend from Adam going to and fro between the building's shining wall of reflective knowledge and the circumference of the circle that surrounds the One seated on the throne. This is to say that by the sin of the first parent the world and worldly people are subject to carnal desires, which are centered on earthly weaknesses and worldly longings. But, for one thing, the knowledge of good and evil has been given them, that they may draw near to God by good and fly from evil; and, for another, God has shown them His power, that they may know they are under His rule and all their deeds are judged by Him.

19 The different kinds of people who enter and leave the Church

Many of these people are going into the building, between the tower of the anticipation of God's will and the pillar of the divinity of His Word, entering and leaving through the wall of reflective knowledge like clouds, which are diffused here and there. For some approach the divine work through reflective knowledge, admonished by the Old and New Testaments and renouncing carnal desires. But some follow their pleasure and go out of it in the same way due to their evil desires; their will for good or evil propels them as swiftly as clouds, and they withdraw, carried passively by their thoughts. And those who enter the building are clothed in a white garment; which is to say that those who approach God's work with good will are clothed by His mercy in a pure and shining garment of the true faith that knows God. Some of them rejoice with great joy in the smoothness and softness of this garment, and keep it on. For they are imbued with sweet and mild Catholic faith and have a contrite and humble spirit, and they are bathed in inner holiness; so they rejoice with their inner vision in heavenly things, and devoutly do and keep what the Holy Spirit inspires in them. But others seem bothered by its weight and confining nature, and try to take it off. For they feel weighed down by a heavy burden and impeded by the difficulty of the path; so they tear and torture themselves inwardly by their restless and bitter habits and forbidden desires, and end by trying to reject faith in works and refusing to listen to the divine precepts. And that virtue whom you heard called the Knowledge of God often graciously stops them, admonishing them in the words already quoted. For the Most High God, as you saw, knowing how hard human hearts can be softened, in His mercy inclines Himself to them. He reminds them often to pray to Him and inwardly lament and weep, that He may deliver them from their perilous iniquity, to which they came by the Devil's persuasion. And by this penitence He tells them to return to knowing what good will is, and remembering the garment of innocence they received by the regeneration of the Spirit and water.

BOOK THREE

And you see that some of them accept this rebuke, and though the garment seems to hinder them, they make a great effort and keep it on. This is to say that, when the Holy Spirit admonishes them and they receive the warning in faith, they choose the path that is harsh and difficult for them; and finally, not letting their weariness make them despairing or apathetic, with great labor they complete it.

But others scoff at these words, furiously pull off the garment and throw it away, returning to the world from which they have come; and there they try out many things and learn a lot about useless worldly vanities. These are the people who hold God's law and justice in derision; in their vain error they strip themselves of the Catholic faith and deny it by wicked works, which lead to death, and turn aside to the worldly vanities that they earlier pretended to leave. And there they use perverse arts to probe into lustful deeds, and so learn the strong savor of the world; and the Devil deceives them into perversions and mockeries. And some of them at last return into the building, take up the garment they threw away and put it on again; for they return from the way of error to the divine path, and reject the schisms the Devil had imposed on them. And so they resume the dress of true faith, which they received in baptism and threw away in error when they scorned the true God; and they praise Him again with pure and simple heart. But others do not try to return, but remain ignominiously in the world, stripped of it. For they disdain to return to God in pure penitence, and remain despoiled of the garment of innocence and stripped of the good that would come from works of faith. And so, full of the Devil's vicious arts in the evil vanities of the world, they live impenitent till death, and so are confounded both in this world and in the life to come.

VISION NINE

20 On simoniacs, and the hidden divine judgment on them

And you see that some, who are very dirty and black and act insane, come from the North and burst into the building; they invade the tower, carrying on and hissing at it like serpents. This is to say that there are wicked people, willful and blithely careless, who are blackened by the Devil's point of view, and so despise God. Therefore, they seek what they desire not through the gift of the Holy Spirit, but inspired and incited by devilish arts. So they come from the direction of Hell and craftily get into the divine edifice; and by secret intrigues and open seizure, they insanely ingest the offices ordained by God by means of execrable, horrible, devilishly black money. And by their mad folly they throw the Church into disorder, and so hiss at her with the deceiving hisses of the ancient serpent. How? With diabolical cleverness they mislead the unwary and conquer them with deadly bribes; and their boastful hissing corrupts the Church, for they are stealing the powers God constituted in her. And because they do these things, they are banished from My sight; I do not recognize them as holders of these offices, for they got them by themselves and not through Me. And so My servant Hosea indicates, saying, "They have reigned, but not by Me; they have been princes, and I knew not; of their silver and their gold they have made idols for themselves, that they might perish" [Hosea 8:4]. This is to say:

People who do their own will set up for themselves whatever their own desires dictate. What is that? Their lustful will, which persuades them that they can rule people by offices they have stolen or seized, though they never asked or got them from or were set up in them by Me. Sometimes I allow this to happen, so that their wills may bring them to judgment, punishing them for not seeking Me. What will it profit them? For it will produce nothing in them but aridity; it is not rooted, and will give rise to a useless weed without a trunk. For fruitless plants spring up easily by themselves from the ground; but fruit-bearing ones must be sown and planted with great labor. And so I sometimes allow a person's earthly desires to blossom, if they have no root in evil, though they also seek no root in good and so will lack summer fertility. I also sometimes allow a virtuous desire, well-rooted in good, to bear fruit in misery; for I love to water with sanctity all that lacks winter sterility. And so the vile often surpass the useful common people in power, as weeds are sometimes taller than useful plants; but these people are appointed only by their own desires, not rooted firmly in My planting or touched by My gift of knowledge. And I permit this to happen by just judgment; for they established themselves by themselves and did not ask Me, and they will answer for it in the judgment.

For these people pervert to their vain opposites the felicity of good doctrine, which should be mentally purified from unworthy unbelief as silver is purified from dross, and the utility of deep wisdom, which should make their faith splendid and show them how to worship, venerate and confess God. How? They turn this felicity to profound infelicity, for they give the reason they have from God over to the insatiable lusts of the flesh as if that stinking and putrid flesh were God. They do not seek to raise their eyes to the God Who made them, but they hold their own will as God, living by what they ordain for themselves. And they do this not to possess the field that bears the crop of eternal life, but to flee it and lose themselves forever in impenitence. That which they worship as God is dead, and so they too are dead, these buyers and sellers of spiritual things who wanted to be something without asking Me. For how can one who insanely usurps power and makes the rational gift of the Holy Spirit a thing to be sold get anything out of the sale? For one who sells his substance to others no longer has the use of it. And how can the buyer use the salvation he bought? For he did not try to receive it from God, but hastened to buy it for money. But God in His righteous judgment allowed him to buy it.

For God, in His anger at certain people, allows them to become thieves; but yet He punishes them for it by a secret judgment now and not in the future. He allows them to be confounded by the very thing they loved in place of the Holy Spirit, so that they will be brought by this disaster to penitence, and return to God for forgiveness. And other people He tolerates and does not afflict in the present, but justly delays His judgment till the future; for they hold their wills in place of God, and so God in future will demonstrate to them what their wills are worth amid torments. And still others He punishes both now and in the future; for they willfully make their brilliant minds vile and contemptible, and imitate the evil deeds of the Devil. He allows some to go this far that their evil may be negated by penitence, and that they may punish themselves bitterly and cast away their wrong like a putrid corpse. But He mercifully stops others from reaching this point; for if they did, they would do things that merited the pains of Gehenna, and would not escape them.

Now if someone dishonors and usurps a chair of power by means of his spiritual father, money—for in that transaction money becomes his bishop—he buys himself perdition, and both he who gave and he who received the money must be cast out of their dignities. For if a person's animal is stolen from him and sold to another, the one from whom it was stolen has every right to demand it back if he finds it, while both he who sold it and he who bought it must give it up. And so too an office that should be held according to My rules is governed strictly by those rules; and if by some secret bribe it is stolen and wickedly given to an alien, the one who put it up for sale and the one who bought it shall both justly be deprived of the use of it. For they have made the temple consecrated to My name a den of thieves. How?

The wisdom and counsel I put into their hearts they have put up for sale in the marketplace, and so they are getting the wages of iniquity by the perdition of others. So they must renounce this traffic with bitter penance or they will answer to Me for it in the unquenchable fire. For one who tries to juxtapose a living dignity, vivified by the Spirit, with the stench of corruption by buying it for dead money will be lost, unless he hastens to repent that perverse presumption. As Peter, the son of the Dove, who deserted all error when enkindled by the Spirit, said to the fleeting whirlwind who tried to absorb the light into hideous blackness:

21 Words of Peter the apostle on this subject

“May your money perish with you, because you have thought that the gift of God could be purchased with money. You have no part or lot in this word; for your heart is not right in the sight of God” [Acts 8:20-21]. Which is to say:

This is money with which you falsely believed you could become the master of a thing alien to you, but which regards you as a servant or as nothing at all. May it go with you into the perdition of the fires of Gehenna if you do not repent, and if you keep the gift of the ardent Holy Spirit, which you purchased with money. For in your transitory wisdom you have thought that you could have for money the enkindling of your soul by the great Searcher of Hearts; and you did not trust to get it by God's gift. But if you repent of this wrong, you must give up what you bought, and hold the money you gave for it as lost; for you tried to buy an eternal thing with mud from Him Who created you from the mud. And as long as you keep this purchase, you will never share in the light of the company of the supernal angels; for by your speech you have revealed your heart's rapacity, coveting a thing not desired by the citizens of glorious eternity. And so your heart in this wickedness is unjust in God's sight, for it wants to have by a money purchase what should be given freely by God. And My just judgment likens those who will not seek this divine concord by the free gift of the Holy Spirit to vain idols. For idols are the work of hands, and have no truth in them, but they are worshipped by the infidels instead of God; and so too those who use gifts not illumined by the Holy Spirit are teachers of deceit. For they do not take an office sighing in their souls as being unworthy of it, but receive it with eager pride from other people, and ignore My will about it.

Therefore, I know not whence they come, and hold them as alien to Me; and if they persevere in their injustice, they are cut off from Me. But if they repent with their whole heart, I will receive them; and the angels will rejoice in them.

22 Offices of power are set up by God, and one who resists them resists God

But, though those who strive after these dignities with perverse ardor act unjustly, and, as mentioned, consent must not be given to their usurpation, nonetheless government itself is good for human welfare and well-ordained by God. And so it must not be stubbornly resisted, but obeyed for love of Me. So let no faithful person who wants to obey God oppose himself to the authority that governs him; for, in keeping and feeding God's sheep, it imitates Him in honor, and must not be destroyed by an alien who is a thief and a robber. So, as no one should oppose God, no one should foolishly resist His authorities.

Therefore, everyone who lives in soul and body should obey the offices superior to him and subject himself to them, whether they maintain corporeal or spiritual justice. Human laws should be guided by fear of the authorities, lest people should turn from the right path and follow their undisciplined wills to become laws unto themselves. This would be going astray from the way of the Lord; for powers from God exist to keep people from straying. How?

Human governments are set up by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, that through them people may learn to fear the Lord. If people pervert them into anarchy by their wills, God does not will it but only permits it, that these people's twisted wants may be satisfied to their ruin.

And thus the powers of office are inspired by God for human advantage, justly ordained by Him of necessity; for otherwise the people of God would live like flocks without a shepherd, and follow every winding path of disorder. Hence he who resists them out of pride and refuses to obey them in just humility opposes not people but Me, the Creator, Who disposes all things justly. He follows Adam's transgression in so opposing Me, and thus increases the darkness of his condemnation; he is driven out of joy into sorrow. This does not mean a person who humbly refuses his consent to perverse wickedness, for if he does so properly he increases God's justice and does not diminish it; it refers to one who tries to overthrow an office improperly because of his exalted pride. For, as mentioned, these offices were constituted by Me for the advantage of the living; and one who proudly defies them resists My inspiration. Nonetheless, some people, in mad ignorance and forgetting to fear Me, obtrude themselves upon these dignities, and transgress the divine commands by their wicked wills. And, by My just judgment, I let it be as they wish; but they will answer for it in a just judgment, either by severe penance or in the fires of Gehenna.

23 On simoniacs who repent and those who do not

But you see that some of them leave off this madness and are made pure, but the others persevere in their wickedness and filth. This is to say that some of them, by divine inspiration, come to themselves out of their wickedness and, by pure and true penitence, earn the right to be cleansed and saved. But others are obdurate and impenitent, and remain in their crafty impurity till the end of their life; and therefore they will die miserably by choking, a painful and cruel death.

24 God gave the gifts of the Holy Spirit to defend and adorn the Church

And you see, inside the building facing the tower, seven white marble pillars, completely smooth and round. This is to say that the Omnipotent Father, Who has supreme power without beginning or end in the perfect round of eternity, has worked for the protection and beauty of the new Bride by manifesting the seven modes of the purifying inspiration of the Holy Spirit, which drive away all adverse storms. And they are seven cubits high, because these gifts surpass in strength and height all human intellect, and thus show that He Who created all things must be worshipped in pure faith.

They are supporting a round dome of iron, which rises nicely to a fair height. For these pillars, in their excelling glory, manifest the profound and incomprehensible power of the Divinity; and by their perfect straightness, they protect and support in Heaven the people who, by the gifts of the Holy Spirit, separate themselves from carnal pleasures here below.

25 Wisdom and her appearance

And on top of this dome you see a very beautiful figure standing. This is to say that this virtue was in the Most High Father before all creatures, giving counsel in the formation of all the creatures made in heaven and earth; so that she is the great ornament of God and the broad stairway of all the other virtues that live in Him, joined to Him in sweet embrace in a dance of ardent love. And she is looking out at the people in the world; for she protects and guides the people who want to follow her, and keeps with great love those who are true to her. And this figure represents the Wisdom of God, for through her all things are created and ruled by God. Her head shines like lightning, with so much brilliance that you cannot look directly at it; for God,

BOOK THREE

Who is terrible or mild to every creature, sees and judges all things as a human eye assesses what is before it, but no human can understand fully the profound mystery of the Divinity.

Thus her hands are laid reverently on her breast; this represents the power of Wisdom, which she wisely holds to do her work so that no one can oppose her by craft or might. Her feet are hidden from your sight by the dome; for her depths are hidden in the heart of the Father and invisible to humans, and her secrets are naked and manifest to God alone. She has on her head a circlet like a crown, which shines with great splendor. This is to say that the Majesty of God is without beginning or end and bright with incomparable glory, and the Divinity is so radiant that mortal sight cannot look on it. And she is clad in a gold tunic; which is to say that Wisdom is often thought of as pure gold. It has a stripe on it from the breast to the feet, which is ornamented with precious gems; they glitter in green, white, red and brilliant sky-blue. For from the beginning of the world, when Wisdom first openly displayed her workings, she extended in a straight line to the end of time. She is adorned with the holy and just commandments, which are green like the first sprouts of the patriarchs and prophets who sighed in their tribulations for the Incarnation of the Son of God, and white like the virginity of Mary, and red like the faith of the martyrs, and brilliant blue like the lucent love of contemplation, which, by the ardor of the Holy Spirit, mandates love for God and one's neighbor. And so she will proceed even to the end of the world, and her admonition will not cease, but will spread as long as the world endures; and so Wisdom declares, in her already-quoted exhortation.

26 The appearance of Justice, Fortitude and Sanctity

And on the pavement of the building you see three other images. This is to say that these virtues, which do the divine work by treading the earthly underfoot and following the heavenly, are the three instruments by which the Church strives toward eternity in her children: nourishment from their teachers, and the fight of the faithful against the Devil, and the rejection of consent to vice. One of them is leaning against the marble pillars; for the doctors of the Church, imbued with the gifts of the Holy Spirit, find rest in their strength. And the other two are standing before her on each side; for, as the exhortation says, the love of God and of neighbor resides in the united and cooperative action of these virtues.

Therefore all of them are directing their attention toward the pillar of the humanity of the Savior and the tower that is being built. For they are showing by their unanimity that the Son of God, true God and true Man, is devoutly worshipped and adored in the Church; and they are raising up justice, demonstrating the way of salvation in the Old Testament saints, the Most High God and the Incarnation of His Son.

VISION NINE

27 Justice and her appearance

So this figure who is leaning against the pillars represents God's Justice; for she arises after Wisdom, and by the Holy Spirit works in all the justice of human beings. She seems to be as broad as five people standing side by side; for she takes in all five human senses and uses them to abide in the law of God, and she contains and keeps all the commandments God instituted for those who love her. And she is so tall that you cannot take in all her height, and thus she can see everything in the building. For she is greater than the human mind, and extends up into Heaven, just as she bent down from Heaven in the Incarnation of the Savior when He Who was the Son of God came forth from the Father, Who is true Justice. And so she looks at all the attributes of the Church, for they are made and contained by her, and thus are the higher bulwarks joined to confirm the strong tower. She has a large head and clear eyes, with which she is looking acutely into the heavens; for Justice, in her supreme goodness, has shown people a bright vision in the incarnate Son of God, Who showed Himself in a human body to darkened mortal eyes, teaching heavenly things to save their souls. And she is as white and translucent as an unruffled cloud; for she dwells in the purity of the minds of the just, who direct all their desire toward obeying the justice of God, and so is as white as a cloud. And thus she prepares for herself a pleasant habitation in just hearts.

But you can see no other human attributes in her; which is to say that she remains heavenly and not terrestrial, as was declared to you. That is, those human deeds that weigh people down do not cling to her, but only those that lead them to justification and life. For God is just; and she, fighting against the Devil, shows it in her exhortation, already quoted, to the other virtues, which work for God.

28 Fortitude and her appearance

And the first of the figures who stand before this one on each side represents Fortitude. For Fortitude arises after God's Justice like a prince under the rule of a supreme king, to repel by righteous and holy labor all traps set for humans by their enemies. For she is armed by the power of Almighty God, and, strong in faith, repels the advances of the Devil. Therefore, she is arrayed in a helmet, which is to say with supernal power to save believers; and in a breastplate, which is to say in Christian law, which can never be destroyed by the Devil's arrows because it is full of justice; and in greaves, which is to say in righteous paths walked by the main teachers in their doctrines; and in iron gloves, which are the strong and noble works the faithful do in Christ.

BOOK THREE

She holds an unsheathed sword in her right hand; which is God's admonitions in the divine Scriptures, whose inner meaning the Son of God disclosed when He opened the Law to show the sweetness of its kernel. And she has a spear in her left hand; for when carnal desires for the pleasure of the flesh afflict the faithful, they resist by thinking of the eternal.

And she is treading a horrible dragon under her feet; which is to say that, by the path of righteousness, she subjugates to her power the ancient and frightful serpent. She is sticking the spear into its mouth, so that it is vomiting forth unclean spume; for, with the mighty daring of chastity, she pierces the gaping jaws of foul and devilish lust, and wrings from it the burning venom with which it polluted humans.

And she holds the sword as if to strike with it, brandishing it vigorously; for God has displayed the vast strength of His pervasive Word to slay all unfaithful idol-worship and other schisms of unbelief. And so this virtue shows, in her admonition already quoted.

29 Sanctity and her appearance

The other figure signifies Sanctity; for when the Devil is repelled by Fortitude, Sanctity arises in the good to adorn them in the heavenly host. She has three heads; for three attributes make up her condition. One is in the normal place and one is on each of her shoulders; for God, the Head of all dignities, is to be respected and venerated in prosperity and adversity, in human joy and sorrow. But the middle one is a little higher than the other two; for He Who is the Judge of the good and the evil rises in His equity above all things. The middle and the right-hand one shine so brightly that their brilliance dazzles your eyes, so that you cannot quite see whether their faces are masculine or feminine; which is to say that Sanctity is so honorable and sweet and full of heavenly grace that the depth of her mystery exceeds the human intellect, and, weighed down by mortality, that intellect cannot discern her liberty or her subjection in Christ, except what is seen in Him Himself.

But the head on the left is a little bit shadowed, and veiled with a woman's white veil. For this perfection, sternly constraining itself for love of God, is anxious and careful to defend itself by God's help when attacked by the Devil and people; and so, in the sighs of faithful hearts, it commends itself humbly to the Supreme Redeemer in the purity and beauty of the Christian fight.

The figure is dressed in a white silk tunic; which is to say that she is surrounded by works of sweet and lucent zeal, in which perfect Sanctity imitates My Son. And she is protected by white shoes; for she shines brightly in human minds, through the death of Christ and the pure regeneration of the Spirit and water, that they too may imitate His death.

On her breast is the sign of the cross, about which a great radiance shines on her breast like the dawn. For Sanctity awakens, in the minds of believers who lovingly embrace her, the repeated remembrance of the Passion of Christ Jesus. She declares with bright faith that He Who obeyed the Father and suffered so much in His holy human state was born without stain of sin from the beautiful dawn, the Virgin Mary.

In her right hand she holds a naked sword, which she lays with great devotion against her breast and the cross. This is to say that her holy works show how much she loves the Scriptures revealed by the Holy Spirit, which the chosen recall to mind as they sweetly remember the Passion of their Redeemer.

And you see written on the forehead of the middle head, "Sanctity"; for Sanctity is known by the inner face of the soul, full of joy in life and without unworthy shame. And on that of the right-hand one is "The root of goodness"; for that is clearly the beginning and the foundation of Sanctity unto salvation. And on that of the left-hand one is "Self-sacrifice"; for she sternly restrains herself from sluggishness, softness and vain earthly pleasures, and adorns herself with the other virtues that she may be perfected and persevere.

And the middle one looks at the other two, and they look at it, and they all consult together for their advantage; for they are strongly united in inner vision and in love, and none of them can last without the help of the others. And so they direct their words and admonitions to people, to help them go forward.

But let the one who has ears sharp to hear inner meanings ardently love My reflection and pant after My words, and inscribe them in his soul and conscience.

THE SON OF MAN AND THE FIVE VIRTUES

VISION TEN

The Son of Man

And after this, I saw on the summit of the eastern corner of the building, where the shining part and the stone part of the wall came together, seven white marble steps, which rose like an arch up to the great stone on which the Shining One sat on the throne.

And on these steps a chair was placed, on which sat a man of youthful appearance. His face was manly and noble, but pale; he had black hair down to his shoulders, and was clad in a purple tunic. He was visible to me from his head to his navel, but from the waist downward he was hidden from my sight. And he looked on the world and cried out loudly to the people in it, saying:

1 Words of the Son of Man

“O foolish people! You languidly and shamefully shrink into yourselves, and do not want to open an eye to see how good your souls could be. You constantly burn to do the evil your flesh desires, and refuse to be of good conscience and think rightly. It is as if you did not know good and evil, or have the glory of knowing how to avoid evil and do good. Hear Me, the Son of Man, saying to you: O human, regard what you were when you were just a lump in your mother’s womb! You were mindless and powerless to bring yourself to life; but then you were given spirit and motion and sense, so that you might live and move and come to fruitful deeds.

2 Man has the knowledge of good and evil and so has no excuse

“So you have the knowledge of good and evil, and the ability to work. And so you cannot plead as an excuse that you lack any good thing that would inspire you to love God in truth and justice. You have the power to master yourself and not want and take pleasure in injustice; you can punish yourself and flee from the illicit lusts you delight in, and so honor My martyrdom by fighting against your burning desires and bearing My cross in your body. And why have you this great power? So that you may avoid evil and do good. And you will answer to Me for your knowledge of good and evil, as you know yourself to be human. But you despise good and do evil, and burn with carnal desire; good seems grievous to you, and evil is easily awakened in you. And so you choose not to restrain yourself, but to sin freely.

“What did I not do for you when I, the Son of Man, suffered on the cross in frail flesh, and trembled in great anguish? Because of that, I require of you a self-martyrdom; you must suffer for the lusts of your flesh and your other unruliness, your illicit desires contrary to My will and the bad actions that come from them. And you cannot excuse yourself by saying you do not know your good from your bad actions.

3 Admonition to the married

“But I do not reject the chaste coupling of legitimate marriage, which was set up by divine counsel when the children of Adam were fruitful and multiplied. But it is to be done for the true desire of children and not for the false pleasure of the flesh, and only by those to whom it is allowed and harmless by divine law, those allied to the world and not set apart for the Spirit. You should love the good you have from Me better than yourself. You are heavenly in spirit but earthly in flesh; and so you should love heavenly things and tread the earthly underfoot. When you do heavenly things I show you a supernal reward; but when you seek to do what is unjust by the will of your flesh, I show you My martyrdom and the pains I endured for your sakes, that you may fight your wrong desires for love of My Passion.

“You have been given great intelligence; and so great wisdom is required of you. Much has been given to you, and much will be required of you. But in all these things I am your Head and your helper. For when Heaven has touched you, if you call on Me I will answer you. If you knock at the door, I will open to you. You are given a spirit of profound knowledge, and so have in yourself all that you need. And, this being so, My eyes will search you closely and remember what they find.

“Therefore, I require of your conscience a wounded and sorrowful heart; for thus you can restrain yourself when you feel drawn toward sin and burn in it to the point of suffocation. Behold, I am watching you; what will you do? If you call upon Me in this travail, with a wounded heart and tearful eyes and fear of My judgment, and keep calling on Me to help you against the wickedness of your flesh and the attacks of evil spirits, I will do for you all that you desire, and make My dwelling-place in you.

4 Analogy of the field

“Now therefore, my child, note how much work and sweat goes into a field before it is sown with seed. But after it has been sown, it brings forth the crop. Attend and consider these things. Do I not refuse to let the earth bring forth a crop without the sweat of labor? But when I choose, it bears so abundantly that people have the fullest sufficiency, or even more; and when I choose, it bears so meagerly that people can hardly survive their hunger, or even pine and die. And so too are people sustained by Me. To a person who willingly and with good heart receives the seed of My word, I grant the gifts of the Holy Spirit in superabundance, as to a good field. One who now receives My word and now refuses to accept it is like a field that is sometimes green and sometimes dried-up. But this person does not perish utterly; his soul suffers hunger, but he has some greenness, though not much. But one who never chooses to hear My words, or waken his heart to good by the admonition of the Holy Spirit or by human instruction, will die completely. You wonder at this, O human, and want to know why.

VISION TEN

5 Man must not look into what he is not meant to know

“But, just as you cannot look on Divinity with your mortal eyes, you cannot grasp its secrets with your mortal minds, except insofar as God permits you. Your wavering mind turns this way and that; and as water is evaporated by the heat of a furnace, your spirit is dried up by the turbulence of your foolish mind. For you want to know what cannot be known by the sinful seed of Man. Will you raise your finger and touch the clouds? This cannot be done; and neither can this search into what is not for you to know. As plants cannot comprehend the nature of the earth because they lack sense and intellect, and know not what they are or how they bear their fruit, though in their usefulness they encompass the earth; or as gnats or ants or such small creatures do not seek to rule their own kind, or to know or understand the power and nature of lions or greater animals; so you cannot know what is in the knowledge of God.

“Where were you and what were you doing when Heaven and earth were made? He Who created them did not need your help, nor does He now. Why do you search into God’s judgment? You are touched by the rain of salvation from above; show Me how you labor in the field of your heart to cultivate it. If that labor pleases Me, I will give you good fruit; the fruit with its reward shall be according to your labor. Do I give the fruits of the earth without labor? Neither, O human, do I give to you without the sweat I ask of you. For through Me you have in yourself all the means to work.

“Exercise yourself therefore diligently in labor, and you shall have the fruit thereof. And when you have the fruit, you shall have its reward. But now what? Many seek me with a devout, pure and simple heart, and having found Me never let Me go.

BOOK THREE

6 No one may too quickly come into the way of holiness

"But many joke and play and try to approach Me without mental labor or cogitation. They are unwilling to deliberate their course first, calling on Me and examining the habits of their body; they wish only to seize upon Me like one awaking from deep sleep, and take the way of sanctity by their own will with a sudden and deceiving motion. Some therefore take My yoke on their shoulders by rejecting secular affairs, others by fleshly continence, others by modest virginity; and they think it possible to be what they wish without recognizing what they are and what they are capable of. But they remain unaware of Who made them and Who their God may be, wishing only to have Him as their servant and do their will.

"To the person who tries to unite himself to Me thus vainly, while in his ignorance he does not know Me, I will not give My gift; I will not sow an empty field. Therefore his foot will often stumble. And I say to him: 'O human, why have you not examined the field of your mind, and rooted out the weeds and thorns and thistles? Why have you not called on Me and examined yourself? For before you come to Me you are as one drunk and insane and ignorant of self; you can do no shining deed without My help. And, after seeking Me in inconsiderate haste as if in a dream, you grew weary in My service, and remembered your other dream of habitual sins; and so you returned to your former crimes, insane and ignorant of the good, and deprived yourself of the help and consolation of the Spirit, the Paraclete.

"'But what was your guide and helper in this? Your fallacious and deceitful mind; it led you foolishly into aridity, without the fruitful memory in your intellect that you can do nothing good without Me. And so what do you have? You will be wretched and empty, and will fall down before Me and before the people and be trodden into the vain dust. If you work against Me, what can you do? Nothing. And with Me, what can you do? The most shining works, which are more splendid than the light of the sun and sweeter to taste than honey and milk to the desiring people. For when you seek Me in your inmost soul, as you were taught through faith in baptism, do I not do everything you desire?'

"But some who should have sought Me out before they fell seek Me, sighing and sorrowing, after they fall. And to them I offer My hand, saying, 'Why did you not seek Me before falling? Where was I, and where did you seek for Me? And when you sought Me, did I reject you?' And I say, 'O human! If you stood on a bridge over deep water, and foolishly boasted and forgot yourself the way you have despised Me in these matters, thinking all things were possible to you and you did not need My help; if then you said proudly, "I choose to avoid this bridge and walk on the water!" would you be acting wisely? If you act so presumptuously and foolishly toward this creation, which was made for your profit, you will perish. But this will not happen, because you have a present and visible fear of the water and of drowning, and are on your guard. Or if you saw a large tree that had been sawn through and was falling, would you not flee to avoid being injured by it? Or if you saw lions or bears or wolves coming your way, would you not for fear hide in the ground if you could? But since you flee thus from physical injury, why do you not flee the cruel death of the soul by fearing your Creator? Have you ever seen or heard of one who could rebel against Me? For he who is not with Me will be dissolved, and he upon whom I fall will be broken in pieces. Where were you when Heaven and earth were created, which go on as they were meant to? But you, who were formed by God's counsel and touched by His illumination, transgress His commands. Oh, great mindlessness! For the sake of the creation that serves you, you despise your God, though you tread the earth and watch the heavens, which fear their Creator and fulfil His commands; this you foolishly do not do, for you choose not to know Him in your thoughts or your deeds, or to look toward Him and know Him as you should.

“ ‘Therefore, if you do not repent, Hell will justly receive you, for you have imitated the one who was thrown in his obduracy down from Heaven. But if you fall, seek Me with a constant outcry, and I will lift you up and receive you. O human, you sometimes try to touch the highest things, when you cannot understand even the lowest.’ ”

7 How virgins and celibates should draw near to sanctity

“Therefore, hear me when I tell you this. If because of My words you wish to bear My yoke, and renounce secular business or abstain from the things of the flesh, before you come to that, cry out and persevere in seeking Me; and I will help you. And if, touched by My admonition, you wish to imitate Me, recognizing that I was born without male seed in modest virginity as a flower is born in an unplowed field, humbly show Me the field of your mind and speak to Me with a flood of inner tears. And say, ‘O my God, I, an unworthy human, do not have it in me to carry out my undertaking to keep my virginity unless you, Lord, help me. For I am guilty of upsurges of burning desire and wallow in misery, wondering about the reason for my weakness. By my own strength I cannot vanquish my taste for the sweetness of the flesh, for I am a tree conceived and born in sins. Therefore, O Lord, give me by Your might the fiery gift that will extinguish this perverse kindling and burning in me, that with righteous breath I may drink of the water of the living Fountain that will make me rejoice in life. For now I am dust and ashes, regarding the works of darkness more than the works of light.’ And if you are zealous and constant in this supplication, I will prepare for Myself in you the field Isaac saw in his son, when he said, 'See, the smell of my son is as the smell of a plentiful field, which the Lord has blessed' [Genesis 27:27]. And I will bless that field of Mine in My heart. And as Isaac went on to say, 'Be lord of your brethren, and let your mother's children bow down before you' [v. 29], so too you will be a generation raised above the common people. And I will sow in that field roses and lilies and other perfumes of virtue, and I will water it constantly with the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, and I will uproot what is useless and tear out what is evil in it, so that I may survey it with my eyes and feast them on the greenness and the blossoming of this uncorrupt field.

"But this will be My doing and through Me, not yours or through you, O human. For I am the Flower of the field; as a field engenders a flower without being plowed, so I the Son of Man was born of a virgin without her coupling with a man. And therefore this gift is Mine and not yours, for you were conceived in sins and born of corruption. But if you faithfully ask this gift of Me, you may expect it confidently from Me; I will grant that in the sight of My Father you may participate with Me in virginity. But because of the weakness of your body, you will not have it without suffering from your desires; for your weak human nature will often manifest itself in you, and, since you are flesh of flesh, you cannot escape it.

"But in this you should bear My cross and imitate My martyrdom; you should restrain yourself and conquer yourself through Me, which is always pleasing to Me. For I know you are a fragile vessel, and so I choose to share in and pity your pains. But if, because of those pains, you fall, rise up quickly and do penance from the heart; and I will receive you and save you.

8 Inner continence of mind and examples pertaining to it

"But certain people, deceived by the Devil and obdurate in evil, think they are sanctified if they keep their outer selves from marriage; but they remain uncircumcised in mind and spirit, overflowing with impure thoughts and bringing forth evil in their words and works. They ignore the fact that this is disgraceful; they tepidly keep their bodies intact from fornication, but they reject the virginity of the spirit. Hence they are unworthy in My sight, outside both the physical and the spiritual law; for they have lived according to God's justice neither in the flesh nor in the spirit. They have not kept either the law of marriage, which was appointed for them, or what is more than the law's command, the love of virginity. Therefore they are unworthy in My eyes, and I know not what they are. For I have not seen them either walk in the command of the Law or do more than was commanded them; and they are rejected from My sight. I compare them to waste ground, which brings forth thorns and thistles and useless weeds, though their height and color is that of roses and lilies and the other useful flowers and herbs that have healthy sap and sweet fruit and healing fragrance. And I compare them to copper, which pretends to be gold, but is secretly only an imitation and counterfeit of gold. For in the same way these people masquerade as wise virgins, but are inwardly full of craft and unworthiness.

“Therefore they are also in My sight like a tepid breeze, with no briskness of heat or cold. For their mental heat makes them unfit to persevere in the virginity they began in; and in the cold of secular affairs they cannot proceed as they would like. They do not wander outside the confines of the law like the publicans, or sin within it like the unjust, but are inwardly tepid, neither just nor unjust. But, as the young of unclean animals are cast out before they are conscious of living or grown into strength, so these people are cast into death; for they do not know how to live unto life, or know in themselves the strength of the virtues, which are in the house of wisdom. And so I spew them out of My mouth, for if they remain impenitent they are unworthy of My sight. So now, O human, look into yourself.

9 Analogy of the treasure

“If someone who loved you very much gave you a treasure, and said to you, ‘Profit from this, and enrich yourself, that it may be known who gave you this treasure,’ you would have to consider very carefully. You would have to ponder on how to make the best gain out of it, and say to yourself, ‘I should make the best profit possible with my lord’s treasure, that he too may be praised for it.’ And after it was thus increased to advantage and you had multiplied it, a good report would come to the ears of the one who had given it to you. And he would think of you because of it, and love you more, and confer greater gifts on you.

“This is what your Creator does. He loves you exceedingly, for you are His creature; and He gives you the best of treasures, a vivid intelligence. He commands you in the words of His Law to profit from your intellect in good works, and grow rich in virtue, that He, the Good Giver, may thereby be clearly known. Hence you must think every hour about how to make so great a gift as useful to others as to yourself by works of justice, so that it will reflect the splendor of sanctity from you, and people will be inspired by your good example to praise and honor God. And when you have justly multiplied it to advantage, this praise and thanksgiving will come to the knowledge of God, Who by the Holy Spirit inspired these virtues in you. And He Himself, in the sweetness of His love, will give you grace to overflowing; He will make you burn yet more for love of Him, so that, strengthened by the Holy Spirit, you may wisely discern the good and do greater deeds, and ardently glorify your Father, Who gave you these things.

"Let My sheep hear these words, and let those who have the inner ears of the spirit lay hold of them; for it pleases Me that people who know and love Me should understand what to do by the gifts of the Holy Spirit."

And in the eastern part of the building, I saw three figures standing on the pavement before that youth; they stood next to each other, and looked at him devotedly. And, opposite the North, between the building and the great circle, which extended from the Shining One Who sat on the throne, I saw a wheel hanging in the air; in it was a human figure who could be seen from the breast up, looking with penetrating gaze on the world.

And in the southern corner of the building, another figure appeared standing on the pavement inside, turning most joyfully toward the youth. And all these figures resembled each other in the following ways. Like the other virtues I had seen, they were all clad in silk garments. All of them were veiled with white head-veils, except the right-hand one of the three mentioned above, who was bareheaded and had white hair. None of them wore a cloak except the middle one of these three, who had a white one. But they were all clothed in white tunics except the one in the wheel, who had a black tunic, and the left-hand one of the three, whose tunic was pale-colored. All were shod in white, except the middle one of the three, whose shoes were black and painted with different colors. But this was the divergence between them:

On the breast of the middle figure of the three who stood together were two little windows. Above them was a hart, facing the right side of the figure, so that its forefeet were above the right window and its hind feet above the left, poised to run. And this figure said:

10 Words of Constancy

"I am the strong pillar, who cannot be moved by light changefulness; a blast of wind cannot shake me like the leaf of a tree, for I abide in the true Rock, which is the true Son of God. Who can prevail to move me? and who can harm me? Neither strong nor weak, prince nor noble, rich nor poor will ever be able to keep me from persevering in the true God, Who will not be moved forever.

"And I will not be moved, for I was founded on the strongest foundation. For I do not choose to be with flatterers, who are blown here and there and all ways by the wind of temptation, and who are never at rest in constancy but always fall to the lower and worse. I do not act so; for I am set on the firm rock."

And the figure on her right contemplated the hart, and said,

VISION TEN

11 Words of Celestial Desire

“ ‘As the hart pants after the water-brook, so my soul pants after You, O God’ [Psalm 41:2]. Therefore, I will skip over the mountains and hills, and bypass the sweet weakness of this transitory life, and with pure heart regard only the Fountain of living water. For He is full of immeasurable glory, with whose sweetness no one can ever be sated.”

And the figure standing on the left looked at the little windows, and said,

12 Words of Compunction of Heart

“I always gaze on and think of the true and eternal Light; and neither thought nor desire nor contemplation will make me sated with the perpetual sweetness that is in Supernal God.”

And the figure who was opposite the North in a wheel had a blossoming twig in her right hand. The wheel revolved without ceasing, but the figure within it remained motionless. And on the perimeter of the wheel was written, “If anyone serves Me, let him follow Me; and where I am, there also shall My servant be” [John 12:26]. And on the breast of the figure was carved, “I am the sacrifice of praise in all lands.” And that figure said,

13 Words of Contempt of the World

“ ‘To him who overcomes, I will give to eat of the tree of life which is in the Paradise of my God’ [Revelation 2:7]. For the fountain of salvation has drowned Death, and poured its stream into me to make me blossom in redemption.”

And the figure who stood in the southern corner was so bright of face that I could not look fully at her. She had a white wing on either side, each broader than the figure herself. And she said,

14 Words of Concord

“Who is so strong as to try to oppose God? And who is so audacious that he would dare to strip me naked and corrupt me into shameful hatred and envy? God is just, and alone in power and glory. I want to embrace Him always with pure and joyous face, and rejoice in all His judgments. And I do not want to change, but to remain always in one mind and praise God continually. Therefore neither the Devil nor envious Man could ever weaken me or degrade me to the insanity of deceit, or make me stop persevering in peace and concord. And when the world passes away, I will appear more gloriously in the heavenly vision.”

BOOK THREE

After this I looked, and behold, all the pavement of the building appeared like white glass, which shone with a calm splendor. But the splendor of the Shining One seated on the throne, Who was showing me all these things, shone brightly through that pavement even into the abyss. And between the building and the circle where it extended from the One on the throne the earth was visible, sloping downward, so that the building suddenly seemed to be placed on a mountain. And the Shining One seated on the throne spoke to me again:

“The Son of the Living God, born of the Virgin, is the Cornerstone, rejected by those who should have built their salvation on the law of God and refused; for they loved darkness more than light and death more than life. But the Son reigns mightily in those who burn with the touch of the Holy Spirit, tread their outer selves under foot and hasten with full consent to the inner things of the Spirit, in fullness of virtue and good works.”

15 God's work in humans is consolidated by the gifts of the Holy Spirit

Therefore, you see on the summit of the eastern corner of the building, where the shining part and the stone part of the wall come together, seven white marble steps. For the sevenfold ascent of pure fortitude rises in high justice from the true East, which is the Cornerstone of the divine work, where the two parts of the wall of necessity, reflective knowledge and human deeds, hold to each other in secure repose. This ascent is full of the righteous actions God works and perfects in humans, as He worked on six days and rested on the seventh.

16 God unites the deeds of the faithful to Fear of the Lord

These steps rise like an arch up to the great stone on which the Shining One sits on the throne; for every act that is done by the faithful in faith and work is fittingly united by God's providence to the Fear of the Lord, upon which He Who rules all things is enthroned in supreme omnipotence.

17 The Son of God guides those who seek to persevere, and destroyed death

And on these steps a chair is placed, which is to say that the firm foundation of protection is set above the works God works in humans, to guide and help them. And whoever chooses to persevere in Him will not sink into error, for He is the mighty support on which all justice is established.

And on the chair sits a man of youthful appearance. This is the constant ruler, the Son of Man, Who reigns as One God in all justice with the Father and the Holy Spirit. His face is manly and noble, for He is the strong Lion Who has destroyed death and the noble Sinless One Who was visibly born of the Virgin. But he is pale; for He did not seek earthly honor by earthly means, but was gentle, poor and humble with a holy humility.

VISION TEN

18 The birth and Passion of the Son of God ended the shadow of the Law

He has black hair down to his shoulders; for the Jewish people did not seek the clarity of faith displayed in the Incarnation of My Son, and so they remained in the darkness of the shadow of the mere outward understanding of the Law, and wasted away in obstinacy and faithlessness. They arose from the head of justice, but they only reached as far as the shoulders of fortitude; and when the perfect work blossomed in the humanity of My Son, they ended in unbelief.

And he is clad in a purple tunic; for He poured out His blood in charity to save people who had perished.

19 God's past deeds for the Church can be seen by people but not the future

He is visible to you from his head to his navel; which is to say that from His Incarnation to the present time the works He has done in the Church have been manifest to the faithful. But from the waist downward he is hidden from your sight; for the things that will be in the Church from the present time to the end of time are not for people to see or know, except by divine revelation and Catholic faith. For the great splendor of virtues that will be manifested in people before the last day still lie hidden, unknown to humanity.

20 God looks on humanity with mercy and tells them to imitate the saints

And he looks on the world, because the Son of God directs a merciful gaze toward people, and speaks faithful words of warning to them about things past and things to come; He tells them to imitate the heavenly army of saints, flee from the dangers of sin, and fight with great strength to attain supernal felicity and escape the punishments of the wicked.

21 Constancy, Celestial Desire, Compunction, Contempt of the World, Concord

And in the eastern part of the building you see three figures standing on the pavement before that youth; they stand next to each other, and look at him devotedly. This is to say that when justice arose and bore down carnal desire, which occurred when by the decision of the Almighty Father the Son of God appeared in the flesh, these three virtues showed themselves unalterably unanimous in their devotion in the power of the Trinity; and they direct their gaze to the Son, because they desire Him and seek Him in all the faithful. Hence also, opposite the North, between the building and the great circle that extends from the Shining One Who sits on the throne, you see a wheel hanging in the air; and in it is a human figure who can be seen from the breast up, looking with penetrating gaze on the world. This wheel is the circle of divine mercy, which fights the arts of the Devil by the secret power of God, and builds a spiritual structure in human minds. It rolls in the air, now touching the power of God's justice and now confirming His work in people. And in it appears Contempt of the World, a Christian perfection, seen as far down as the breast of her fortitude. For this virtue, trusting in God in the severest of struggles, reminds people who are living in the secular world with her penetrating warnings to imitate the example of the Son of God, Who went before them, rejecting worldly things and desiring Him with an unalterable mind. And in the southern corner of the building, another figure appears standing on the pavement inside, turning most joyfully toward the youth. For when fallen Man was restored to life and fruitful ardor through the goodness of the Supernal Father, this virtue showed itself openly in sweet affection, trod secular things underfoot and turned toward the Son of God in company of the angels and faithful people. For she blossomed by the power of Heaven in the Incarnation of the Savior.

BOOK THREE

22 Their appearance and dress

And all these figures resemble each other; for with similar devotion they manifest God in those people who magnify Him in their works. So, like the other virtues you have seen, they are all clad in silk garments. For they are equal in power to the other virtues you were truly shown before, and they are equally tending upward toward God in the gentle activity of their sweet work in the faithful.

All of them are veiled with white head-veils; which is to say that they all consecrate themselves before God their Head with great devotion to the pure propositions of the Law, as a wife veils herself before her husband. Except the right-hand one of the three mentioned above, who is bareheaded and has white hair; for she manifests herself in strength and felicity through the Heavenly Trinity, not weighed down by any earthly care, and in the purity of her heavenly desire seeks only to depart and be with Christ. None of them wears a cloak, for they have been divested of all duties of servitude that might hinder them from the duties of freedom: to gaze perpetually into Heaven and long for God, desiring nothing unless it is separate from earthly things. Except the middle one of these three, who has a white cloak; this signifies her perseverance in the divine beauty of the conscious keeping of the blessed Law. For this virtue is wrapped and covered in this work as a person is wrapped in his cloak.

But they are all clothed in white tunics; which is to say that they live in the purity of good works, without the blackness of depraved habits darkened by the villainies and vices of blind infidelity. Except the one in the wheel, who has a black tunic; for she moves with the swiftness of divine clemency, and lives amid the deeds whose stringency is difficult for the flesh. And the left-hand one of the three, whose tunic is pale-colored; for she is surrounded and defended by God's supreme Majesty in adversity, and protected by the sorrow of the work she does, weeping and wailing and sighing to God. All are shod in white; for they glow with the death of My Son and prepare the way of peace in human minds so that those minds can desire celestial things. Except the middle one of the three, whose shoes are black and painted with different colors; for she, though she remains under God's protection, bears the divisions of the faithless, who turn aside into black mockery from the way of truth. But she is in the path of righteousness, and trusts in the death of My Son; and so she perseveres in strength and beauty through the many attacks of the Devil and the many tribulations of the human spirit, and makes her way toward heavenly things.

But there is a divergence between them; for, though they are of one mind and join to do their work, each one separately shows her powers over the people subject to her in heavenly fervor and clarity.

23 On Constancy

So the middle figure of the three who stand together symbolizes Constancy, who is the pillar and rampart of the virtues who join with her. She reveals herself to people in the center of this number, which signifies the Holy Trinity, showing them that they should be constant in good works. For indeed Christ, Who was God and Man, crowned His works in the world with a good end; and so this virtue is the foundation of the other inner virtues in people, and by her discipline leads them to God. And so on her breast are two little windows; which is to say that in human hearts the things of Heaven are manifested in two mirrors of faith. For there must be faith in both the divinity and the humanity of the Son of God, through Whom the virtue of Constancy, perfected by the strength of His righteousness, shall not be removed from people. Above these windows is a hart, facing the right side of the figure. For the Son of God is elevated by the belief of the Christian people above the faith that He is God and Man, and in His swiftness, which represents Celestial Desire, He faces the right side of Constancy. For eternal life is to be found by perseverance in good works. Therefore the hart's forefeet are above the right window and its hind feet above the left, poised to run; for when He hastened with great suffering to the Passion of the Cross, His course brought Him the salvation of souls and true life to those who persevere. And so this virtue points out, in her already quoted words of avowal.

24 On Celestial Desire

And the figure on her right prefigures Celestial Desire, who always looks up to Heaven and moves toward salvation, even as Constancy does not seek the joys of the transitory but desires the felicity of the eternal. She contemplates the hart; for she continually longs for the Son of God and His shining work, and cannot be sated with His sweet embraces. And so she affirms in her discourse on her desire, already quoted.

25 On Compunction of Heart

But the figure standing on the left indicates Compunction of Heart, and that memory in the mind that bemoans and weeps for its exile with intense contrition. By her blessed lamentations Constancy turns away from the left, the side of the soul's perdition, and hastens from death to life. And so she looks at the little windows; for, acting in the hearts of the faithful, she directs all her intention to the Son of God, Who reigns in Humanity and Divinity. And she delights in the sweetness of this continuous vision, as she shows openly in her words, already quoted.

26 On Contempt of the World

And the figure who is opposite the North in a wheel indicates the perfection of Christ in Contempt of the World; for the Son of God most clearly shows the fullness of virtue in the rejection of secular things. For He, living among humans, did not pant for earthly things; and so He admonished His imitators to strive eagerly after the heavenly. She has a blossoming twig in her right hand; for, in the happiness of a saved soul, she holds fast the fresh and beautiful shoot of blessed virtues, bathed in the breath of the Holy Spirit. And so the wheel revolves without ceasing, but the figure within it remains motionless; for the mercy of God bends down to humans and has compassion on their miseries, and so is always available to those who seek it, but the perfection of Christ in Contempt of the World has no instability or fickleness, but always turns to what is immutable.

And on the perimeter of the wheel is written, "If anyone serves Me, let him follow Me; and where I am, there also shall My servant be." This is to say that the abundant mercy of God has this quality: Whoever does service to the Son of God by imitating His example will rejoice in heavenly beatitude, and will attain to the endless company of the angels.

And so on the breast of the figure is carved, "I am the sacrifice of praise in all lands." For Christ wisely taught disdain for secular things, and imparted to the hearts of His elect that every faithful soul should venerate and adore Him with deepest devotion as the sacrifice of the Father, offered on the wood of the cross. For the voices and tongues of all the faithful continually make His glory and praise resound through the whole world, thanking Him for their restoration to life, as this virtue clearly manifests in her already quoted discourse.

27 On Concord

And the figure who stands in the southern corner signifies Concord, who flies from the madness of the evil spirits and embraces the company of the blessed angels; for love of God she avoids the quarrels of the faithless, and longs for the vision of eternal peace. Hence she is so bright of face that you cannot look fully at her; for she is devoid of deadly hate and envy, and so brings greater glory to human souls than the mortal mind, weighed down by the frail body, can grasp. She has a white wing on either side, each broader than the figure herself; which is to say that this virtue extends the protection of her shining goodness to those who tire themselves out in righteous work both in prosperity and in adversity. Her charity to human beings is broader than the whole expanse of the multitudes of people who are yet to be born. And when the world has ended, she will fly above the heaven of heavens in greater glory than she appears in now; for then nothing earthly and transitory will be sought, but what is celestial and eternal will be sweetly embraced, and all glorious and beautiful things will endure while all clouds of injustice are dispersed. And this is truly predicted in this virtue's words.

28 Good deeds are shown in the strong faith and perfect works of believers

And you see that all the pavement of the building appears like white glass, which shines with a calm splendor. This is to say that the strength of true faith supports and expands the work and the city of God, shining pure and clear in its candor and mirror-like simplicity. Faith watches and builds the city of God with all the works done in her. And so when people begin to do good works with a calm and bright intention, they touch God; and when they perfect the works, their souls are saved and they know Him profoundly. For when the work is accomplished, faith herself shows the devotion with which each soul has sought God.

BOOK THREE

29 God cast down the ancient serpent by the fortitude of faith

And the splendor of the Shining One seated on the throne, Who is showing you all these things, shines brightly through that pavement even into the abyss. For the grace of Almighty God, Who rules all and manifests to you all the things you are learning in this vision, reduced the Devil to nothingness and the perdition of death through the fortitude of faith. How? When the Son of God charged His faithful to publish to the world the teachings received from Him, God in His power pierced the darkness of unbelief with the pure faith that is in the regeneration of the Spirit and water, and cast down the ancient serpent and the eternal death of perdition he brought into the abyss of chaos.

30 Pagans, Jews and false Christians are expelled from the Church on high

But between the building and the circle where it extends from the One on the throne the earth is visible, sloping downward, so that the building suddenly seems to be placed on a mountain. This is to say that between the strong power of Almighty God and the chosen works of His goodness there stand people who deny the true faith and follow the temporal instead of the eternal. Such are pagans, Jews and false Christians; they descend from evil to evil, and, ignoring the teaching of the Catholic faith about the transitory, try in their pleasures to draw out wicked deeds into the deepest sins. But the great and beautiful work of God, in the height of His supreme goodness, shines out clearly amid this dark misery to anyone who seeks it, as the beloved Evangelist John testifies by divine revelation, saying:

31 Words of John on this subject

“And he took me up in the spirit to a great and high mountain; and he showed me the holy city Jerusalem, coming down out of Heaven with the glory of God” [Revelation 21:10–11]. This is to say: The Spirit lifts up the spirit. How? The Holy Spirit, by Its power, draws the human mind out of the heavy flesh, that it may share in the vision of the Spirit, Whose eyes are not obscured by the blindness of carnal pleasure, and Who sees the inner things. What does this mean? The Holy Spirit lifts the human spirit upward to the mountain of heavenly desires, that it may clearly see the works to be done in the Spirit, the great works of God. A thousand deeds of the Devil lie prostrate before these works, and they tower over them as a mountain rises above the level surface of the earth; they have an immovable foundation, like a mountain, which does not leave its place; they are so high that mortals cannot encompass them by their reason, for they surpass the most excelling human wisdom, which springs from minds that are of the earth and earthly.

VISION TEN

And thus the work of the Spirit is shown to the faithful and holy soul: The heavenly Jerusalem is to be built spiritually, without the work of physical hands, through work given by the Holy Spirit. The greatness and loftiness of these works of the Spirit are manifest, for that city will be adorned by good works performed by people touched by the Holy Spirit. It will be situated upon a hill, with countless buildings assembled from the most noble of stones: the holy souls in the vision of peace, purified from all taint of sin. And so, with these precious stones it will shine like gold; for wisdom displays her brightness in good people. But where did they come from—these works performed in righteous justice, which adorn the celestial Jerusalem? From the height of Heaven; for, as the dew descends from the clouds and sprinkles the earth with its moisture, good works descend on people from God, watered by the rain of the Holy Spirit. And so the person of faith brings forth good sweet fruit, and attains to the company in the supernal city. And the heavenly works, which descend on humans by the gift of the Holy Spirit, have the brightness of Him from Whom they emanated. How? The glory of God shines in the good works of the just, making Him known, adored and worshipped the more ardently on earth. And through the virtues the holy city is adorned with their ornaments, because people who with God's help do good works worship Him in His countless wonders. And so by this revelation the eyes of the spirit see and know that by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit righteous human works appear before God in the regions of Heaven.

32 God will bring the Church to her consummation and confound the Devil

And so, as has been shown, God works from the East to the North to the West to the South, and brings to that consummation which is the last day, for love of the Church in His Son, all that was predestined before the creation of the world. He produces His work through Himself, and draws it back to Himself confirmed and adorned and completed in the highest perfection. And this is mystically symbolized by the aforesaid towers and virtues. How? When Adam fell, the justice of righteous actions was revived in Noah, surrounded with many miracles, and extended throughout time till the last day. And God did not cease to manifest this by His elect in different times: in the preparation of Noah [east corner], the manifestation in Abraham and Moses [north corner], and the consummation in His Son [west corner].

BOOK THREE

How? Before time began the desire was in the heart of the Celestial Father to send His Son into the world at the end of time, to save and redeem lost humanity. And the Son, born of the Virgin, fulfilled with a perfect work all things foretold by the Old Testament saints, inspired by the Holy Spirit. It was as when, to perform an action, first the human arm bends and then the hand works. What does this mean? When Adam, by God's just judgment, was cast out of the flowering land, justice first began to move in Noah, like the joint of the shoulder. Then it broadened into more definite manifestations in Abraham and Moses, like the more flexible elbow joint. And finally it came to perfection in the Son of God, through Whom all the signs and marvels of the old Law were publicly fulfilled, and through Whom all the virtues, which will adorn the heavenly Jerusalem in her children, are declared in the regeneration of the Spirit and water, as the hand with its fingers accomplishes and puts the final touches on a work. And thus I perfect My work, to My glory and your confusion, O Devil! I have opposed you by the strength of My arm in the North and the West, and resisted you from the East to the South, as far as the sun's course runs. And in the West I have so undermined you that you are utterly confounded. For in My Church, which is the mountain of fortitude, I do the work of justice and sanctity, and destroy you, O shameful impostor. You wanted My people to be destroyed; and you yourself will be conquered and destroyed utterly.

But let the one who has ears sharp to hear inner meanings ardently love My reflection and pant after My words, and inscribe them in his soul and conscience.

THE END OF TIMES

VISION ELEVEN

The Last Days and the Fall of the Antichrist

Then I looked to the North, and behold! five beasts stood there. One was like a dog, fiery but not burning; another was like a yellow lion; another was like a pale horse; another like a black pig; and the last like a gray wolf. And they were facing the West. And in the West, before those beasts, a hill with five peaks appeared; and from the mouth of each beast one rope stretched to one of the peaks of the hill. All the ropes were black except the one that came from the mouth of the wolf, which was partly black and partly white. And lo, in the East I saw again that youth whom I had first seen on the corner of the wall of the building where the shining and stone parts came together, clad in a purple tunic. I now saw him on the same corner, but now I could see him from the waist down. And from the waist down to the place that denotes the male he glowed like the dawn, and there a harp was lying with its strings across his body; and from there to the width of two fingers above his heel he was in shadow, but from there down to the bottom of the feet he was whiter than milk. And I saw again the figure of a woman whom I had previously seen in front of the altar that stands before the eyes of God [p. 169]; she stood in the same place, but now I saw her from the waist down. And from her waist to the place that denotes the female, she had various scaly blemishes; and in that latter place was a black and monstrous head. It had fiery eyes, and ears like an ass', and nostrils and mouth like a lion's; it opened wide its jowls and terribly clashed its horrible iron-colored teeth. And from this head down to her knees, the figure was white and red, as if bruised by many beatings; and from her knees to her tendons where they joined her heels, which appeared white, she was covered with blood. And behold! That monstrous head moved from its place with such a great shock that the figure of the woman was shaken through all her limbs. And a great mass of excrement adhered to the head; and it raised itself up upon a mountain and tried to ascend the height of Heaven. And behold, there came suddenly a thunderbolt, which struck that head with such great force that it fell from the mountain and yielded up its spirit in death. And a reeking cloud enveloped the whole mountain, which wrapped the head in such filth that the people who stood by were thrown into the greatest terror. And that cloud remained around the mountain for a while longer. The people who stood there, perceiving this, were shaken with great fear, and said to one another: "Alas, alas! What is this? What do you think this was? Alas, wretches that we are! Who will help us, and who will deliver us? For we know not how we were deceived. O

BOOK THREE

Almighty God, have mercy on us! Let us return, let us return; let us hasten to the covenant of Christ's Gospel; for ah, ah, ah! we have been bitterly deceived!" And lo, the feet of the figure of the woman glowed white, shining with a splendor greater than the sun's. And I heard the voice from Heaven saying to me:

1 The five ferocious epochs of temporal rule

All things that are on earth hasten to their end, and the world droops toward its end, oppressed by the weakening of its forces and its many tribulations and calamities. But the Bride of My Son, very troubled for her children both by the forerunners of the son of perdition and by the destroyer himself, will never be crushed, no matter how much they attack her. But at the end of time she will rise up stronger than ever, and become more beautiful and more glorious; and so she will move sweetly and delightfully to the embraces of her Beloved. And this is mystically signified by the vision you are seeing. For you look to the North, and behold! five beasts stand there. These are the five ferocious epochs of temporal rule, brought about by the desires of the flesh from which the taint of sin is never absent, and they savagely rage against each other.

2 The fiery dog

One is like a dog, fiery but not burning; for that era will produce people with a biting temperament, who seem fiery in their own estimation, but do not burn with the justice of God.

3 The yellow lion

Another is like a yellow lion; for this era will endure martial people, who instigate many wars but do not think of the righteousness of God in them; for those kingdoms will begin to weaken and tire, as the yellow color shows.

4 The pale horse

Another is like a pale horse; for those times will produce people who drown themselves in sin, and in their licentious and swift-moving pleasures neglect all virtuous activities. And then these kingdoms will lose their ruddy strength and grow pale with the fear of ruin, and their hearts will be broken.

5 The black pig

And another is like a black pig; for this epoch will have leaders who blacken themselves with misery and wallow in the mud of impurity. They will infringe the divine law by fornication and other like evils, and will plot to diverge from the holiness of God's commands.

VISION ELEVEN

6 The gray wolf

And the last is like a gray wolf. For those times will have people who plunder each other, robbing the powerful and the fortunate; and in these conflicts they will show themselves to be neither black nor white, but gray in their cunning. And they will divide and conquer the rulers of those realms; and then the time will come when many will be ensnared, and the error of errors will rise from Hell to Heaven. And then the children of light will be pressed in the winepress of martyrdom; and they will not deny the Son of God, but reject the son of perdition who tries to do his will with the Devil's arts.

And these beasts are facing the West; for these fleeting times will vanish with the setting sun. For people rise and set like the sun, and some are born, and some die.

7 The five peaks and the five ropes

And in the West, before those beasts, a hill with five peaks appears; for in these peaks is symbolized the power of carnal desire. And from the mouth of each beast one rope stretches to one of the peaks of the hill; for each of those powers will extend throughout the period in question. All the ropes are black except the one that comes from the mouth of the wolf, which is partly black and partly white. For the length of the ropes indicates how far people are willing to go in their stubborn pleasures; but though the one that symbolizes greed is partly black and puts forth many evils, yet some will come from that direction who are white with justice. And these latter will hasten to resist the son of perdition by ardent wonders, as My servant Job indicates about the righteous doer of justice, when he says:

8 Words of Job

"The innocent shall be raised up against the hypocrite, and the just shall hold to his path; and to clean hands he shall add strength" [Job 17:8-9]. Which is to say:

One who is innocent of bloody deeds, murder and fornication and the like, will be aroused like a burning coal against one who deceives in his works. How? This latter speaks of honey but deals in poison, and calls a man friend but stifles him like an enemy; he speaks sweet words but has malice within him, and talks blandly to his friend and then slays him from ambush.

BOOK THREE

But one who has a rod with which to drive away vile brutes from himself walks in the light of the shining sun on the righteous path of his heart; he is raised up in the sight of God as a bright spark and a clear light and a flaming torch. And so, bearing in himself the strongest and purest works, he puts them on like a strong breastplate and a sharp sword, and drives away vice and wins virtue.

9 The Church will shine in her justice until the time of Antichrist

And therefore, in the East you see again that youth whom you first saw on the corner of the wall of the building where the shining and stone parts come together, clad in a purple tunic, now standing on the same corner. For here is the Sunrise of Justice, the Son of Man, manifest to you to confirm the truth afresh through His mysteries and miracles; still presiding over the union of reflective knowledge and human deeds, having shed His blood by the will and goodness of the Father for the salvation of the world. So now you can see him from the waist down; for now you see Him in the strength of His members who are His elect, and He will flourish as Bridegroom of the Church, with many obscure signs and wonders, until their number is complete. And from the waist down to the place that denotes the male he glows like the dawn; for until the time of the son of perdition, who will pretend to be the man of strength, His faithful members will be perfected in fortitude and He will be splendid in the justice of His righteous worshippers. So, in the same place, a harp is lying with its strings across his body; which signifies the joyful songs of those who will suffer dire torments in the persecution that the son of iniquity will inflict upon the chosen, torturing their bodies so much that they are released from them and pass over into rest.

10 The Church's faith will be in doubt until the witness of Enoch and Elijah

And from there to the width of two fingers above his heel he is in shadow. For, from the time of the persecution the faithful will suffer from the son of the Devil until the testimony of the two witnesses, Enoch and Elijah, who spurned the earthly and worked toward heavenly desires, faith in the doctrines of the Church will be in doubt. People will say to each other with great sadness, "What is this they say about Jesus? Is it true or not?"

11 Before the end of the world the Devil will perish and the truth be known

But from there down to the bottom of the feet he is whiter than milk. That is to say that, by the testimony of those same witnesses who await the eternal reward when the son of perdition is defeated, before the world ends the Son of Man will be brilliantly and beautifully seen in the Catholic faith. The truth will be plainly shown in Him, and the falsity of the son of iniquity rejected in every way, as My servant David testifies when he says:

VISION ELEVEN

12 Words of David

“The king shall rejoice in God; all they that swear by Him shall be praised; for the mouth of them that speak wicked things is stopped” [Psalm 62:12]. Which is to say: The profound knowledge of the beautiful human language that gives voice to the will and disposition of God is a great measure of human stature; and it makes music at the altar of God, for it knows Him. And when the hissing and gaping of the Devil, which taints human minds with shame, is forsaken in the time of desperation, the blessed will be praised in minds that sing, and they will make a flowing path of words to the pure fountain of the mighty Ruler.

13 When justice grows cold the Church will undergo suffering and persecution

And you see again the figure of a woman whom you previously saw in front of the altar that stands before the eyes of God, standing in the same place. For the Bride of the Son of God is shown to you again, to reveal the truth, always present to the pure prayers of the saints and, as was said before, offering them up devotedly to the eyes of Heaven. But now you see her from the waist down; for you see her in her full dignity as the Church, replete with the full number of her children, in the mysteries and wonders by which she has saved so many. And from her waist to the place that denotes the female, she has various scaly blemishes. This is to say that, though she is now flourishing worthily and laudably in her children, before the time in which the son of perdition will try to perfect the trick he played on the first woman, the Church will be harshly reproached for many vices, fornication and murder and rapine. How? Because those who should love her will violently persecute her.

14 Antichrist will horribly rend the faithful and cruelly tear humanity

And thus in the place where the female is recognized is a black and monstrous head. For the son of perdition will come raging with the arts he first used to seduce, in monstrous shamefulness and blackest wickedness. It has fiery eyes, and ears like an ass', and nostrils and mouth like a lion's; for he runs wild in acts of vile lust and shameful blasphemy, causing people to deny God and tainting their minds and tearing the Church with the greed of rapine. It opens wide its jowls and terribly clashes its horrible iron-colored teeth; for with his voracious and gaping jaws he evilly infuses those who consent to him with his strong vices and mordant madness.

BOOK THREE

15 The son of perdition, unable to be gentle, will try to persecute

And from this head down to her knees, the figure is white and red, as if bruised by many beatings; for the son of perdition will try to seduce people by evil deceptions, and at first speak to them flatteringly and gently, but then try cruelly to pervert and force them. And then the Church will know purity of faith in her children, but anguished and bloody terror and the tribulations of many sufferings for herself.

16 The Church near the end of the world will be bathed in righteous blood

And from her knees to her tendons where they join her heels, which appear white, she is covered with blood. For at the time near the end of the world when she must endure assault, until the coming of the two witnesses of Truth who will keep the Church together by their strength, she will suffer most terrible persecutions, and the blood of those who despise the Destroyer will be most cruelly shed. What does this mean? When the son of perdition is strengthened through deceit, and derives confidence from his perverse teachings, the Church, as she hastens on, will be bathed in the noblest blood; and then she will be fully constructed as the celestial dwelling. For you, O streets of Jerusalem, will then shine with the purest gold which is the blood of the saints; the Devil will be extinguished for persecuting the members of the Supernal King, and his great terror will be reduced to naught.

17 We are now in the seventh millennium

But, O ye people who desire to dwell in those streets, flee from the Devil and adore God, Who created you! For in six days God completed His works, and on the seventh day He rested. What does this mean? The six days are the six numbered epochs; and in the sixth epoch the latest miracles were brought forth in the world, as God finished His work on the sixth day. But now the world is in the seventh epoch, approaching the end of time, as on the seventh day. How? The prophets have completed their utterances, My Son has accomplished His will in the world, and the Gospel has been preached openly throughout all lands; and throughout the times of this full number and more years after it, despite the diversity of human customs, the world has remained as it was well-established by Me.

- 18 Why God now utters new mysteries by the mouth of an unlearned person

But now the Catholic faith wavers among the nations and the Gospel limps among the people; and the mighty books in which the excelling doctors had summed up knowledge with great care go unread from shameful apathy, and the food of life, which is the divine Scriptures, cools to tepidity. For this reason, I now speak through a person who is not eloquent in the Scriptures or taught by an earthly teacher; I Who Am speak through her of new secrets and mystical truths, heretofore hidden in books, like one who mixes clay and then shapes it to any form he wishes.

- 19 God's warning to the learned not to spurn these words but exalt them

O fruitful and rewarding teachers! Redeem your souls and loudly proclaim these words, and do not disbelieve them; for if you spurn them, you condemn not them but Me Who am Truth. For you should nurture My people under My law, and care for them until the time for their supervision is past, and all cares and labors cease. But from now on the predestined epoch is approaching, and you are hastening toward the time when the son of perdition will appear. Grow therefore in vigor and fortitude, My elect! Be on your guard, lest you fall into the snare of death; raise the victorious banner of these words, and rush upon the son of iniquity. For those who forerun and follow the son of perdition whom you call Antichrist are in the way of error; but as for you, follow the footsteps of Him Who taught you the way of truth, when He appeared with humility and not with pride in the world in the body. Hear therefore and understand.

- 20 The words of the Holy Spirit to the Church about the last days

For the Spirit speaks to the Church about the time of the final error. In the end of times death shall rush upon the Church, when the accursed, the son of the curse, shall come; and he is the curse of curses, as My Son testifies in the Gospel about the worst city of error, saying:

BOOK THREE

21 The Gospel on this subject

“And you, Capernaum, will you be exalted up to Heaven? You will go down into Hell” [Matthew 11:23]. Which is to say: O you cave of iniquity, you concealing ditch, with your wings of hypocrisy and pretense! How can you stand on the high place of the walls, when your eyes devour the wickedness of vice, hiding the burning light under a bushel of excrement? You say, “Who is as great as the hypocrite and murderer, since the foolish call him Lord?” Will you have the signs and wonders of Heaven, when you dip your finger in Hell? How? Your works probe the bottom of Hell, and in its voracity you will lie swallowed up; and Hell will vomit forth your stench, so that the world may see the bitterness of death for the destroyer who has destroyed.

22 When the world is dissolved in the elements, the Church will be completed

But a head without a body or other members should not be. The Head of the Church is the Son of God; the body and the other members are the Church and her children. The Church is not yet perfect in her members and her children; but on the last day, when the number of the elect is filled up, the Church will also be full. And on that last day the whole world will be confounded; I, God, will take away the four elements and all that is mortal in human flesh, and in the consummation of the world there will be full joy for the offspring of the Church.

23 The world is in its seventh epoch, and Man cannot know what will follow

For, as was said, God completed His work in six days. Five days represent five numbered epochs; and in the sixth, new wonders were manifested on earth, as on the sixth day the first man was created. And now the sixth number is complete and the seventh has come, and the course of the world is fixed in, as it were, the seventh day of rest. For now that work which the mighty doctors kept sealed in the holy Scriptures is revealed; it is openly expounded in gentle words, like the words of this book, as if on a Sabbath of rest. For there are six days of work and a seventh of rest; there is no other number of days. And what lies beyond cannot be known to you, O human, but is in the keeping of the Father. But you, O humans, have a time to traverse from now on, until the coming of that murderer who will try to pervert the Catholic faith. But as to what may happen then, it is not for you to know the time or the moment, even as you cannot know what comes after the seven days of the week; for only the Father knows this, Who has placed these things in His power. And about the days of the week and the times of the ages, it is not for you, O human, to know more.

VISION ELEVEN

24 How God willed His Son to be incarnate

But after five numbered epochs I brought forth heavenly miracles for the world, as in five days the other creatures were created before Man and subjected to Man. For up to then there was a large population of pagans and Jews, and various schisms and evils were increasing among both the Gentile and the Jewish peoples. The Law and the prophets had finished their work, and all the peoples had been tested for evil and for good, before my Only-Begotten took flesh from the Virgin. For I did not will to send Him until all these things had first taken place, so that all justice might be tried by Him and all injustice offended by Him. If My Son had come earlier, it would have been premature, like a person who wants to gather his fruits before they ripen; and if His Incarnation had been postponed until the very end of the world, He would have come too abruptly, like a fowler who catches birds by trickery, so that they know not how they fell into his nets. But My Son came, as it were, at the ninth hour, when the day is turning to evening; when the heat of the day is declining, and the cold is setting in. And so after five epochs of the world, My Son showed Himself to the world as it began to move toward its end. What then? He came and laid bare the essence of the Law, changing its water into the wine of the Gospel; and so He caused floods of virtue to stream forth. And He came opportunely to do this, when the churchly virtues the Holy Spirit enkindled could take root and grow in humans, and the virginity He brought in Himself could bud and flower.

25 Antichrist and his mother

But the insane murderer, the son of perdition, will come soon, when the last times descend and the earth forsakes its course; as if at the time when day departs and the sun goes down to its setting. O My faithful ones, hear this testimony, and understand it with devotion that you may be safe, lest the terror of the destroyer should come upon you unawares and cast you into the ruin of infidelity and perdition. Arm yourselves therefore, and prepare yourselves for the most strenuous battle, forewarned with firm defenses. For the time will come in which this vile deceiver will horribly appear. The mother who will bring this deceiver into the world will be nurtured in vice from her infancy to her girlhood by the arts of the Devil, living among the most abominable people in the vilest of waste places. Her parents will not recognize her, and those with whom she stays will not know her; for the

BOOK THREE

Devil, pretending to be a holy angel, will persuade her to go away from them and guide her deceptively as he wishes. She will separate herself from all people, so as to conceal herself more easily; and then she will secretly engage in vile fornication with men, though only a few, defiling herself with them with a great appetite for wicked doings, as if her holy angel commanded her to do this deed of shame. And in the burning heat of this fornication, she will conceive the son of perdition without knowing which man's semen engendered him.

And Lucifer, the ancient serpent, will take delight in this turpitude, and by My just judgment will breathe on the embryo and possess it with all his power in its mother's womb. And so that destroyer will issue from the womb of that mother full of the Devil's spirit. Then she will stop her habitual fornications and declare to the unwise and foolish people that she has no husband, and knows not the father of her infant. And she will call the fornication she has done holy, and the people will think and call her holy.

And the son of perdition will be nurtured by the Devil's arts until he comes to full adulthood, always withdrawing from people who know him.

26 Antichrist will learn magic from his mother and God will allow it

And throughout this time, his mother by magic arts of hers will show him both to the worshippers and to the non-worshippers of God, and he will be seen and loved by them. And when he reaches maturity, he will teach a doctrine that is clearly perverse, thus fighting against Me and My elect; and he will gain such strength that in his great power he will try to raise himself above the clouds. But it is by My just judgment that I will permit him to do his will on various creatures. For as the Devil said in the beginning, "I will be like the Most High," and fell, I will lead him to fall in the last days, when he will say through this son of his, "I am the savior of the world!" And as every age of the faithful knew that Lucifer was a liar when he tried at the beginning of time to be like God, so now every person of faith will see that the son of iniquity is a liar, making himself like the Son of God before the last day.

27 The power of Antichrist and the miracles he will seem to do

For he is the evil beast, who kills those who deny him; he will join with kings, dukes, princes and the rich, crushing humility and exalting pride, and by the Devil's arts subjecting the whole world to himself. His power will issue forth like the wind; he will seem to set the air in motion and bring forth fire and lightnings from heaven, and raise thunders and hailstorms, to uproot mountains and dry up water, to take the greenness from forests and give it back again. In many parts of Creation he will display his illusions, in moisture and freshness and dryness. And he also will cause unceasing deceptions in people. How? He will seem to make the healthy sick and the sick healthy, to cast out devils, and sometimes to raise the dead. How? When someone departs from this life whose soul is in the power of the Devil, by My permission he will sometimes perform illusions on his corpse, making it move as if alive; but he is allowed to do this only occasionally, for a very short time and no longer, lest his presumption bring God's glory into scorn. Some people who see this will trust in him; and others will wish both to keep their earlier faith and to win his favor. And, choosing not to afflict these latter too severely, he will bring illness upon them. They will seek medicine from doctors, but will not be cured; and so they will return to him to see whether he can cure them. And when he sees them he will take away the weakness he brought upon them; and so they will love him dearly and believe in him. And so many will be deceived, for they will blind their own inner vision with which they should have regarded Me. For they will use their minds to probe this novelty their outer eyes see and their hands touch, and despise the invisible things that abide in Me and must be understood by true faith. For mortal eyes cannot see Me, but I show My miracles in the shadows to those I choose. No one shall see Me while he remains in a mortal body, except in the obscurity of My mysteries; for so I spoke to My servant Moses, as it is written:

28 Words of Moses on the vision of God

"For no one shall see Me and live" [Exodus 33:20]. This is to say that no one who is mortal shall fix his mortal gaze on the glory of My Divinity and continue to live his mortal life in his corruptible ashes; for he changes with passing time, leaving one life and passing to another, while I, Who established all living things, live without change. And as a gnat cannot live if he plunges into a flame, so a mortal could not remain alive if he were to see the glory of My Divinity. And so I show Myself to mortals in obscurity as long as they are weighed down by their mortality; like a painter showing people invisible things by the images in his painting.

But, O human, if you love Me, I embrace you, and I will warm you with the fire of the Holy Spirit. For when you contemplate Me with a good intention and know Me by your faith, I will be with you. But those who despise Me turn to the Devil, and choose not to know Me; and therefore I too reject them.

BOOK THREE

- 29 Dupes of the Devil show omens in creatures, but cannot control them

But the Devil makes sport of these people, and deceives them however he likes, so that they think that what he shows them is true. And the Devil imparts this art of deceiving to those who trust in him, so that they can at will show people by this fallacious art various portents in creatures. But they cannot in any way alter the elements or other creations of God; they simply feign monstrosities like nebulous apparitions to deceive those who believe in them. And as Adam, seeking more than was right for him to have, lost the glory of Paradise, so these people let slip their inner vision and hearing, forsaking God and worshipping the Devil.

- 30 How Antichrist will deceive his followers and why it will be allowed

And in this way the son of perdition will practice his deceitful arts on the elements, and show in them the beauty and sweetness and delight desired by those he deceives. And this power will be permitted to him for one purpose: that the faithful may perceive in their faith that the Devil has no power over the good, but only over the evil, whose lot is eternal death. For whatever this son of iniquity brings to pass, he will do with power, pride and cruelty, for he has no mercy, humility or wisdom; he will incite people to follow him by his domination and the wonders he shows. And he will acquire for himself many peoples, telling them to do their own will and not restrain themselves by vigils or fasting; he will tell them that they need only love their God, Whom he will pretend to be, and then they will be delivered from Hell and attain to life. And they, being so deceived, will say, "Oh, woe to the wretches who lived before these times! For they made their lives miserable with dire pains, not knowing, alas, the loving kindness of our God!" He will show them his treasures and riches, and allow them to feast as they will, confirming his teaching by deceitful signs so that they think they need not restrain or chastise their bodies in any way. He will command them to observe circumcision and the Jewish laws and customs, but will alleviate for them as much as they want the stronger commands of the Law, which the Gospel, by worthy penance, converts into grace. And he will say, "When anyone is converted to me, I will blot out his sins, and he shall live with me forever." He will throw out baptism and the Gospel of My Son, and scorn all the precepts handed down to the Church. And he will say, with devilish mockery: "See what a madman that was, Who through His falsehoods decreed that the simple people should observe these things!"

VISION ELEVEN

31 The pretended death of Antichrist, and his accursed scripture afterward

“But I will die for you and to your glory, and rise again from death; and so I will deliver my people from Hell, that you may live gloriously with me in my kingdom, as that deceiver pretended He had done before.” And he will tell his beloved ones to run him through with a sword and wrap him in a clean shroud, until the day of his resurrection. And he will delude them into thinking they are killing him, and so they will fulfil his commands. Then he will pretend to rise again, and bring out a writing as if for the salvation of souls, which is really a dire curse. And he will give this to people for a sign and command them to adore him. And if any person of faith refuses for love of My name, he will kill that person in great suffering and torture. And thus all who see and hear this will be struck with great wonder and doubtful amazement, as My beloved John shows, saying:

32 Words of John

“And I saw one of his heads as if slain unto death; and his death’s wound was healed. And all the earth marvelled at this beast” [Revelation 13:3]. This is to say:

I, the lover of God’s mysteries, saw the deceiver and the accursed surrounding the holiness of the saints with great and countless iniquities, and wearying them with many vices. By his lying arts he will pretend he is pouring out his blood in death and perishing; he will be thought to be stricken and dying, but he will not fall in the body but in a deceiving shadow. And, having deceived people with these false wounds and pretended to be dead, he will pretend to come back to life as if from the sleep of death. And everyone in the world will stand in terrible amazement, horrified at this accursed man as the people were amazed at the great size and strength of Goliath when he appeared before them armed for war.

And so, as you see, the pillars of My elect will be troubled by great wonder, both by their torments and by the perverse and marvellous and horrible signs that the son of perdition will produce; and they will lament in mournful anguish.

33 Enoch and Elijah, and why they are reserved to this time

But then I will send forth My two witnesses, whom I will hold back until this time in My secret will: Enoch and Elijah. They will resist him and bring back those who err to the way of truth. They will show the faithful the strongest and solidest virtues; for when the words of their witness in each of their mouths agree with each other, they will augment the faith of their hearers. For these two witnesses of the truth were reserved so long by Me so that now, when they will appear, their discourse may be held and confirmed in the hearts of My elect, and through it the seed of My Church may survive in humility. And to the children of God whose names are written in the book of life, they will say:

34 Their words to the children of God

“O ye who are righteous and elect and gloriously praise the graces of the blessed life, hear and understand what we confidently tell you. This accursed one was sent by the Devil to lead into error the souls who submit to his commands. We have been secluded from this world and reserved in the secret places of God, so that we have had no human care or anguish; and we were reserved and sent to you now so that we may contradict the errors of this destroyer. See therefore if we are like you in bodily stature or age.”

35 Their true signs by which the Antichrist will be cast down

And all who choose to know and confess the true God will follow these two aged witnesses of truth, carrying the banner of God's justice and abandoning the iniquitous error. For they will be radiant with praise before God and the people; they will hasten through the villages and roads and cities, wherever the son of perdition has breathed out his perverse doctrine, and perform in them signs by the Holy Spirit, so that all who see them will marvel greatly. These great signs, founded on the firm rock, will be given to them that they may reject the perverse and false signs. For as lightning kindles and burns, so does the son of perdition do his wicked acts in iniquity, burning the people with his magic arts as lightning burns; but Enoch and Elijah will terrify and cast out his whole cohort with the thunderbolt of righteous doctrine, and so fortify the faithful.

36 How they will be killed by God's permission and receive their reward

But by the consent of My will, Enoch and Elijah will at last be killed by Antichrist; and then they will receive in Heaven the reward of their labors. And the flowers of their doctrine will fade because their voices have ceased in the world; but they will bear fruit among the elect, who will despise the words and the ravings of the Devil's arts because they are set on the hope of a heavenly inheritance. Solomon tells this of a good and perfect person, saying,

VISION ELEVEN

“The house of the just is in great strength, but in the fruits of the wicked is trouble” [Proverbs 15:6]. Which is to say:

In the righteous person, the reflection of the eye of God is a vivid inner dwelling where weariness and misery are not; and God’s eye sees His wonders in this person like a sword eager to strike. But the deeds that come forth like growing fruits from the proud heart, which erects ruins on its pleasures, will bring only sadness; for the proud heart does not trust in that hope which blossoms in the fullness of Heaven.

37 Antichrist, trying to learn the secrets of Heaven, will strike the Church

Now you see that that monstrous head moves from its place with such a great shock that the figure of the woman is shaken through all her limbs. This is to say that the son of perdition, the head of iniquity, will raise himself in his great arrogance and pride from the small error of his inherent wickedness, and seize upon a greater one, wanting to be exalted above all people. And when his deceptions are thus about to end, the whole Church and all her children, great and small, will be cast into extreme fear, as they watch his mad presumption. And a great mass of excrement adheres to the head, which raises itself up upon a mountain and tries to ascend the height of Heaven; for the mighty arts of the Devil, which bring with them so much filth, will help the son of iniquity, give him the wings of pride, and raise him to such great presumption that he will think he can also penetrate the secrets of Heaven. How? When he has completely fulfilled the Devil’s will, and by God’s just judgment his great power for iniquity and cruelty is no longer allowed to increase, he will assemble all his cohort and tell those who believe in him that he wants to go to Heaven. But, even as the Devil did not know that the Son of God was born to redeem souls, so also this worst of men, entangling himself in the evil of evils, will be ignorant that the mighty hand of God is about to strike him a blow.

38 God’s power will strike the son of perdition and send him to damnation

And behold, there comes suddenly a thunderbolt, which strikes that head with such great force that it falls from the mountain and yields up its spirit in death. For God’s power will manifest itself and destroy the son of perdition, striking him with such jealousy that he will fall violently from the height of his presumption, in all the pride with which he stood against God. And, so ending, he will vomit forth his life in the death of eternal perdition. For, as

BOOK THREE

My Son's temptations ended when He said to His tempter, "Begone, Satan!" and the Devil fled in terror, so now those trials the son of iniquity inflicted on the Church will be ended by My jealousy.

39 The place of pride will become so fetid that the deceived will turn back

And a reeking cloud envelops the whole mountain, which wraps the head in such filth that the people who are standing by are thrown into the greatest terror. For the impure and hellish stench will fill the whole place of his pride, in which that worst of criminals boiled with such uncleanness. And, by God's just judgment, neither his beginning nor his end will be remembered, and the people, seeing his corpse prostrate on the ground, voiceless and rotting, will know that they were deceived. And that cloud remains around the mountain for a while longer; for the smell of that devilish pride will show it to be impure, and thus the people seduced by him will perceive that stench and that impurity, and turn from their error and come back to the truth. For the people who stand there, perceiving this, are shaken with great fear; when they see these things the greatest horror will assail them, and they will pour out doleful words and tearful complaints, and admit that they have grievously sinned.

40 When Antichrist is dead the Church will shine to recall the erring

And lo, the feet of the figure of the woman glow white, shining with a splendor greater than the sun's. This is to say that when the son of perdition is laid prostrate, as was said, and many of those who had erred return to the truth, the Bride of My Son, standing on a strong foundation, will manifest purity of faith and the beauty that surpasses all the beauty of the glories of earth.

41 None but God can know the day of judgment

But after the wicked one has fallen, let no mortal ask when the last day and the dissolution of the world will come. For he cannot know it, because the Father has hidden it as a secret. Prepare yourselves therefore, O humans, for the judgment. But, as was said, the son of perdition and his father the Devil with all his arts will be conquered in the last days by My Son, the mighty Warrior. This was prefigured when the enemies of the mighty Samson were cast down, as it is written:

VISION ELEVEN

42 Example of Samson

“And when he strongly shook the pillars, the house fell on all the princes and the rest of the multitude that was there. And he killed many more at his death than he had killed before in his life” [Judges 16:30: cf. chaps. 14–16 complete]. This is to say:

The Son of God, symbolized by the mighty Samson, first wed the Synagogue; to her He gave the secrets of His wonderful doctrine, which were hidden in the Old Testament, and benignly disclosed to her the inner sweetness of the Law, which was stronger than a lion. But the Synagogue deceived Him and caused His secrets to be mocked; she refused to respect His doctrine, but despised it in arrogant pride. Troubled by this, He foretold that the kingdom of God would be taken from the Synagogue and given to another nation. Thus, amid many prodigies and amid a great crowd, He went up to Jerusalem; and the unbelief of those who spread their garments in the way came to an end when He paid by miracles what He had promised those to whom His bride had betrayed Him.

And in this turbulence He left His bride, prophesying that her house would be left desolate. But the father of His bride, Seduction of the Devil, married her to another husband, Infidelity. Then the Son of God sent out wise foxes, the apostles, who burned the standing corn of His enemies with the fire of the Holy Spirit; that is, they turned the precepts of the Law to spiritual insight. And so the Synagogue was burned with her father, which is to say that her perverse infidelity was overthrown.

Then, with great signs and wondrous miracles, He struck down the unbelieving, so that all trembled in great amazement. And they said they feared the Romans would come and take away their country and people; and therefore they gathered their cohort to destroy Him. And He hid on a hill, and prayed, if it might be, for this cup to pass from Him.

But Judas Iscariot betrayed Him, delivering Him into the hands of His enemies. And He concealed the might of His strength, which was in His hair, which is to say in His Father; which was unknown to all the people except those who grasped it by faith, as hair can be grasped on a human head. But He showed the might of His strength afterward, when He chose to suffer, wielding as it were the jawbone of an ass; for He told the daughters of Jerusalem to weep not for Him but for themselves, and thus “killed” them by predicting to them the terror of the evils to come.

And in His affliction on the cross, when He thirsted a fountain of faith sprang from the Gentiles; and He did not blush to drink from it, declaring that so it was accomplished. And when He gave up the ghost, He descended into Gehenna, as it were, to the harlot; and His enemies tried to take Him by setting guards at His sepulchre. But He rose again from death, carrying away the two doors, His special elect and the common people whom He freed from Hell. And so He sought the heavenly kingdom. And then His beautiful Bride, the Church, asked Him diligently after their marriage how she might know His strength. And He revealed His powers to her not all at once, but little by little, discreetly.

How? When the faithful first received the Catholic faith, some of them thought to walk in both the old and the new Law until they had reached perfect rectitude; as it were, in sinews still moist and not yet completely dried. And the Church, still inexperienced, said to the crowds, "This is the strength of my Bridegroom!" And the people, hearing these words, wanted to come and worship God all at once by the book and not to live by the promptings of the Holy Spirit. But His strength is not in this. Then virginity was nobly constituted, which had never before been deemed glorious, like new ropes, which had never bound anything. And this binding strongly held the Son of God, but did not capture Him fully. But the Church raised herself and said, "O my friends, these are the greatest powers of my Bridegroom!" And all at once, with great tumult, many people rushed upon Him, saying, "We have seized Him in His greatest strength!" But not thus is His strength manifested. And then the Church was assured of the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, as it were His seven locks of hair, fastened by a strong nail to the apostolic preachers as a foundation. And when she had thus woven faith, the Church cried out, "Oh, how strong is my Bridegroom in His seven locks of hair!" And all the peoples who heard her seized upon Him, thinking that this was the limit of His strength. But again, His strength is not thus known.

And so the Church shed many tears, because she did not know the strength of the Holy Trinity; she said that she had indeed seen the humanity of the Son of God, but had not yet perfectly understood His Divinity. Moved by this, He manifested by His beloved John such secrets of the Holy Trinity as it was lawful for Man to know, in the honor of the Father and the fire of the Holy Spirit. And He laid His head upon the heart of His Bride; and He will rest there until the great schisms that will come with the son of perdition. And then His strength will be cut off as He is robbed of His hair; for people in that time will choose to follow the son of perdition and not Him, saying, "How is this, O God, that we see such wondrous miracles?" And so His strength will be cajoled, and true faith clouded with the blindness of infidelity. But when Enoch and Elijah appear, His strength will return to Him; and He will shatter by force all pride and presumption. He will hurl down the son of perdition with all the arts and vices of the Devil; and when the Church and the Christian name have passed over from the present temporal age to eternity, He will crush the Devil's evil much more severely than He did when divine worship flourished in the world within time. What does this mean? That when time ends, the temporal persecutions of the Devil and deeds of human virtue will both cease.

But let the one who has ears sharp to hear inner meanings ardently love My reflection and pant after My words, and inscribe them in his soul and conscience.

THE DAY OF JUDGMENT

THE NEW HEAVEN AND THE NEW EARTH

VISION TWELVE

The New Heaven and the New Earth

*A*fter this I looked, and behold, all the elements and creatures were shaken by dire convulsions; fire and air and water burst forth, and the earth was made to move, lightning and thunder crashed and mountains and forests fell, and all that was mortal expired. And all the elements were purified, and whatever had been foul in them vanished and was no more seen. And I heard a voice resounding in a great cry throughout the world, saying, "O ye children of men who are lying in the earth, rise up one and all!"

And behold, all the human bones in whatever place in the earth they lay were brought together in one moment and covered with their flesh; and they all rose up with limbs and bodies intact, each in his or her gender, with the good glowing brightly and the bad manifest in blackness so that each one's deeds were openly seen. And some of them had been sealed with the sign of faith, but some had not; and some of those signed had a gold radiance about their faces, but others a shadow, which was their sign.

And suddenly from the East a great brilliance shone forth; and there, in a cloud, I saw the Son of Man, with the same appearance He had had in the world and with His wounds still open, coming with the angelic choirs. He sat upon a throne of flame, glowing but not burning, which floated on the great tempest which was purifying the world. And those who had been signed were taken up into the air to join Him as if by a whirlwind, to where I had previously seen that radiance which signifies the secrets of the Supernal Creator; and thus the good were separated from the bad. And, as the Gospel indicates, He blessed the just in a gentle voice and pointed them to the heavenly kingdom, and with a terrible voice condemned the unjust to the pains of Hell, as is written in the same place. Yet He made no inquiry or statement about their works except the words the Gospel declares would be made there; for each person's work, whether good or bad, showed clearly in him. But those who were not signed stood afar off in the northern region, with the Devil's band; and they did not come to this judgment, but saw all these things in the whirlwind, and awaited the end of the judgment while uttering bitter groans.

And when the judgment was ended, the lightnings and thunders and winds and tempests ceased, and the fleeting components of the elements vanished all at once, and there came an exceedingly great calm. And then the elect became more splendid than the splendor of the sun; and with great joy they made their way toward Heaven with the Son of God and the blessed armies of the angels. And at the same time the reprobate were forced with great howling toward the infernal regions with the Devil and his angels; and so Heaven received the elect, and Hell swallowed up the reprobate. And at once such great joy and praise arose in Heaven, and such great misery and howling in Hell, as were beyond human power to utter. And all the elements shone calm and resplendent, as if a black skin had been taken from them; so that fire no longer had its raging heat, or air density, or water turbulence, or earth shakiness. And the sun, moon and stars sparkled in the firmament like great ornaments, remaining fixed and not moving in orbit, so that they no longer distinguished day from night. And so there was no night, but day. And it was finished.

And again I heard the voice from Heaven, saying to me:

- 1 In the last days the world will be dissolved in disasters like a dying man

These mysteries manifest the last days, in which time will be transmuted into the eternity of perpetual light. For the last days will be troubled by many dangers, and the end of the world will be prefigured by many signs. For, as you see, on that last day the whole world will be agitated by terrors and shaken by tempests, so that whatever is fleeting and mortal in it will be ended. For the course of the world is now complete, and it cannot last longer, but will be consummated as God wills. For as a person who is to die is captured and laid low by many infirmities, and in the hour of his death suffers great pain in his dissolution, so too the greatest adversities will precede the end of the world and at last dissolve it in terror. For the elements will then display their terrors, because they will not be able to do so afterward.

- 2 All creation will be moved and purified of all that is mortal in it

And so, at this consummation, the elements are unloosed by a sudden and unexpected movement: all creatures are set into violent motion, fire bursts out, the air dissolves, water runs off, the earth is shaken, lightnings burn, thunders crash, mountains are broken, forests fall, and whatever in air or water or earth is mortal gives up its life. For the fire displaces all the air, and the water engulfs all the earth; and thus all things are purified, and whatever was foul in the world vanishes as if it had never been, as salt disappears when it is put into water.

VISION TWELVE

3 The bodies of the dead will rise again in their wholeness and gender

And when, as you saw, the divine command to rise again resounds, the bones of the dead, wherever they may be, are brought together in one moment and covered with their flesh. They will not be hindered by anything; but if they were consumed by fire or water, or eaten by birds or beasts, they will be speedily restored. And so the earth will yield them up as salt is extracted from water; for My eye knows all things, and nothing can be hidden from Me. And so all people will rise again in the twinkling of an eye, in soul and body, with no deformity or mutilation but intact in body and in gender; and the elect will shine with the brightness of their good works, but the reprobate will bear the blackness of their deeds of misery. Thus their works will not there be concealed, but will appear in them openly.

4 The risen who are signed and unsigned

And some of them are sealed with the sign of faith, but some are not; and the consciences of some who have faith shine with the radiance of wisdom, but the consciences of others are murky from their neglect. And thus they are clearly distinguished; for the former have done the works of faith, but the latter have extinguished it in themselves. And those who do not have the sign of faith are those who chose not to know the living and true God either in the old Law or in the new Grace.

5 The Son will come to the judgment in human form

And then the Son of God, in the human form He had at His Passion when He suffered by the will of the Father to save the human race, will come to judge it, surrounded by the celestial army; He will be in the brightness of eternal life, but in the cloud that hides celestial glory from the reprobate. For the Father vouchsafed to Him the judging of the visible things of the world, because He had lived visibly in the world; as He Himself shows in the Gospel, saying:

6 The Gospel on this subject

“And He has given Him power to judge, because He is the Son of Man” [John 5:27]. Which is to say:

The Father has borne witness to His Son. What does this mean? The Father gave power to the Son, because He remained with the Father in divinity but received humanity from a mother; and, because He is human, He received also from the Father that every creature should feel Him as the Son of God, for all creatures were created and formed by God. And therefore all deeds will be judged by the Son, whatever their nobility or baseness, and He will put them in their proper order. For, as He was a man palpable and visible in the world, He can justly distinguish all that is visible in the world. And He will appear in His power of judging terrible to the unjust but gentle to the just, and judge them so that the very elements will feel the purgation.

7 The signed will be taken up easily to meet their Judge

And those who are signed are taken up to meet the Just Judge not with difficulty but with great speed, so that in them, who had faith in God, the works of faith may clearly be seen. And, as was shown you, the good are separated from the bad, for their works are dissimilar. For here it is apparent how both the bad and the good have sought God, in infancy and childhood and youth and old age.

8 All God's flowers, the great heroes of the Church, will appear radiant

And here all the flowers of My Son will shine out in radiance; that is to say, the patriarchs and prophets who lived before His Incarnation, the apostles who lived with Him in the world, the martyrs, confessors, virgins and widows who have faithfully imitated Him, the holders of high office, both secular and spiritual, in My Church, and the anchorites and monks who chastised and mortified their flesh and imitated the humility and charity of the angels in their garments, thus belittling themselves for My Son's name. Those who seek Me in the contemplative life because they think that life is more glorious than another are as nothing to Me; but any who seek Me in humility in that life because the Holy Spirit inspired them to do so, I will put in the first ranks in the celestial homeland.

9 Amid the silence of Heaven, the Son will give sentence on all

Then the heavens will subdue their praises and remain awhile in silence, while the Son of God pronounces judicial sentence both on the just and on the unjust. And they will give ear with reverence and honor to how He decides; and He will gently grant supernal joys to the just, and terribly consign the unjust to the pains of Hell. And there will be no further excuses or questions about human works, for here the consciences of both the good and the bad are naked and revealed.

VISION TWELVE

10 Why the good and the bad need to be judged

Now the just, who will receive the words of the most equitable Judge, have indeed done many good works, but while they lived in the world they did not act with fullness of perfection, and therefore their deeds must now be judged. And the unjust, who will suffer a severe judgment against them, have indeed done much evil; but they did not act in ignorance of the Divine Majesty, in the wicked unbelief that would damn them without judgment. And so they will not escape the Judge's sentence, for all things must be weighed equitably.

11 Unbelievers are already judged and so will not come to the judgment

But those who are not signed in faith, because they did not believe in God, will tarry in the North, the region of perdition, with the Devil's band, and not come to this judgment. But they will see it all in obscurity and await its end, groaning deeply within themselves because they persevered in unbelief and did not know the true God. For they neither worshipped the living God in the Old Testament before the institution of baptism, nor received the remedy of baptism in the Gospel, but continued under the curse of Adam's fall, with its penalty of damnation. And therefore they are already judged, for the crime of infidelity.

12 When the judgment is finished, a great calm will arise

And when the judgment is ended, the terrors of the elements, the lightnings and thunders and winds and tempests, will cease, and all that is fleeting and transitory will melt away and no longer be, like snow melted by the heat of the sun. And so, by God's dispensation, an exceedingly great calm will arise.

13 Glory will receive the elect and Hell swallow up the damned

And thus the elect will become splendid with the splendor of eternity, and with My Son their Head and the glorious celestial army will embrace glory and the heavenly joys; while the reprobate, together with the Devil and his angels, will wretchedly direct their course toward eternal punishment, where eternal death awaits them for following their lusts instead of My commands. And so Heaven will receive the elect into the glory of eternity, because they have loved the Ruler of the heavens; and Hell will swallow up the reprobate, because they did not renounce the Devil. And then such great joy and praise will resound in the glory of Heaven and such great groaning and howling will arise in

BOOK THREE

Hell as to exceed the grasp of the human understanding. For the first have eternal life and the second eternal death, as My Son declares in the Gospel, saying:

14 The Gospel on this subject

“And these shall go into everlasting punishment; but the just into life everlasting” [Matthew 25:46]. Which is to say: Those who befoul themselves in the house of evil passions, and do not thirst to drink justice from the Supreme Goodness, will come in the course of their infidelity and wickedness to submersion in the pains of eternal perdition, and according to their deeds will receive the torments of Hell. But the builders of the heavenly Jerusalem, who faithfully stand in the gates of the daughter of Zion, will be radiant in the eternal life, which the fruitfulness of the chaste Virgin miraculously gave to all believers.

15 How the elements and heavenly bodies will be changed, and night ended

And, as you see, when all these things are over the elements will shine out with the greatest brightness and beauty, and all blackness and filth will be removed from them. And fire, without its raging heat, will blaze like the dawn; air without density will be completely limpid; water without its power to flood or drown will stand transparent and calm, and earth without shakiness or roughness will be firm and level. And so all these will be transformed into great calm and beauty.

And the sun and moon and stars will sparkle in the firmament like precious stones set in gold, with great glory and brilliance; and they will no longer restlessly revolve in orbit so as to distinguish day from night. For the world will have ended and they will have become immutable; and from that time on there will be no darkness, and day will be perpetual. As My beloved John witnesses, when he says:

16 Words of John

“And there shall be no more night, and they will not need the light of the lamp or the light of the sun; for the Lord God will illumine them” [Revelation 22:5]. Which is to say: One who possesses a treasure sometimes hides it and at other times shows it, and even so night conceals the light, and day drives out the darkness and brings light to humanity. But it will not be so when time is transformed; for then the shade of night will be put to flight and its darkness will not appear from that time on. For in this transmutation the light people now light to dispel the darkness will not be needed; and the sun will not move and by its motion bring times of darkness. For then the day will be without end; for the Ruler of all, in the immutable glory of His Divinity, will illumine those who in the world have by His grace escaped the darkness.

VISION TWELVE

But let the one who has ears sharp to hear inner meanings ardently love My reflection and pant after My words, and inscribe them in his soul and conscience.

THE CHOIRS OF THE BLESSED

VISION THIRTEEN

Symphony of the Blessed

Then I saw the lucent sky, in which I heard different kinds of music, marvellously embodying all the meanings I had heard before. I heard the praises of the joyous citizens of Heaven, steadfastly persevering in the ways of Truth; and laments calling people back to those praises and joys; and the exhortations of the virtues, spurring one another on to secure the salvation of the peoples ensnared by the Devil. And the virtues destroyed his snares, so that the faithful at last through repentance passed out of their sins and into Heaven.

And their song, like the voice of a multitude, making music in harmony praising the ranks of Heaven, had these words:

1 Songs to holy Mary

O splendid jewel, serenely infused with the Sun!
The Sun is in you as a fount from the heart of the Father;
It is His sole Word, by Whom He created the world,
The primary matter, which Eve threw into disorder.
He formed the Word in you as a human being,
And therefore you are the jewel that shines most brightly,
Through whom the Word breathed out the whole of the virtues,
As once from primary matter He made all creatures.

O sweet green branch that flowers from the stem of Jesse!
O glorious thing, that God on His fairest daughter
Looked as the eagle looks on the face of the sun!
The Most High Father sought for a Virgin's candor,
And willed that His Word should take in her His body.

For the Virgin's mind was by His mystery illumined,
And from her virginity sprang the glorious Flower.

And again a song resounded:

2 To the nine orders of heavenly spirits

O glorious living light, which lives in Divinity!
Angels who fix your eyes with ardent desire

BOOK THREE

Amid the mystical darkness surrounding all creatures
On Him with Whom your desires can never be sated!
O glorious joy, to live in your form and nature!
For you are free from every deed of evil,
Although that evil first appeared in your comrade,
The fallen angel, who tried to soar above God,
And therefore that twisted one was submerged in ruin.
And then for himself a greater fall he prepared
By his suggestions to those whom God's hand made.

O angels with shining faces who guard the people,
O ye archangels, who take just souls into Heaven,
And you, O virtues and powers, O principalities,
Dominions and thrones, who by five are secretly counted,
And you, cherubim and seraphim, seal of God's secrets,
Praise be to you all, who behold the heart of the Father,
And see the Ancient of Days spring forth in the fountain,
And His inner power appear like a face from His heart.

And again they sang:

3 To the patriarchs and prophets

O eminent men, who traversed the hidden ways,
And looked with the eyes of the spirit, and in lucent shadows
Announced the Living Light that would bud from the stem
Which blossomed alone from the Light that rooted within it!

O ancient saints, you foretold the souls' salvation
Who were sunk in death; like wheels you turned and circled,
And wondrously spoke of the Mount That touches Heaven.
And then He came, and anointed the many waters,
And so the shining light arose among you,
And, going before Him, displayed the Mount Himself.

O happy roots, from whom miracles and not vices
Grew in the burning way of lucent shadow!
And you, O fiery voice of meditation
Who went before the abyss-sealing Cornerstone;
Rejoice in your Head, in the One Whom so many among you
Invoked with ardor, yet never on earth beheld.

And another song was sung:

VISION THIRTEEN

4 To the apostles

O warrior cohort of the thornless Flower!
Your sound fills the world, traversing the realm of the senses,
Where madmen feast and defile themselves with swine;
And you, infused with the Comforter, conquered them.
O noble race of the Savior, whose roots are fixed
In the tabernacle of the Word's complete labor,
You take by the Lamb the path of the water's salvation.
He sent you armed with a sword amid dogs most savage,
Who with the work of their fingers destroyed their glory,
Subjecting the Handlessly Made to their hands' own makings.

O lucent crowd of apostles, in truest knowledge
You rose to open the Devil's mighty prisons
And cleanse his slaves in the fount of living waters.
You are the glorious light in the blackest darkness,
The pillars that prop the jewelled Bride of the Lamb,
Whose banner-bearer first was the Virgin Mother,
For joy of the Lamb, Who weds the immaculate Bride.

And another song resounded:

5 To the martyrs

O ye who have poured out your blood in triumph,
And conquered a share in the blood of the Lamb who perished,
Feasting upon the slain calf's sacrifice,
And so built the Church, what a great reward is yours!
Alive, you followed the Lamb, and despised your bodies,
Adorned His pains, and so recaptured your portions.

O rose blossoms, blessed in the joy of your blood's effusion!
Your fragrant blood flowed forth from the inner counsel
Of Him Who has been always, without beginning,
And planned before time began His great redemption.

Your company is honor, whose blood abounded
To build the Church in the stream from your noble wounds.

And another song was sung:

BOOK THREE

6 To the confessors

O ye who succeed and serve the mighty Lion,
And rule between the temple and the altar,
The angels sing praises and stand to help the peoples,
And so do you, in the Lamb's service careful.

O ye who imitate the Most Exalted,
In His most precious and glorious Sacrament!
How great is your glory, in which the power is given
To loose and bind the indolent and the straying,
To beautify white and black, and lift their burdens.

Yours too is the office of the angelic order,
And yours is the task of knowing the firm foundations
And where to lay them; and therefore great is your honor.

And another song resounded:

7 To the virgins

O lovely faces who look on the face of God
And build in the dawn; O noble blessed virgins!
The King took thought for you, sealing you to His purpose
And decking you with all ornaments of Heaven,
And so you are a garden adorned in sweetness.

O noble verdure, which grows from the Sun of splendor!
Your clear serenity shines in the Wheel of Godhead,
Your greatness is past all earthly understanding,
And Heaven's wonders surround you in their embrace.

You glow like dawn, and burn like the Sun in glory.

And another song was heard, like the voice of a multitude breaking out in melodic laments over the people who had to be brought back to that place:

8 The lament over the ones to be recalled

Oh, this is a voice of sorrow and great lamenting!
Ah! ah! what a wonderful victory has arisen:
The desire for God, while carnal pleasure flees!
But oh, alas! how few were the wills that were sinless,
How few the desires that fled from lust to You!

VISION THIRTEEN

Mourn, mourn then, Innocence, you whose modest goodness
Has never failed, nor craved what the Serpent showed you,
For people respected, though they neglected you.

O Living Fountain, how great is Your sweet compassion!
You never lost sight of the face of the straying people,
But saw in advance the way that You would save them
From the fallen angels, who thought they had reft them from You.

O daughter of Zion, rejoice that God restores you
So many cut off from you by the ancient serpent,
Who now shine brighter than ever they shone before.

The Living Light now says of the ones He rescued,
“The guileful serpent I flouted in his seduction,
His work was not so perfect as once he thought it.
I swore by Myself, and I did more, far more,
For them than he did to them. And so your joy
Is ended, your snares destroyed, and all your greed
Is come to nothing, O wickedest of impostors!”

And again a song was heard, like the voice of a multitude, exhorting the virtues to help humanity and oppose the inimical arts of the Devil. And the virtues overcame the vices, and by divine inspiration people turned back to repentance. And thus the song resounded in harmony:

9 The exhortation of the virtues and the fight against the Devil

THE VIRTUES: We virtues are in God, and there abide; we wage war for the King of Kings, and separate evil from good. We appeared in the first battle, and conquered there, while the one who tried to fly above himself fell. So let us now wage war and help those who invoke us; let us tread underfoot the Devil's arts, and guide those who would imitate us to the blessed mansions.

SOULS (in the body, lamenting): Oh, we are strangers, wandering off toward sin! What have we done? We should have been daughters of the King, but we fell into the darkness of sin. O living Sun, carry us on Your shoulders into the just inheritance, which we lost in Adam! O King of Kings, let us fight in your battle!

A FAITHFUL SOUL: O sweet Divinity and O lovely Life, in Whom I may put on a robe of glory, and receive what I lost in the beginning! I long for You, and I call upon the virtues.

VIRTUES (answering): O blessed soul! O sweet creature of God, who were formed in the depths of God's profound wisdom, you have loved much.

BOOK THREE

THE SOUL: Oh, I come to you gladly; give me the kiss of the heart!

VIRTUES: We must join with you in the battle, O daughter of the King.

THE SOUL (burdened and complaining): Oh, burdensome labor! Oh, heavy load I must endure while garbed in this life! It is most hard for me to fight against the flesh.

VIRTUES: O soul created by God's will, O happy instrument! Why are you so weak against the thing God has crushed by the Virgin? Through us you must conquer the Devil.

THE SOUL: Help, support me, that I may stand firm!

KNOWLEDGE OF GOD: See what it is that you are clothed with, O daughter of salvation, and stand firm! Then you will never fall.

THE SOUL: Oh, I know not what to do or where to flee! Woe is me! I cannot use rightly that which clothes me. I want to tear it off!

VIRTUES: O bad conscience, O wretched soul! Why do you hide your face in the presence of your Creator?

KNOWLEDGE OF GOD: You do not know or see or taste Him Who created you.

THE SOUL: God created the world; I do Him no wrong if I want to enjoy it.

THE DEVIL (whispering to the soul): Fool, fool! What good is your labor? Regard the world, and it will embrace you with honor.

VIRTUES: Alas, alas! Virtues, let us loudly lament and mourn; for a sheep of the Lord is fleeing from life.

HUMILITY: I, Humility, queen of the virtues, say: Come to me, all of you virtues, and I will strengthen you, so that you can seek the lost coin and give it the crown of blessed perseverance!

VIRTUES: O glorious queen, O sweetest mediator! We come gladly.

HUMILITY: Beloved daughters, I keep you in the King's wedding chamber. O daughters of Israel, God raised you under His tree, so now remember your planting. Rejoice, O daughters of Zion!

THE DEVIL (to the virtues): What good is it that there should be no power but God's? I say that I will give everything to the one who follows me and his own will; but you and all your followers have nothing to give, for none of you knows who you are.

HUMILITY: I and my companions know well that you are the ancient dragon, who tried to fly higher than the Most High, and was thrown into the deepest abyss by God Himself.

VIRTUES: But all of us dwell on high.

THE SOUL (in the body, repentant and lamenting): O royal virtues! How beautifully you shine in the Supreme Sun! How sweet is your dwelling! Oh, woe is me, I fled from you!

VISION THIRTEEN

VIRTUES: Come, O fugitive, come to us! and God will receive you.

THE SOUL: Alas, alas! Burning sweetness plunged me into sins; I dare not enter with you.

VIRTUES: Do not fear or flee; the Good Shepherd seeks you, His lost sheep.

THE SOUL: Now I need you to take me back, for I fester with wounds the ancient serpent has dealt me.

VIRTUES: Run to us, and follow with us that path in which you will never fall; and God will heal you.

THE SOUL: I am a sinner who fled from Life; I must come to you full of sores, that you may offer me the shield of redemption.

VIRTUES: O fugitive soul, be firm, and put on yourself the armor of light!

THE SOUL: O soldiery of the Queen, O white lilies and crimson roses, look gently upon me! I have lived as a stranger and an exile from you; help me to rise up in the blood of the Son of God! O Humility, who are true healing, help me; for Pride has broken me with many vices, and wounded me with many scars. Now I fly to you; oh, receive me!

HUMILITY (to the virtues): O virtues all, for the sake of Christ's wounds receive this mourning sinner, scarred as she is, and bring her to me.

VIRTUES (to the soul): We will bring you back, and we will not desert you; the whole celestial army rejoices over you! And so we will sing a song of rejoicing.

HUMILITY (to the soul): O unhappy daughter, I will embrace you; for the great Physician for your sake suffered deep and bitter wounds.

THE DEVIL (whispering to the soul): Who are you, and whence do you come? You embraced me, and I led you forth; and now you return and confound me! But I will throw you down in battle.

THE SOUL (to the Devil): I recognized that all your ways are evil, and so I fled from you. And now, O impostor, I fight against you! (To Humility): O Queen Humility, help me with your healing remedy!

HUMILITY (to Victory and the other virtues): O Victory! You conquered the Devil in Heaven; run now with your companions, and all bind this Devil!

VICTORY (to the virtues): O strong and glorious soldiers, come and help me conquer this deceiver!

VIRTUES (to Victory): O sweetest warrior in the flowing fountain that engulfed the ravenous wolf! O you crowned with glory, we gladly fight with you against the deluder of souls.

HUMILITY: Bind him, O splendid virtues!

VIRTUES: O queen, we will obey you, and do your commands in all things.

BOOK THREE

VICTORY: Rejoice, comrades! The ancient serpent is bound!

VIRTUES: Praise be to you, O Christ, King of the angels! O God, Who are You Who had this great counsel in You? It destroyed the hellish drink, which poisoned the publicans and sinners; and they now shine in celestial goodness. Praise therefore be to You, O King! O Father Almighty, from Your ardent heat flows the fountain; guide your children with a favorable wind on the waters, that we may lead them into the celestial Jerusalem.

And these voices were like the voices of a multitude lifting up its sound on high. And their song went through me, so that I understood them perfectly.

And I heard a voice from the shining sky, saying to me:

10 God must be unceasingly praised for His grace with heart and voice

Praises must be offered unceasingly to the Supernal Creator with heart and mouth, for by His grace he sets on heavenly thrones not only those who stand erect but those who bend and fall.

Thus, O human, you see the lucent sky, which symbolizes the brilliance of the joy of the citizens of Heaven; in which you hear different kinds of music, marvellously embodying all the meanings you heard before. You hear the praises of the joyous citizens of Heaven, steadfastly persevering in the ways of Truth, and laments calling people back to those praises and joys. For, as the air encloses and sustains everything under the heavens, so the wonders of God, which you have already been shown, are enveloped for you in a sweet and delightful song. It sings with joy of the wonders of the elect who dwell in the heavenly city and eternally express their sweet devotion to God; and it laments over the wavering of those the ancient serpent is trying to destroy, but who will be led to blessed joy by the divine power, and know the mysteries no human mind can know that bows down to the earth. And you hear the exhortations of the virtues, spurring one another on to secure the salvation of the peoples ensnared by the Devil; and the virtues destroy his snares, so that the faithful at last through repentance pass out of their sins and into Heaven. For the virtues in the minds of the faithful resist the vices by which the Devil wearies them, and redeem them; and when their mighty strength conquers these vices, the people who fell into sin return by God's will to repentance, diligently examining and weeping over their former deeds, and weighing and considering their future ones.

11 The song is sung in unity and concord

And so that song, like the voice of a multitude, makes music in praise among the ranks of Heaven. For the song of rejoicing, sung in consonance and in concord, tells of the glory and honor of the citizens of Heaven, and lifts on high what the Word has shown.

VISION THIRTEEN

12 The words are the body and the music the spirit

And so the words symbolize the body, and the jubilant music indicates the spirit; and the celestial harmony shows the Divinity, and the words the Humanity of the Son of God.

13 By this song the sluggish soul is aroused to watchfulness

And as the power of God is everywhere and encompasses all things, and no obstacle can stand against it, so too the human intellect has great power to resound in living voices, and arouse sluggish souls to vigilance by the song.

David shows this by his songs of prophecy and rejoicing; and Jeremiah shows it by the sorrowful voice of his lamentation. And you also, O human, with your poor and frail little nature, can hear in the song the ardor of virginal modesty embraced by the blossoming branch; and the acuity of the living lights, which shine in the heavenly city; and the profound utterances of the apostles; and the outpouring of the blood of the faithful who offer themselves; and the secrets of the priestly office; and the procession of virgins, blooming in the verdancy of Heaven. For the faithful creature rejoices to his Creator in a voice of exultation and gladness, and returns Him perpetual gratitude. And you hear another song, like the voice of a multitude breaking out in melodic laments over the people who have to be brought back to that place. For the song does not only harmonize and exult over those who persevere in the path of rectitude, but also exults in the concord of those who are resurrected from their fall out of the path of justice, and are at last uplifted to true beatitude. For the Good Shepherd has brought back to the fold with joy the sheep that was lost.

And again you hear a song, like the voice of a multitude, exhorting the virtues to help humanity and oppose the arts of the Devil. And the virtues overcome the vices, and by divine inspiration people turn back to repentance; and so their song resounds in harmony. For the sweet alliance of the virtues draws the faithful to true beatitude, though the vices the Devil uses as snares accumulate direly. But the virtues do not merely conquer the vices, but destroy them; and so they lead people who consent to be helped by God to eternal reward by true penitence. And this is shown by the words of their song.

BOOK THREE

14 The song of rejoicing softens the hard heart and summons the Holy Spirit

For the song of rejoicing softens hard hearts, and draws forth from them the tears of compunction, and invokes the Holy Spirit. And so those voices you hear are like the voice of a multitude, which lifts its sound on high; for jubilant praises, offered in simple harmony and charity, lead the faithful to that consonance in which is no discord, and make those who still live on earth sigh with heart and voice for the heavenly reward.

And their song goes through you so that you understand them perfectly; for where divine grace has worked, it banishes all dark obscurity, and makes pure and lucid those things that are obscure to the bodily senses because of the weakness of the flesh.

15 The faithful should rejoice without ceasing

Therefore, let everyone who understands God by faith faithfully offer Him tireless praises, and with joyful devotion sing to Him without ceasing. As My servant David, filled with the spirit of lofty profundity, exhorts on My behalf, saying:

16 Words of David

“Praise Him with the sound of trumpets; praise Him with psaltery and harp. Praise Him with timbrel and dance; praise Him with stringed instruments and flute. Praise Him on high-sounding cymbals; praise Him on cymbals of joy; let every spirit praise the Lord” [Psalm 150:3-5]. This is to say:

You know, adore and love God with simple mind and pure devotion. Praise Him, then, with the sound of trumpets, which is to say by the use of the reason. For when the lost angel and his consenters fell into perdition, the armies of the blessed spirits stood firm in the truth of reason, and with faithful devotion adhered to God.

And praise Him on the psaltery of deep devotion, and the honey-toned harp. For when the trumpet sounds the psaltery follows, and when the psaltery sounds the harp follows; as first the blessed angels stood fast in the love of truth, and then after the creation of Man the prophets arose with their wonderful voices, and then the apostles followed with their words of sweetness.

And praise Him with the timbrel of mortification and in the dance of exultation. For after the harp sounds, the timbrel exults, and after the timbrel, the dance; as after the apostles preached words of salvation, the martyrs endured many bodily torments for the honor of God, and then arose the truthful doctors of the priestly office.

And praise Him with the stringed instruments of human redemption and the flute of divine protection. For after the dance of joy, the voice of the stringed instruments and the flute emerge; as, after the doctors who served beatitude showed the truth, there appeared the virgins, who loved the Son of God, Who was true Man, like stringed instruments and adored Him, Who was true God, like flutes. For they believed Him to be true Man and true God. What does this mean? When the Son of God assumed flesh for human salvation, He did not lose the glory of Divinity; and so the happy virgins chose Him as their Bridegroom, and knew Him with faithful devotion as true Man in betrothal and true God in chastity.

And praise Him too on high-sounding cymbals, which is to say by loud and joyful declarations, whenever people who lay in the depths of sin are touched by divinely inspired remorse and raise themselves from those depths to the height of Heaven.

And praise Him on cymbals of joy, which is to say by statements of praise, whenever the strong virtues gain the victory and overthrow human vice, and lead people who persevere in good works and holy desires to the beatitude of the true recompense.

And so let every spirit who wills to believe in God and honor Him praise the Lord, Him Who is the Lord of all; for it is fitting that anyone who desires life should glorify Him Who is Life.

And again I heard a voice from the lucent sky, saying: "O King most high, praise be to You, Who bring these things to pass in a simple and untaught person!"

And another voice cried out from Heaven with a great shout, saying:

Hear and attend, all you who desire to have heavenly recompense and bliss. O ye people who have believing hearts and await the heavenly reward, take these words and lay them up in your inmost hearts, and do not reject this admonition that comes to you. For I the Living and True Witness of Truth, the speaking and not silent God, say and say again: Who shall prevail over Me? He who tries it I will overthrow. Let not anyone lay hold of a mountain, which he cannot move, but let him abide in the valley of humility. Who walks a road without water? The one who is swayed by the whirlwind, and divides fruit but does not eat it. And how can My tabernacle be there? My tabernacle is the place where the Holy Spirit pours forth His overflowing waters. What does this mean?

I am in the midst. How? Whoever lays hold of Me worthily shall not fall, either as to height or as to depth or as to breadth. What does this mean?

I am that Charity which emulous pride cannot cast down, a fall into the depths cannot dash to pieces and the wide expanse of evils cannot crush. Can

BOOK THREE

I not build as high as the footstool of the sun? The strong despise Me, who show their strength in the valleys; the apathetic leave me at the sound of the tempest; and the learned refuse My food; and so do they all who build towers for themselves according to their own will. But I will confound them through the small and the weak, as I overthrew Goliath by a boy, and conquered Holofernes by Judith. And therefore, if anyone rejects the mystical words of this book, I will draw My bow against him and transfix him by the arrows from My quiver; I will knock his crown from his head, and make him like those who fell in Horeb when they murmured against Me. And if anyone utters curses against this prophecy, may the curse that Isaac uttered come upon him. But anyone who embraces it and keeps it in his heart and makes its ways plain, I will fill with the dew of Heaven.

And whoever tastes this prophecy and fixes it in his memory will become the mountain of myrrh, and of frankincense, and of all aromatical spices, and the diffusion of many blessings; he will ascend like Abraham from blessing to blessing. And the new spouse, the Bride of the Lamb, will take him to herself, for he is a pillar in the sight of God. And the shadow of the hand of the Lord will protect him.

But whoever rashly conceals these words written by the finger of God, madly abridging them, or for any human reason taking them to a strange place and scoffing at them, let him be reprobate; and the finger of God shall crush him.

Praise, therefore, praise God, ye blessed hearts, for the miracles God has wrought in the frail earthly reflection of the beauty of the Most High; as He Himself foreshadowed when He first made Woman from the rib of the man He had created.

But let the one who has ears sharp to hear inner meanings ardently love My reflection and pant after My words, and inscribe them in his soul and conscience. Amen.

Book of the First Monks

Jump to navigationJump to search

The Book of the First Monks (Latin: Decem Libri – Liber de Institutione Primorum Monacharum)^[1] is a medieval Catholic book in the contemplative and eremitic tradition of the Carmelite Order, thought to reflect the spirituality of the Prophet Elijah, honored as the Father of the Order.

Overview

The book is one of the most important documents of the Order because it influenced many of the Carmelite Saints according to the spirituality of the first Carmelite hermits. Some medieval Carmelites thought it antedated the Carmelite Rule of St. Albert, although this is disputed due to a lack of evidence. It is this dispute that has caused this manuscript to be questioned today.^[citation needed]

The original charism of the Carmelite hermits, which still animates the spirituality of many contemporary Carmelites and the cloistered contemplative life of other hermits, monks, and nuns, was in imitation of the Prophet Elijah. Carmelite tradition relates that Elijah inspired the early hermits who settled near the spring on Mount Carmel, Palestine which bears Elijah's name. Most often quoted from the Book of the First Monks is the following passage in which Elijah is named as the spiritual father of the Order:

The goal of this life is twofold. One part we acquire, with the help of divine grace, through our efforts and virtuous works. This is to offer God a pure heart, free from all stain of actual sin. We do this when we are perfect and in Cherith, that is, hidden in that charity of which the Wise Man says: "Charity covers all sins" [Proverbs, 10: 12]. God desired Elijah to advance thus far when [H]e said to him: "Hide yourself by the brook Cherith" [First Kings, 17: 3-4].

The other part of the goal of this life is granted us as the free gift of God: namely, to taste somewhat in the heart and to experience in the soul, not only after death but even in this mortal life, the intensity of the divine [P]resence and the sweetness of the glory of [H]eaven. This is to drink of the torrent of the love of God. God promised it to Elijah in the words: "You shall drink from the brook." It is in view of this double end that the monk ought to give himself to the eremitic and prophetic life.[2]

The book also gives one of the oldest explanations of the Carmelite habit and what each part of the habit signified.

Influence on Carmelites

Exemplars of the contemplative and mystical spirituality described in the book include the Discalced Carmelite Sts. Teresa of Ávila, John of the Cross, Thérèse of Lisieux, and Teresa Benedicta of the Cross (Edith Stein).

The Flowing Light Of The Godhead

In today's fast-paced, mobile-centered world, accessibility is no longer optional — it's essential. The Flowing Light Of The Godhead was designed with that philosophy in mind, offering a seamless learning experience that travels with you across devices, screens, and environments.

The modern reader expects flexibility. You might start reading on a desktop, continue on a tablet, and finish on your phone. The Flowing Light Of The Godhead anticipates this reality by using adaptive formatting and responsive design so that every word, chart, and image remains crystal-clear regardless of screen size.

Each page is lightweight, optimized for fast loading even under limited connectivity. This ensures that learning never stops, whether you're on the train, at a café, or between meetings.

The interface of The Flowing Light Of The Godhead is intentionally uncluttered. Minimal visual noise, logical navigation, and balanced contrast make it comfortable to read for extended periods — an experience that respects your attention span and eyesight.

One of its strongest features is offline accessibility. You can download and open The Flowing Light Of The Godhead without an internet connection, preserving your ability to learn even in remote areas or during travel.

For those with accessibility needs, The Flowing Light Of The Godhead adheres to inclusive design principles. Screen readers, adjustable text sizes, and high-contrast color schemes make the content equally accessible to all users.

We understand that productivity tools today extend beyond hardware. That's why The Flowing Light Of The Godhead integrates smoothly with mobile reading apps, allowing you to highlight, annotate, and synchronize your notes across cloud platforms.

Every heading and paragraph has been structured semantically to improve navigation. Readers using assistive technologies can skip, jump, or search content effortlessly, ensuring an intuitive flow through the material.

Mobile learners often multitask, so The Flowing Light Of The Godhead includes audio-friendly formatting. You can convert it to text-to-speech easily, turning study sessions into hands-free learning experiences.

File size and optimization were major priorities in development. The entire document compresses efficiently, consuming minimal bandwidth without sacrificing visual fidelity or content depth.

Notifications and updates are also mobile-aware. Whenever revisions or enhancements are released, you can receive optional alerts, download changes, and sync your version with a single tap.

Each tutorial segment in The Flowing Light Of The Godhead includes quick actions — small, self-contained lessons that can be completed in minutes. This “microlearning” approach perfectly suits on-the-go users seeking short, productive bursts of education.

Data privacy remains a top concern. All downloads and updates occur through encrypted protocols, ensuring your information stays protected on any device or network.

To enhance usability in varying light conditions, The Flowing Light Of The Godhead supports both day and night viewing modes. These adjustable themes reduce strain during extended reading sessions.

Interactive elements, such as internal links and quick navigation menus, make exploration easy. Even lengthy sections can be reached with one tap, giving you control over how you consume the content.

For visually impaired users, all graphics and illustrations within The Flowing Light Of The Godhead include descriptive alt text. This ensures that no information is lost, regardless of how it's accessed.

Educators can leverage these accessibility features to distribute materials equitably among diverse audiences. The document's compatibility across devices means no learner is left behind due to technology limitations.

Battery optimization was also considered. The minimal color palette and static design reduce energy consumption, extending reading time on portable devices.

For organizations managing teams remotely, The Flowing Light Of The Godhead simplifies content distribution. The same version can be shared across different operating systems, ensuring consistency between departments and devices.

Each improvement in The Flowing Light Of The Godhead reflects a single goal: to remove friction from learning. The more accessible knowledge becomes, the more people it can empower.

By merging portability, accessibility, and design integrity, The Flowing Light Of The Godhead stands as a model of what digital education should look like — universal, reliable, and human-centered.

No matter where you are or what device you hold, the experience remains elegant and consistent. The Flowing Light Of The Godhead ensures that learning travels with you — anytime, anywhere, and for everyone.

Download it once, use it everywhere. That is the future of learning mobility — and The Flowing Light Of The Godhead is already leading the way.

Hildegard of Bingen

HILDEGARD OF BINGEN: SELECTED WRITINGS

TRANSLATED WITH AN INTRODUCTION AND NOTES BY MARK ATHERTON

I. Letter to Bernard of Clairvaux

Bernard of Clairvaux was an obvious person for Hildegard to appeal to for support as she pondered a radical change of course in her life and career. A widely known author and by then a venerable figure, Bernard was the abbot of the principal Cistercian monastery and head of the Cistercian order. He was also well placed to intervene on her behalf with a former monk of Clairvaux, Bernardo Pignatelli of Pisa, who had been elected Pope Eugenius III in the previous year. Bernard was an influential figure in the politics of Church and state, particularly in France and Germany, and at the time of her letter to him he had been preoccupied with preaching journeys in which he sought to gather support for the Second Crusade.

Hildegard to Bernard of Clairvaux, 1146 [Letter 1]¹

Venerable Father Bernard, you are held wonderfully in high honour by the power of God. You are a terror to the unlawful foolishness of the world; you burn in the love of God's son; you are eager to win men for the banner of the Holy Cross to fight wars in the Christian army against the fury of the pagans.² Father, I ask you, by the living God, to attend to my questions.

¹ [Letter I]: The standard numbering of the letters follows the edition of the letters by Lieven Van Acker, Hildegardis Bingensis Epistolarium CCCM 9i-9ia (Turnhout, 1991 and 1993) and the translation by Joseph L. Baird and Radd K. Ehrman, The Letters of Hildegard of Bingen, 2 vols (Oxford, 1994 and 1998). This in turn follows the original manuscript arrangement of the collected correspondence in which the letters are ordered hierarchically according to the rank and importance of the correspondent. Bernard's letter is clearly significant, for it is placed first, even before the various letters to the popes.

I am very concerned by this vision which has appeared to me in the spirit of mystery, for I have never seen it with the external eyes of the flesh. I who am miserable and more than miserable in my womanly existence have seen great wonders since I was a child. And my tongue could not express them, if God's Spirit did not teach me to believe.

Most gentle Father, you are secure; in your goodness please answer me, your unworthy servant, for since I was a child I have never felt secure, not for a single hour! Could you search your soul, in your piety and wisdom, and discover how you are instructed by the Holy Spirit, and pour consolation upon me, your servant, from your heart?

For in the text I know the inner meaning of the exposition of the Psalter and the Gospel and other books shown to me in this vision, which touches my heart and soul like a consuming fire, teaching me these profundities of exposition. But it does not teach me writings in the German tongue — these I do not know — and I only know how to read for the simple meaning, not for any textual analysis.³ Give me an answer as to what you think,

² the banner of the Holy Cross... pagans: A reference to the preparations for the Second Crusade, fought between 1147 and 1149. To 'preach the cross' meant to obtain military support for the Crusade by preaching in towns and cities throughout the country. An account of such preaching (for the Third Crusade 1189-92), and the fervent support it could inspire, is given in the first chapter of The Journey through Wales by Gerald of Wales, trans. Lewis Thorpe (Harmondsworth, 1978), pp. 74-7.

³ the simple meaning... textual analysis: Hildegard claimed a reading knowledge of Latin, as acquired perhaps gradually and subconsciously by many years of participation in the liturgy and by meditated reading of the scriptures and the Fathers of the Church. Other than learning to read the Latin psalms, she had not had access to any formal study of Latin grammar or rhetoric. For a discussion of the ways in which Hildegard could have acquired Latin, see the article by M. Atherton, 'The Visions of Hildegard and the Silent Period. A Case Study of Language Acquisition', System 21, no. 4 (1993), pp. 503-508.

for I am a person ignorant of all teaching in external matters; I am taught inwardly, in my soul. Therefore I speak as one in doubt.

Hearing of your wisdom and piety I am comforted. Because there is so much divisiveness in people I have not dared to speak of these things to any other person except for one monk — whom I tested with regard to the integrity of his monastic life. I revealed all my secrets to him and he consoled me and convinced me that these are great secrets and things to be feared.

Father Bernard, I want you to reassure me, and then I will be certain! In a vision two years ago I saw you as a man able to stare at the sun without flinching, a courageous man. And I wept because I blush so much — because I am so timid! Good Father, through your kindness I have found a place in your soul, so that now, if you will, you can reveal to me through your word⁴ whether you want me to say these things openly or whether I should keep quiet. For I have great trouble with this visionary gift about how much I should say of what I have seen and heard. And sometimes, because I keep quiet, I am laid low by the vision and confined to my sickbed, unable to raise myself up. So I am sad, I lament before you: I am unstable with the movement of the wooden beam of the wine-press in my nature, the beam which grew at the prompting of the devil from the root in Adam (for which he was cast out as a wanderer in this exile world).⁵ But now I raise myself up, I run to you, I speak to you. You are not unstable, you ease the pressure of the wooden beam, you gain the victory in your ⁴ through your word: Hildegard hopes to receive an answer to her letter which she will 'hear' when Bernard's letter is read aloud.

⁵ wooden beam... world: The wooden beam of the wine-press (itself a common image in Hildegard) is linked by a chain of association with ideas of the tree of the Garden of Eden in Genesis and the root of the race of Adam. The associative method is typical of early medieval approaches to the exegesis and interpretation of scripture but is particularly common in Hildegard. It leads to her characteristic 'mixed metaphors', which occur particularly frequently in her songs.

soull! And it is not only yourself alone: you raise up the whole world to salvation! You are the eagle staring at the sun!⁶

And so I entreat you: by the brightness of the Father, by his wonderful Word, by the sweet humour of compunction, by the Spirit of Truth, by the sacred sound through which all creation resounds, by the Word from which all the world was created, by the height of the Father who through the sweet power of green vigour sent the Word to the Virgin's womb where it took on flesh like the honey in the honeycomb! May the sacred sound, the power of the Father, fall upon your heart and raise up your soul so that you are not passive and indifferent to the words of this correspondent, as long as you seek all things from God, from man or woman, or from the mystery, until you pass through the doorway in your soul and know these things in God.

Farewell. Be well in your soul, and strong in your certainty in God. Amen.

⁶ the eagle staring at the sun: The eagle is an image from the tradition of the bestiary, the class of book popular in the medieval period in which natural history is mixed with allegorical explanation. In Hildegard's thought, the eagle represents people who have the strength and maturity to understand the ways of God, who in turn is symbolized by the brightness of the sun and referred to traditionally as the 'Sun of Justice'. In a short letter of c.H50(?) to an Abbot at Busenberg [Letter 71], Hildegard uses similar imagery: 'The light in the light speaks to you. Be a good servant in your mind. Watch with a good will. Imitate the eagle that gazes at the sun rather than at the shadow of the shadow. Do not become tired of good works either! Instead, keep your hand on the plough with the strength of your mind. Feed your flock justly, as well as you can, with God's help. With all your strength, run with the eagle that gazes at the light so that you are not snatched away by listlessness. Flee also the darkness of impiety, just as God makes things clear in the cause of good will. For God wants you dead to the things of the world and alive to the life of sanctification. Now live for ever.'

2. The Action of the Will (from Scivias I, 4)

In a series of images based on her concept of 'greenness', this digression in the middle of Scivias 1, 4 presents some of Hildegard's ideas on anthropology. Perhaps written before the letter to Bernard, it has been compared to writings by Hugh of St Victor and Honorius of Autun and reveals how widely read she must have been, especially as she did not base the passage on one particular identifiable source. Drawing on wide knowledge, Hildegard describes her understanding of such ideas as the relation of soul and body, human understanding and the action of the will.

How the soul reveals its capabilities according to the capabilities of the body

The soul reveals her capabilities according to the capabilities of the body, so that in childhood she brings forth simplicity, in youth strength, and in the fullness of age, when all the veins of the human being are full, she brings forth her greatest strength in wisdom. In the same way a tree in its first growth brings forth tender shoots, goes on then to bear fruit and finally ripens that fruit to the fullness of utility. But afterwards in old age when a human being's bones and veins incline to weakness, then the soul reveals gentler strengths, as though tired of human knowledge. In the same way, at the onset of wintertime, the sap of the tree withdraws from the leaves and branches as the tree begins to incline towards old age.

The human being contains three paths

A human being contains three paths: namely, soul, body and senses. On these three paths, human life runs its course. The soul fills the body with life and brings forth the senses; for its part the body attracts the soul to it and opens the senses; in turn the senses touch the body and draw the soul to them. The soul provides the body with life like fire flooding the darkness with light; it has two major powers like two arms: the understanding and the will. Not that the soul has these limbs to move herself about; rather she reveals herself in these two powers like the sun manifesting itself in the splendour of its light. Therefore human being, you are not a bundle of veins; pay attention to the knowledge of the scriptures.⁷

Human understanding

Human understanding is connected to the soul like the arms to the body. For just as the arm is joined to the hand and the hand to the fingers, so also there is no doubt that understanding proceeds from the soul and activates the other powers of the soul, by which it knows and recognizes human actions. For over all the other powers of the soul it is understanding which distinguishes what is good from what is bad in human actions. Understanding is therefore a teacher through whom all things are known, for in this way he shakes out all things just as the wheat is separated from the stalks and husks; he examines what things are useful and what are useless, what things are lovable and what are hateful, what things belong to life and what to death.

⁷ you are not a bundle... knowledge of the scriptures: Hildegard appears to mean: 'As a human being you are more complex than you imagine, and you will learn this when sacred writings are explained to you.' The phrase 'you are not a bundle of veins' translates the Latin 'quae non es sarcina medullarum'. The expression is an example of where Hildegard's words and images remain obscure and allusive. In the previous section (I, 4, 17) she has been speaking about old age and how the 'bones and veins incline to weakness', which perhaps gives a hint of her meaning.

Just as food without salt is bland, so also the other powers of the soul are weak and unknowing without it. Understanding is in the soul like the shoulders in the body, acting as the moving force behind the other powers of the soul, giving them strength like the shoulders give strength to the body. It is flexible, like the bend of the arm, discerning both the divine and the human in God. Thus human understanding works with true faith, for like the articulation of the fingers of the hand it can distinguish between many diverse actions. It therefore operates differently from the other forces of the soul. Why is this?

The will

The will warms an action, the mind receives it, and thought bodies it forth. The understanding, however, discerns an action by the process of knowing good and evil just as the angels also have an understanding that loves good and hates evil. And just as the body has a heart, so too the soul has understanding, which exercises its power in one part of the soul just as the will does in another.

How does this happen? The will in fact has great power in the soul. How does this come about? The soul stands, so to speak, in the corner of the house, that is, in the firm support of the heart, like a man standing in the corner of a house in order to survey the whole house and supervise its running. He raises his right arm to give a sign and points out things useful to the house as he turns towards the east. The soul does likewise on the roadways of the whole body when she looks towards the rising of the sun. The soul uses the will, as it were like her right arm, as a firm support for the veins and the bones and the movement of the whole body, for the will directs every action, whether for good or ill.

The parable of the fire and the bread

The will is like a fire baking every action in an oven.⁸ Bread is baked in order to feed people and strengthen them so that they can live. The will is the force behind the whole of the action. It grinds the action in a mill, it adds yeast and kneads it firmly and thus carefully prepares the action, like a loaf of bread which the will bakes to perfection in the heat of its zeal. In so doing it provides human beings with a better food than bread for the activities they do. For while food is taken into the human body and used up, the action of the will endures within the human being until the separation of the soul from the body. And although the action will vary greatly in childhood, in youth, in maturity and in the declining years, nevertheless the will directs it stage by stage and brings it to perfection.

⁸ oven: The transforming effect of intense heat is a basic assumption behind this image of the will as a fire in an oven.

5. The Trinity (Scivias II, 2)

The illustration accompanying this vision of the Trinity in the Rupertsberg codex shows a series of three concentric coloured circles with a large figure of a man standing in the middle. The subtlety with which Hildegard uses imagery to explain the mysteries of the Trinity should be compared with her letter to Odo of Soissons on the same subject.

Scivias Part II, vision 2

Then I saw an extremely bright light and in the light the figure of a man the colour of sapphire, and it was all burning in a delightful red fire. And the bright light flooded through all the red fire, and the red fire through all the bright light, and the bright light and the red fire shone together through the whole figure of the man so that they were one light in one strength and power. And again I heard the living light speaking to me.

The three persons

Therefore you see ‘an extremely bright light’, which signifies the Father, who is without the stains of illusion, failure or deceit. And in the light is ‘the figure of a man the colour of sapphire’, which represents the Son, who is without the stains of hard-heartedness, envy or evil, and who before all time, according to his divinity, was begotten of the Father, but afterwards, in time, according to his humanity, became incarnate in the world. And 'it was all burning in a delightful red fire'; this is the fire without the stains of aridity, mortality or darkness, which represents the Holy Spirit, by whom the Only Begotten of the Father was conceived in the flesh, born in time of the Virgin and poured out his light, truth and brightness over all the world.

'And the bright light flooded through all the red fire, and the red fire through all the bright light, and the bright light and the red fire shone together through the whole figure of the man so that they were one light in one strength and power.' This means that the Father, who is supremely just and uniformity, is not without the Son or the Holy Spirit; and that the Holy Spirit, who inflames the hearts of the faithful, is not without the Father or the Son; and that the Son, who is the fullness of fruitfulness, is not without the Father or the Spirit; for they are inseparable in the majesty of divinity, because the Father is not without the Son, nor the Son without the Father, nor the Father or the Son without the Holy Spirit, nor the Spirit without them; so these three persons exist as one God in one integral divinity and majesty, and the unity of divinity thrives inseparable in the three persons, because divinity cannot be separated, since it remains always unchanged without any mutability. But the Father is revealed through the Son, the Son through the beginning of created things, and the Holy Spirit through the incarnate Son. How is this? It is the Father who before time engendered the Son; it is the Son through whom all things were created by the Father at the beginning of creation; and it is the Holy Spirit who appeared in the form of a dove at the baptism of the Son of God towards the end of all time.

May the human race never cease to call fervently upon the one God in three persons

Therefore may the human race never cease to call upon me the one God in three persons, for I have revealed this to human beings in order that they might blaze all the more fiercely in love of me, since I sent my Son into the world through my love for them, just as John, my loved one, witnesses, saying: 'The love of God was disclosed to us in this: that he sent his only begotten Son into the world that we may live through him. His love is in this, not as we loved God but that he first loved us and sent his Son as a propitiation for our sins.' What does this mean? Because God loved us another salvation arose different from the one we had at our first origins, when we were the heirs of innocence and sanctity. For the heavenly Father revealed his love to us in our danger of punishment; for through his heavenly power he sent his Word alone and full of sanctity into the darkness of the world. And there the Word perfected all good things and through his mildness led us back to life. He led us back when we had been rejected for the impurity of our wrongdoing and were unable to return to the sanctity we had lost. What does this mean? It means that God's loving maternal embrace came to us through the fountain of life; his love nourished us for life; and in times of danger his love is our help, a deep and gentle love leading to penitence. How is this?

God has mercifully remembered his great work and his most precious pearl — the human being — whom he fashioned from the soil of the earth and inspired with the breath of life. How did he do this? He drew us to life through penitence, which never fails in its effectiveness, because the cunning serpent deceived us through his proud persuasions; but God cast him down through the penitence which reveals humility, a humility which the devil did not know or practise, for he did not know how to raise himself up to the path of righteousness.

Therefore the salvation of love did not originate in us, for we neither knew nor were able to love God for our salvation; rather, it came from our Creator and Lord, who loved his people so much that he sent his Son for our salvation, as leader and Saviour of the faithful, who washed all our wounds. Thus also he shed that sweet balm from which all the good things of our salvation flow.

Therefore, O human creature, you too should know that God is not affected by any adverse mutability, for the Father is the Father, the Son is the Son, the Holy Spirit is the Holy Spirit; these three persons exist indivisibly in the unity of the godhead. How does this come about?

The three powers of a stone

There are three powers in a stone and three in a flame and three in a word. In a stone there is moist greenness, palpable strength and red-burning fire. It has moist greenness so that it will not fall apart and disintegrate, and palpable strength so that it can provide habitation and defence, and red-burning fire so that it can be warmed and strengthened in its durability. Its moist greenness signifies the Father, who will never dry out or reach a limit to his power; its palpable strength signifies the Son, since he was born of the Virgin and could be touched and grasped; its red-burning fire signifies the Spirit, who is the fire and illumination of the hearts of the faithful. What does this all mean?

Imagine someone who comes into contact too often with the moisture and greenness of a stone and so weakens and falls ill;⁹ in the same way a foolhardy person who tries — in the instability of their thoughts — to look upon God will perish in their faith. Imagine a people taking the palpable strength of stones to build their habitations and protect themselves against their enemies; in the same way the Son of God, who is the true cornerstone, is the habitation of the faithful people, protecting them against evil spirits. And imagine also the red fire, burning bright and lighting up the darkness; in the same way the Holy Spirit puts unbelief to flight, removing all the rust of iniquity.

⁹ who comes into contact... and falls ill: In medieval science, stones were believed to contain varying proportions of energy and moisture (fire and water), while in the medical lore of the period it was believed that an imbalance of the four elements in the human body could lead to ill-health (see 22).

Just as the three powers are contained within the one stone, so the true Trinity is contained within the true Unity.

The three powers of a flame

And just as there are three powers in the glowing heat of a flame, so the one God is in three persons. How is this? The flame consists of splendid brightness, purple vigour and fiery glow. It has a splendid brightness so that it can shine its light, a purple vigour so that it can maintain its existence, and a fiery glow so that it can burn. Consider the Father in the splendid brightness, for he sends out his brightness to the faithful through the goodness of his fatherhood; and in the purple vigour held within the flame and containing its strength, consider the Son, who assumed a body from the Virgin in which the godhead declared its marvels; and in the fiery glow perceive the Holy Spirit, who pours his fire over the minds of believers. But the flame will not be seen if there is no splendid brightness, or purple vigour, or fiery glow; in the same way, God is not worthily honoured in any place where neither the Father, Son, nor Holy Spirit is venerated.

Therefore just as three powers are discerned in the one flame, so three persons are to be understood in the unity of the godhead.

The three components of the human word

Three components may be noted in the human word, just as the Trinity may be considered in the unity of the Godhead. How is this to be done? A word is composed of sound, force and breath. A word has sound in order to be heard, force in order to be understood, and breath in order to be completed. In the sound of the word consider the Father, who expresses all things by his ineffable power; in the force of the word consider the Son, marvellously engendered of the Father; in the breath of the word consider the Holy Spirit, who burns gently within them. But if the sound is not heard, then the force does not operate and the breath is not raised; hence the word is not understood; because the Father, Son and Holy Spirit are not to be divided, for they function as one unanimous activity.

Therefore just as there are the three components of the word so also the heavenly Trinity is in one heavenly unity. And just as no moist greenness can exist or function in the stone without the palpable strength or the red-burning flame, and no palpable strength without the moist greenness or burning flame, and no burning flame without moist greenness or palpable strength; and just as no splendid brightness can exist or function in the flame without the purple vigour or the fiery glow, and no purple vigour without the splendid brightness or the fiery glow, and no fiery glow without the splendid brightness or purple vigour; and just as no sound can exist or function in the word without force or breath, and no force without the sound or the breath, and no breath without the sound or the force, for they act indivisibly in unison; so also the three persons of the Trinity exist inseparably in the majesty of the Godhead and cannot be divided from each other.

Human creature, understand that the one God is in three persons! But you imagine in the foolishness of your mind that God is so powerless that it is impossible for him truly to exist in three persons, but only barely to exist in one! What are you thinking? God is truly God in three persons, the first and the last.

The unity of being

But the Father is not without the Son, nor the Son without the Father, nor the Father without the Son and the Holy Spirit; nor is the Holy Spirit without them, because the three persons are inseparable in the unity of divinity. How is this possible? The word sounds from the mouth of a human being, but the mouth does not make a sound without the word, and the word itself does not sound without life. And where is the word located? In the human being. And where does the word come from? Again, from the human being. And how does this happen? Through a living human being. Thus the Son is in the Father, and he is sent by the Father to this dark earth for the salvation of humankind and conceived by the Virgin through the Holy Spirit. He is the only begotten Son in the deity and the only begotten Son in the virginity; and he is both the only Son of the Father and the only Son of the Mother; for just as the Father engendered him alone outside time, so the Mother engendered him alone inside time, and she remained a virgin after the birth.

Therefore, O human creature, understand that there is one God in three persons, who created you in the strength of his divinity and who redeemed you from your lost state. Do not forget your Creator, as Solomon urges you, and as it is written.

9. Song for Saint Ursula

Hildegard reserved a special devotion for the martyrs of the faith such as Ursula, killed with her many companions at Cologne by the Huns during the Dark Ages, and she wrote two songs to be sung in her honour in church. The sequence as a type of song was intended to be inserted into the liturgy of the mass; divided into stanzas, its form gave scope for longer meditations on a particular theme. The exact date when the following sequence was composed is not known, but the lines spoken by Ursula's detractors ('In the innocence of her girlish ignorance, she does not know what she is saying') have an obvious application to Hildegard and the opposition she experienced in the early years of her life and work. Whether consciously or unconsciously, Hildegard may have identified with the pilgrim Ursula in her own plans for departure to a new community at the Rupertsberg.

O Ecclesia oculi tui. Sequence

O Church, your eyes are like sapphire,¹⁰ and your ears like Mount Bethel,¹¹ your nose is like a mountain of myrrh and incense,¹² your mouth the sound of many waters.

¹⁰ like sapphire: Cf. Ezekiel 1:26, a vision of four-winged creatures: 'Above the expanse over their heads was what looked like a throne of sapphire...'

¹² a mountain of myrrh and incense: Song of Songs (or Song of Solomon) 4:6: 'I will go to the mountain of myrrh and to the hill of incense.' See also Song of Songs 4:1-5, where the lover praises the various aspects of his bride in a series of similes which probably influenced the first few lines of Hildegard's poem. In the medieval commentary tradition, the lover of the Song of Songs was interpreted allegorically as Christ, while the bride was seen as the Church.

In a vision of true faith,
Ursula loved the Son of God,
she abandoned husband and worldly life
and gazed at the sun, calling the fair youth and saying:

'I have eagerly desired to come to you at the heavenly nuptials and sit with you,
running to you on the pilgrim way like a cloud racing through the purest air like a sapphire.'

And after Ursula had said this,
a rumour went through the people.

And they said: 'In the innocence of her girlish ignorance, she does not know what she is saying.'

And they began to make fun of her, singing their songs,¹³
until the fiery burden fell on her.

Then they all acknowledged her,
for rejection of the world is like Mount Bethel.
And they acknowledged also the pleasant fragrance of myrrh and incense, since rejection of the world had descended upon all.

¹³ make fun of her, singing their songs: The Latin has 'luder', 'to play', 'in magna symphonia', 'in great harmony'. As The Book of Life's Merits I, 5-6 shows (27), 'playfulness' is a fickle, malicious mockery, a vice to be remedied and defeated by true 'shame'. Sabina Flanagan, in Hildegard of Bingen 1098-1179: A Visionary Life (London, 1989), p. 137, interprets the passage differently, suggesting that the term ludere refers to games played on board ship as Ursula and her companions travelled on their pilgrimage.

Then the devil sent out his troops to murder the most noble behaviour in their bodies.

And all the elements heard this with a loud cry and they shouted before the throne of God:

‘Alas the red of the Lamb’s innocent blood has flowed
at this betrothal.’

May all the heavens hear,

14. Three Political Letters

As Hildegard became established at Rupertsberg, she began to gain a reputation for prophecy and political wisdom as well as theological understanding, and it was in this role as adviser and prophetess that she became known as the ‘Sibyl of the Rhine’. Soon her direct advice was being sought, and given, in the current affairs of the German Empire and the Church. The letters here, though difficult to date precisely, illustrate aspects of this activity.

The letter to Pope Eugenius III is markedly different in tone from her earlier one to the same correspondent; the language is more apocalyptic, with the sword of divine justice circling in the air, and there is some intriguing animal imagery. It is tempting to relate the image of the bear to the new king of Germany, Frederick Barbarossa, who signed a political agreement with Eugenius at the Treaty of Constance in 1153.

The letter to Henry (Bishop of Liege 1145-64) is similarly urgent, with its imagery of dark clouds ominously threatening the mountain of flowers and gentle breezes. The dark clouds are a less precise kind of metaphor than that of the bear, but the implication is that the Church is somehow threatened. Henry was loyal to Barbarossa and took part in the first Italian expedition of 1154, attending the Emperor’s coronation by Pope Hadrian IV in 1155.

Hadrian IV was an Englishman and vigorous politician who at first honoured the Treaty of Constance by ousting the leader of the Senate, Arnold of Brescia, from Rome and by crowning Barbarossa as Emperor. But his agreement with King William I of Norman Sicily in 1156 brought a radical change of policy. In October 1157 a letter from Hadrian, delivered by his legates to the Diet of Besançon, provoked a bitter row with Barbarossa and his chancellor Rainald Dassel, who interpreted its requirements as a threat to imperial power. Hildegard’s letter to Hadrian presents a series of apocalyptic images and metaphors which, although bafflingly unclear, are of undoubted relevance to the events of Hadrian’s pontificate.

Hildegard to Pope Eugenius III, 1148-53 [Letters]

He who is not silent speaks — because of the weakness of those who are too blind to see, too deaf to hear, too dumb to speak — that robbers lie in wait by night with death-dealing weapons! And what does he say? The sword circles and turns, killing those who are evil in mind!

You in your person are a shining breastplate,¹⁵ the primary root, the presider at Christ's nuptials with the Church. But you are divided in your attentions. On the one hand your soul is renewed in the mystic flower that is the companion of virginity¹⁶ on the other, you are the branch of the Church.¹⁷ Listen to the One who strikes with his name and flows in the torrent; listen to him speaking to you: do not cast the eye from the eye, do not cut off the light from the light; but stand on the even path, lest you be accused for the sake of those souls who have been placed in your bosom. Do not allow them to sink in the lake of perdition through the power of the feasting prelates!

A jewel lies on the path, but a bear¹⁸ comes along. Seeing the beautiful jewel, he stretches out a paw to seize it and place it in his bosom. But suddenly an eagle appears, snatches the jewel, wraps it in the cover of his wings and bears it away to the inner courtyard of the palace of the king. That very jewel shines out its radiance in the presence of the king. And for love of

¹⁵ breastplate: Cf. the 'breastplate of righteousness' in Isaiah 59:17 and Ephesians 6:14; the 'breastplate of faith and love' in I Thessalonians 5:8; the 'breastplates of fire' in Revelation 9:17

¹⁶ the mystic flower... virginity: Eugenius was originally a Cistercian monk from Clairvaux, a monastic order with a strong interest in the contemplative life.

¹⁷ the branch of the Church: i.e. the Papacy.

¹⁸ bear: On a theological level, the bear could be a symbol of the devil, but on a political level, this is likely to be a reference to the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa, as Joseph L. Baird and Radd K. Ehrman suggest in the notes to their translation The Letters of Hildegard of Bingen.

the jewel, the king presents the eagle with golden shoes¹⁹ praising him highly for his goodness.

You now, the viceroy of Christ, seated on the throne of the Church, choose for yourself the better part that you may be the eagle overcoming the bear! Adorn the inner courtyard of the Church in the souls entrusted to you, so that in your golden shoes you may come to the heights and remove yourself far from the intruder's grasp!

Hildegard to Henry, Bishop of Liege, 1148-53 [Letter 37R]

The living light says: the paths of the scriptures lead directly to the high mountain,²⁰ where the flowers grow and the costly aromatic herbs; where a pleasant wind blows, bringing forth their powerful fragrance; where the roses and lilies reveal their shining faces. But because of the shadows of dark living air, that mountain did not appear until the Son of the most High had enlightened the world. On that day, the sun rose from the dawn, illuminating this world so that all the people could see its aromatic herbs. That day was very beautiful, and sweet tidings came forth.

But O shepherds, now is the time for mourning and weeping, because in our time the mountain has been covered with a very black cloud so that it no longer sends forth its gentle fragrance. You, Henry, must be a good shepherd, noble of character. And just as the eagle gazes at the sun, ponder and consider how you can call back the wanderers and exiles and bring some light to this mountain, so that you will live, and so that you will hear the most loving voice of the Judge on high: 'Well done, good and faithful servant.' Then your soul will shine with light like a soldier brilliant in the fight, who rejoices with his comrades because he has gained the victory.

¹⁹ golden shoes: The idea is perhaps biblical; cf. Ephesians 6:15, where shoes are associated with the 'gospel of peace'.

²⁰ the high mountain: An image with many connotations. The basic idea is the place of salvation, which separates light and darkness and divides good from evil. The same image occurs in the vision of the man on the mountain in Scivias (25) and in the vision of the cosmic egg in Scivias I, 3 (20).

Therefore, teacher of the people, fight for the good victory. Correct those in error, and so wash the mud from the beautiful pearls. Prepare them for the high king. Let your mind pant with great eagerness to call those pearls back to the mountain where the gift of God had its origin. May God protect you now and free your soul from eternal punishment.

Hildegard to Pope Hadrian IV, 1155 [Letter 9]

The one who gives life to the living says this. O man, you will sustain the fearful rage of lionesses and the great strength of leopards. You will experience shipwreck in the taking of spoils. For you have been given over to all those who seek refuge with you in their state of exhaustion. Nevertheless you have a ready understanding with which to pit yourself against the fierce behaviour of men. In raging at them you hang on firmly to the manes of the galloping horses which run ceaselessly along the tracks of plunder. But you fight against yourself when at times you favour the apparent probity of certain people if you hide the treasure-chests of those killed in conflict on the open roads. Therefore you will suffer a fierce battle. But you will destroy the movable goods of the rest, who will fall into the pit because of their asperity. Yet you have the power of the strong key²¹ which does not go willingly in the form of a ruby to the Feast of Unleavened Bread.

²¹ the power of the strong key: Cf. Matthew 16:19. 'And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.'

In your heart, therefore, seek the salvation of waters so that you do not fall into the whirlwind, and so that you may remain gentle to the distress and pain of those who are afflicted by the torment of many wounds, thus imitating your Saviour, who will redeem you. And God will not leave you, but you will see in his light.

IN PRAISE OF CREATION

20. The Cosmic Egg (from Scivias I, 3)

A famous image in Hildegard's work is that of the 'cosmic egg', a survey of the cosmos which forms the third vision of the first book of Scivias. This vision is descriptive, but also highly allegorical, and it is worth noting that although each detail of the description represents a physical object in Hildegard's universe, she also attaches a further significance to it in the life of faith and the events of history. In so doing she implies that human life and the universe are closely and inextricably connected, as microcosm and macrocosm. This ties in with her exalted view of the human being in Scivias 1, 3,17 (translated below), a characteristic attitude of the twelfth-century Renaissance.

The cosmic egg

After these things I saw a huge form, rounded and shadowy, and shaped like an egg²² it was pointed at the top, wide in the middle and narrower at the bottom. Its outer layer consisted of an atmosphere of bright fire with a kind of dark membrane beneath it. And in that outer atmosphere there was a ball of red fire so large that all the huge form was lit up by it. Directly above the fireball was a vertical row of three lights which held it with their fire and energy and prevented it from falling.

At times the fireball rose upwards and was met by more fire, which caused it to shoot out great long flames. At times, however, the fireball moved downwards and encountered a region of great cold that caused it quickly to retract its flames.

From the outer atmosphere of fire, a wind blew storms. And from the dark membrane beneath, another wind raged with further storms which moved out in all directions on the globe. The dark membrane contained also a dark fire of such horror that I was unable to perceive it properly. The horror buffeted the dark membrane with a massive impact of sounds and storms and sharp stones great and small.²³ Whenever the noise arose it set in motion the layer of bright fire, winds and air, thus causing bolts of lightning to presage the sounds of thunder; for the fiery energy senses the first agitations of the thunder within it.

Below the dark layer, however, was the purest of ether with no membrane beneath it. Here also I saw a fireball, of great magnitude, filled with white-shining energy; it had two lights placed above it which held it and prevented it from passing beyond the circuit of its course. Situated everywhere throughout the ether were many bright spheres, into which the white fireball discharged its energy at regular intervals. It then rose up again to the red fireball where it recharged its fires and sent them forth again into the bright spheres. The ether also contained a wind, which poured out its storms and extended them all over the cosmos.

²³ The horror... stones great and small: As Frances Beer suggests, 'the vision is ultimately reassuring because it reveals how evil can exist and, at the same time as it is part of the creation, be counterbalanced and controlled by the forces of good'. See her Women and Mystical Experience in the Middle Ages (Woodbridge, 1992), p. 46.

Beneath the ether I could see a layer of watery air, which had a white membrane beneath it. It spread out everywhere, giving off water to the whole of the world. At times it accumulated quickly and sent out a sudden fall of rain with a great crash. But when it spread gently it sent forth soft rain with only gentle agitation. But from it there came a wind and storms which spread all over the globe.

And in the middle of these elements there was a sandy ball of great size which was so surrounded by these elements that it could not move in any direction. However, when the winds collided with the elements, the force of their impact set the whole world in motion a little.

And I saw between the north and the east the likeness of a great mountain, which showed great areas of darkness towards the north and a great light towards the east.²⁴ The darkness could not affect the light nor the light the darkness.

And again I heard a voice speaking to me from heaven.

Invisible and eternal things are made known through visible and temporal things

God, who created all things in his will, made them so that his name would be known and honoured. Through his creation ion he not only makes known visible and temporal things but also invisible and eternal things.⁴ Such matters are shown in this vision which you see.

²⁴ between the north and the east... a great mountain... towards the east: The great mountain separates good in the east from evil in the north.

The significance of the cosmos made in the likeness of an egg

‘I saw a huge form, rounded and shadowy, and shaped like an egg; it was pointed at the top, wide in the middle and narrower at the bottom.’ The large form which you see represents, on the level of faith, the omnipotent God, incomprehensible in his majesty, inconceivable in his mysteries, the hope of all the faithful. It was pointed at the top because at first human activity was naive and simple; later in the Old and New Testaments it became more wide-ranging; finally towards the end of the world it is to endure the narrow constriction of many troubles.

The position of the sun and the three stars and their significance

‘And in that outer atmosphere there was a ball of red fire so large that all the huge form was lit up by it.’ With the splendour of his brightness he shows that in God the Father is his ineffable firstborn son, the Sun of Justice, shining with burning love in such glory that all of creation was lit up by the brightness of his light.

‘Directly above the fireball was a vertical row of three lights which held it with their fire and energy and prevented it from falling.’ The function of the three lights is to show that when God’s Son descended from heaven to earth leaving the angels above him, he made known the things of the heavens to human beings existing in soul and body. By following his light they glorify him, casting all harmful error from them. They praise him as the true Son of God, who became incarnate of the true Maiden when the angel proclaimed him to them and when the human being — alive in soul and body — received him with faith and joy.

The sandy ball of the earth and its significance

‘And in the middle of these elements there was a sandy ball of great size which was so surrounded by these elements that it could not move in any direction.’ The ball represents humanity endowed with the gift of profound contemplation, made in a wonderful manner from the clay of the earth, and living in the strength of the creatures of God. Human beings are so surrounded by the power of God's created things that they cannot be separated from them. The elements of the world are thus created for human beings and render them their service.²⁵ In the midst of the elements is the human being presiding over them by divine ordinance. As David says, inspired by God: 'Thou hast crowned him with glory and honour. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands. This means that you, O God, have wonderfully created all things. You have crowned the human being with the splendid golden crown of the understanding and clothed him with the honourable robe of visible beauty. You have made him the ruler over your exalted and perfect works, which you have distributed justly and well throughout your creation. Over all other creatures you have granted the human being high worth and admirable dignity.

The meaning of the earthquake

You see in the vision that opposing winds come together, and the force of their impact sets the whole globe in motion a little. For when at any given time the creatures of God become involved with the knowledge of their Creator, so that with the sounding of the words one wonder follows another, then human beings, struck by the grandeur of this miracle, tremble in body and soul, pondering, in their wonder at this miracle, their own weakness and frailty.

²⁵ The elements... render them their service: The elements in medieval science are earth, air, fire (i.e. energy) and water; all are involved in human physiology, and for Hildegard the human being is seen as being at one with the world, as part of a positive view of nature and ecology.

The Unknown Language

The Unknown Language (Latin Lingua ignota) presents something of a puzzle. It was compiled in the middle period 1151-8, before work began on The Book of Life's Merits. As in many medieval glossaries, the words are classified rather like a thesaurus, and arranged in a hierarchical list beginning with expressions for God, angel and human being, and finishing with the names of trees, plants, herbs and animals. For an impression of the style of the language, the following examples are of interest:

ENGLISH	LATIN	LINGUA IGNOTA
God	Deus	Aiguonz
angel	angelus	aieganiz
saint	sanctus	ziuienz
Savior	Salvator	Liuionz
devil	diabolus	diuueliz
spirit	spiritus	ispariz
Human	homo	Inimoiz

In this small sample, a few patterns of word formation emerge which would repay further study.²⁶ As to the question of how the 'unknown language' was used, a satisfactory answer has not yet been offered. It has been suggested that it was a secret language for communication between the nuns at the Rupertsberg. Alternatively, as a passage in The Book of Life's Merits indicates, it may have been purely a sacred language, and this conjecture is supported by a text in which words from the language occur. In a song on the dedication of a church, Hildegard replaces standard Latin words with her own expressions from the lingua ignota. Although the theme and inspiration for the piece is the well-known vision of Revelation 21:2, 'And I John saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband', the result has an additional sense of mystery appropriate to a vision of heaven.

²⁶ word formation: The root aieg seems to be important, as do the endings -nz and -iz. Other examples not listed above suggest influence from Latin or German, e.g. vanix, 'woman', perhaps from Latin vanitas, 'vanity', falschin, 'poet', perhaps from Middle High German valsch, 'false', and sonziz, 'apostle', possibly related to the sonus or 'sacred sound' to which Hildegard frequently referred. For more information on Hildegard's language, see Marie-Louise Portmann and Alois Odermatt (eds), Worterbuch der unbekannten Sprache [Dictionary of the Unknown Language] (Basel, 1986).

The original text of the song is as follows, with non-Latin words in italics, and a modern English translation:²⁷

A Vision of Love (from the Book of Divine Works I, i)

This excerpt from 'The Book of Divine Works, written in the period 1163-73/4, sees Hildegard's visionary gifts at their height. Beginning with a vision reminiscent of the prophet Ezekiel, Hildegard moves to a paean of divine immanence as embodied in a figure who is at once Love, Wisdom and Power. Its nearest equivalents are the sapiential tradition of the Old Testament Apocrypha, notably Wisdom of Solomon 7-8, and its theme is summed up in Ecclesiasticus 24:1, which states that 'Wisdom shall praise herself, and shall glory in the midst of her people'.

1. And I saw as amid the airs of the South in the mystery of God a beautiful and marvellous image of a human figure; her face was of such beauty and brightness that I could more easily have stared at the sun. On her head she had a broad band of gold. And in that golden band above her head there appeared a second face, like an old man, whose chin and beard touched the top of the first head. Wings protruded from behind the neck of the figure on either side, and rising up clear of the golden band their tips met and joined overhead. On the right, above the sweep of the wing, was an image of an eagle's head, and I saw it had eyes of fire in which there appeared the brilliance of angels as in a mirror. On the left, above the sweep of the wing, was the image of a human face, which shone like the brightness of the stars. These faces were turned towards the East.

But from each of her shoulders, a wing extended down to the knee. And she wore a tunic like the glory of the sun and in her hands she carried a lamb like the bright light of day. But beneath her feet she trampled a monster of dreadful appearance, black and venomous, and also a serpent, which had fixed its teeth into the right ear of the monster and wound the rest of its body across its own head, and had stretched its tail on the left side.

2. The figure spoke: I am the supreme fire and energy. I have kindled all the sparks of the living, and I have breathed out no mortal things, for I judge them as they are. I have properly ordained the cosmos, flying about the circling circle with my upper wings, that is with wisdom. I am the fiery life of divine substance, I blaze above the beauty of the fields, I shine in the waters, I burn in sun, moon, and stars. And I awaken all to life with every wind of the air, as with invisible life that sustains everything. For the air lives in greenness and fecundity. The waters flow as though they are alive. The sun also lives in its own light, and when the moon has waned it is rekindled by the light of the sun and thus lives again; and the stars shine out in their own light as though they are alive.

I established the pillars that support the whole circle of the earth. I made the winds, and, subject to them, the wings of the winds, which are lesser winds. Through their gentle force, these contain the stronger winds and prevent them from showing their full strength with great danger; in the same way the body covers the soul and contains it lest it breathe out and expire. And conversely also, just as the breath of the soul strengthens and sustains the body so that it does not weaken, in the same way the stronger winds energize the subsidiary winds to carry out their appropriate tasks.

Thus I am concealed in things as fiery energy. They are ablaze through me, like the breath that ceaselessly enlivens the human being, or like the wind-tossed flame in a fire. All these things live in their essence, and there is no death in them, for I am life. I also am rationality, who holds the breath of the resonant word by which the whole of creation was created; and I have breathed life into everything, so that nothing by its nature may be mortal, for I am life.

And I am life: not the life struck from stone, or blossoming from branches, or rooted in a man's fertility, but life in its fullness, for all living things have their roots in me. Reason is the root, through which the resonant word flourishes.

Therefore as God is rational, how could it be that he did not act, since he allows all of his works to flourish through the human being whom he created in his own image and likeness and in whom he marked out all creatures according to their measure? But it was in eternity that God wished to create his great work - the human being - and when he had completed that work he entrusted human beings with all creation so that they could create with it in the same way that God created his work, that is, humanity.

So I am the helper, for all living things burn through me; and I am steady life in eternity, without beginning or end, the same life which is God in motion and activity; and yet this one life has three powers: eternity is the Father, the word the Son, and the breath connecting the two the Holy Spirit, and similarly God signified the same in human beings in whom there is body, soul and rationality.

The fact that I 'blaze above the beauty of the fields' means this: the earth is the matter from which God makes man and woman. The fact that 'I shine in the waters' signifies the soul, for - just as water flows through all the earth - the soul permeates all of the body. 'I burn in sun and moon'; this refers to rationality, and the 'stars' are the innumerable words of rationality.

'And I awaken all to life with every wind of the air, as with invisible life that sustains everything.' This signifies that whatever grows and matures is animated and preserved through air and wind, and it deviates in no way from the power within.

3. And again I heard a voice from heaven, which spoke to me:

God, who created all, made humanity in his own image and likeness, and in them he marked out both the higher and lower creatures. He had such love for humanity that he destined them to take the place from which the falling angel had been ejected, and he ordained them for the glory and honour which the angel in his bliss had lost. This is shown by the vision you see. For when you see 'as amid the airs of the South in the mystery of God a beautiful and marvellous image of a human figure', this signifies the Love of the heavenly Father in the strength of his unceasing divinity, beautiful in its selectivity, and marvellous in its gifts of mysteries, appearing in the human figure because, when the son of God assumed human flesh, he redeemed lost humanity through the service of Love. This is why the face was 'of such beauty and brightness' that you 'could more easily have stared at the sun', because the abundance of Love emanates in such brightness of gifts that it far surpasses all exercise of human understanding (by which it can discern diverse ideas in the soul) - so far, in fact, that no person can grasp such abundance with their senses. This signifies symbolically that things may be perceived through faith that cannot be seen visibly with the eyes.

4. 'On her head the human figure had a broad band of gold', because only universal faith, diffused round the whole ambit of the earth and originating in the bright splendour of the first dawn, can encompass in all devotion the great abundance of true Love, namely that God in the humanity of his son redeemed human beings and confirmed them with the downpouring of the Holy Spirit, so that one God is acknowledged in the Trinity who without temporal beginning before eternity was God in the Godhead.

‘And in that golden band above her head there appeared a second face, like an old man’; this signifies the all-surpassing goodness of the deity, without beginning or end, who succours the faithful, because his ‘chin and beard touched the top of the first head’, and so by his disposition and protection of all, God touches the height of utmost Charity, in which the Son through his humanity leads lost men and women back to the heavens.

5. ‘Wings protruded from behind the neck of the figure on either side, and rising up clear of the golden band their tips met and joined overhead.’ This means that the love of God cannot be separated from the love of neighbour, since they proceed from the virtue of Charity in the unity of faith, and through great longing they encompass that faith. And the holy Godhead covers the immeasurable splendour of his glory from human beings for as long as they remain in the shadow of death, deprived of the heavenly tunic which they lost with Adam.
